A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

HISTORY OF KENTUCKY

THOMAS CLAY McDOWELL, owner of the famous Ashland Stud and Breeding Farm, has a list of distinctions to his credit as a sportsman, turfman, breeder and handler of thoroughbreds which are well known to all students of the thoroughbred industry, and which can only be suggestively outlined at this place.

Thomas Clay McDowell is a son of Henry Clay and Anne (Clay) McDowell and is a brother of William A. McDowell of Lexington. A complete account of this distinguished family is contained on other pages. Thomas Clay McDowell was born at Louisville March 9, 1866, fourth among the seven children of his parents. As a McDowell he naturally grew up with the spirit and traditions of the family strongly impressed on his character. He was well educated in the Kentucky State College and the University of Virginia, and as a young man accepted appointment from President Benjamin Harrison as internal revenue collector for the Seventh District of Kentucky. While in this office he became a partner with his father in the trotting stud at Ashland, and since 1890 has given almost undivided attention to the breeding of thoroughbreds. His first purchase was the mare Kenawaha, and in the spring of 1890 he acquired from the Belle Meade Stud near Nashville the famous Studie McNairy with her foal, Maid Marian, who became the first star of great magnitude among the many horses that carried Mr. McDowell's colors to victory on the track. Other early acquisitions were three brood mares, all famous through their individual records or through their descendants, Peg Woffington, Goldie Cad and Gardenia. Besides Maid Marian, which Mr. McDowell sold, after she had proved herself one of the best two year olds, for $7,500, Studie McNairy also produced Batten, famous winner of many stakes, and sold by Mr. McDowell for $10,000. In those early years he also owned Alan-a-Dale, one of the most remarkable horses ever seen on the American turf, which as a two year old lowered the track record at Washington Park, Chicago, and repeatedly broke track records and won national events, including the Kentucky Derby, and he also sired many race horses of genuine merit. Another performer that brought fame to Mr. McDowell as a turfman was King's Daughter, who at Lexington lowered the track record for a half mile to 47:3-5, and in four years won the Kentucky Oaks and Clark handicap at Louisville, the June handicap at Sheepshead Bay, the St. Leger at Louisville, the Coney Island handicap, the Culver handicap, the Commonwealth handicap, and the Decoration Day handicap, and at Lexington placed the track record for three-quarters of a mile at 1:12 2-5, the mile record at Louisville at 1:38 4-5, with other performances better or equally good, and in five seasons she met and defeated nearly every horse of class, winning thirty-seven races.

For some years past the head of the McDowell stud have been The Manager and Manager Waite. The Manager was winner of many famous classics before being put into the stud. A few years ago a turf rider said of him: "Manager is a horse of faultless action, his speed when in training was equal to that of any racehorse seen in this country in recent years, and his determined finishes gave evidence of superb courage and unflinching gameness. When at his best he had class enough to have won almost any race of the Kentucky Derby in the history of that event, and that he was both a sprinter and a genuine stayer was shown by the records he established at various distances from three-quarters of a mile to a mile and a half."

One of the mainstays of his racing stable for a number of years was the mare Star Jasmine, who won more than thirty races and a total of over $30,000. She won the Latonia cup in 1913, traveling over 2¼ miles in the record breaking time of 3:50 1-5, five seconds faster than that distance had ever been made before over that track.

Among the horses in Mr. McDowell's racing string at present besides Manager Waite, who won the handicap at Lexington in 1918, there is St. Augustine, who broke the mile track record in 1919 in the time 1:36 4-5; Distinction, who as a two-year-old broke the world record for 4½ furlongs at Latonia in 1919, 5:55 2-5, and at Louisville in 1920 as a three-year-old broke the record for seven-eighths mile by covering the distance in 1 minute 25 seconds, and as a four-year-old broke the record by making the same distance in 1 minute and 23 seconds.

Among the many trophies possessed by Mr. McDowell is the cup presented to him and his father by the American Horse Show Association at Chicago for the exhibit of King Rene with five of his colts in 1889. Mr. McDowell is a member of the State Racing Commission, is former president of the Thoroughbred Horse Association, a director of the Havre de Grace Jockey Club of Maryland, the Horse Association of America, the Lexington Union Club and many clubs and associations all over the country.

Of his character as a sportsman a writer well acquainted with his achievements and with the achievements of Kentucky horsemen in general said: "Thomas C. McDowell occupies a unique position among the turfmen of his country, being one of the very few who has bred, trained and raced his own horses. He represents the very highest ideals of horsemanship, has done much to maintain the sport of racing on the highest plane, has been chosen as presiding judge at several important race meetings, and his advice and counsel have been heeded by the legislative bodies of the American turf. He was one of a small group of men who in 1906 brought about the passage of a bill in the Kentucky Legislature authorizing the governor to appoint a racing commission, which bill also prohibited bookmaking both on and off race courses, and which resulted in destroying many of the evils that had existed on the turf in Kentucky up to that time and has been responsible for establishing it in its present healthful condition.

"During his career covering over a quarter of a century he has bred winners of the Breeders' Futurity at Lexington, the Nursery at Churchill Downs, the Lakeside at Washington Park, the Oaks (which event he has won four times), the Great Trial and Annual Champion Stakes at Coney Island, the Chester Cup in England, the Junior Champion at Brighton Beach.

the September Stakes at Coney Island, the Clipsetta Stakes (three times) the Latonia Derby, the Alabama Stakes at Saratoga, the June Stakes at Gravesend, the Latonia Trophy, the Canadian Derby at Fort Erie (twice), the Baltimore Handicap at Laurel, the Harold Stakes at Louisville, the Latonia Cup and, the greatest of them all, The Kentucky Derby. Among the winners bred from the Ashland Stud which did not race in the white and black sash have been David Garrick by Hanover out of Peg Woffington by Longfellow, winner of the Great Trial and Annual Champion in this country and the Chester Cup in England, Puss-in-Boots, winner of the Hopeful Stakes at Saratoga and sent abroad to race in the English Oaks.

"He is a deep student of breeding, has shown rare judgment in mating his mares, has mastered every detail in the preparation of a horse for active racing, and his extraordinary achievements as an owner of race horses have been the result of his attention to details, his close application and his knowledge of horseflesh. As a sportsman he commands the highest respect of the best element of racing men in America."

November 15, 1888, Mr. McDowell married Miss Mary Goodloe, a daughter of Kentucky, whose parents were William C. and Mary (Mann) Goodloe. She was the oldest of her parents' eight children. Mr. and Mrs. McDowell have two children. Their daughter, Anne Clay, is the wife of Dr. William Stucky, one of Lexington's prominent physicians. Their son is William C. G. McDowell, concerning whom more is said on other pages of this publication.

CLAY FAMILY. The people of substantial worth and prominence who have borne the family name Clay in Kentucky have been almost legion, and only students of genealogy understand the exact relationship of the various branches of the family represented here. There were three distinct branches of the family represented among the early settlers of Kentucky, though all of them united on a common ancestor. The following account of the origin of the family in America is taken from a letter written by a brother of Henry Clay, the statesman. According to this account it was through the influence of Sir Walter Raleigh in the reign of Queen Elizabeth that three brothers, sons of Sir John Clay of Wales and England, were brought to the Virginia plantations. Each of these sons was possessed of £10,000, and they settled on James River near Jamestown. Their names were Charles, Thomas and Henry. Henry left no children, but the name Henry has been continued in subsequent branches of the family in practically every generation. The founders of the family under consideration here were Charles and Thomas. Charles Clay was the ancestor of General Green Clay, who came to Kentucky in 1777, and who was in turn the father of Cassius M. Clay and Brutus J. Clay, who with their descendants comprise a prominent group of Kentucky Clays. Thomas Clay, on the other hand, was the ancestor of Rev. John Clay, and it is with this branch of the family that this and the following pages are concerned.

Rev. John Clay, who lived in Hanover County, Virginia, was an eloquent Baptist minister and also owned a plantation called Ephraim in Henrico County and a number of negroes. He died in early life, leaving four sons and three daughters, but the line of descent was confined to his sons, Henry and Porter Clay. Rev. John Clay also had a brother, Edward Clay, who moved to South Carolina and reared a large family, thus accounting for another branch of the family. Rev. John Clay married Elizabeth Hudson, a daughter of George and Elizabeth (Jennings) Hudson. Her father was a wealthy land owner of Hanover County. After her husband's death she married Captain Henry Watkins, and she spent the latter part of her life at Versailles, Kentucky. Many biographers of Henry Clay, the statesman, have emphasized the poverty and obscurity of his boyhood, though there is little foundation for that version, since his mother was a member of a wealthy family, and the Clays and Hudsons probably lived in the style of the Virginia gentry. A better explanation is made that the poverty of the family was due to the Revolutionary war, and particularly to a raid made by the British Colonel Tarleton on the home of Mrs. Clay while her husband was lying dead in the house.

An older son of Rev. John and Elizabeth Clay was Rev. Porter Clay, who in a letter he wrote in 1848 to a friend gives the following account of his family: "With regard to myself I will merely say I have been all my life a child of God's peculiar providence; always poor, yet always rich in the kind esteem of good friends wherever I go. In early life I married an amiable lady by whom I had six children, three of each sex, who are now all dead. I buried the last, a son, two years after my visit to the East. My second daughter married a full cousin of Gen. Z. Taylor. She left me two grandchildren, a son and a daughter. They are residing with their father in St. Louis, Missouri. My grandson was a soldier with Colonel Doniphan in his 3,000-mile campaign in Mexico."

Porter Clay, though never a national figure like his famous brother, Henry, was a man of noble deeds and sublime self-sacrifice. The greater part of his career he was an evangelist, though he began life as a lawyer, being admitted to the bar in Lexington in 1815. He practiced at Versailles, first took up his work as an evangelist there, and was appointed by the governor auditor of public accounts for the state, an office he held for fourteen years, until after his second marriage, when he moved to Illinois.

Porter Clay had the distinction of preaching the first English sermon ever preached west of the Mississippi River. All down the banks of the Mississippi he preached in the settlements to the whites and some of the blacks and the Indians. Hundreds were hopefully converted under his constant preaching. Not a day passed without some meeting when he preached the Gospel with his old time tenderness and power. At length he reached Camden, Arkansas. He held meetings every night for a considerable time. A church was organized and he seemed likely to spend his last days here in active ministry. But the troubled stream of his life was nearing its close. Previous to this time he had lost his property, but this did not appear to trouble him—his sublime faith sustained him to the end. His brother, Henry Clay, offered him a home at Ashland, which he declined, saying: "I owe my service to God, and He will take care of me." He died in the fall of 1850, as his great brother wrote, "in the full enjoyment of the Christian hope." His body rests in the little cemetery at Camden. This is the man of whom Henry Clay said, "He was the greatest man I ever knew."

HENRY CLAY. Any discussion of the public life and career of the "sage of Ashland" must be reserved for other pages. Here it is proper to note merely a few facts concerning his private life and reference to his marriage and family, since it is his descendants that make up a large and important group of the Clay family in Kentucky. Henry Clay was born in Hanover County, Virginia, April 12, 1777, and died at Washington, D. C., June 29, 1852. In 1791 he went to Richmond, Virginia, as an employee in the store of a Mr. Denny. Afterwards he served as desk clerk in the High Court of Chancery. In 1797 he came to Kentucky and two years afterward married Lucretia Hart. Their family consisted of eleven children, six daughters and five sons. The daughters all died within the lifetime of their parents. The son, H. Clay, Jr., was killed at the battle of Buena Vista in the Mexican war, but three of his children survive him at Louisville. Of the other sons, Thomas Clay was a farmer at Lexington. James B. Clay is the subject of a special sketch that follows, and a third was John Clay.

LUCRETIA HART CLAY. The following account of Lucretia Hart Clay, wife of Henry Clay, is abridged from a paper written by Susan M. Clay, her daughter-in-law:

"Every now and then we see in a book or newspaper some slighting allusion to the wife of Henry Clay, who is spoken of as inferior in birth, mind, education, etc., to her distinguished husband. This is, possibly, owing to the fact that for eighteen years she did not accompany him to Washington, but led a quiet, almost secluded life at Ashland.

"As a daughter-in-law of Mrs. Clay and one who was intimately associated with her I feel it is due to her memory that I should correct these false impressions. I am now an old woman, in my eighty-third year, and, therefore, can not attempt to elaborate my sketch of Mrs. Clay and her antecedents, but will give the bare, plain facts, the absolute truth as I know it to be."

Lucretia Hart Clay was a daughter of Col. Thomas Hart and Susanna Gray. The Hart family was established in Hanover County, Virginia, in 1690. The only son of a pioneer was Thomas Hart, who married Susanna Rice, and their oldest son was Col. Thomas Hart, who was born in 1730 and accompanied his mother and the other children to North Carolina in 1760. He became prominent in the Colonial and Revolutionary history of North Carolina, being a member of the Provincial Congress at New Bern of August 25, 1774, also attended the Convention of April 4, 1775, and was a delegate to the Assembly at Hillsboro August 21, 1775. He was an officer in the Revolutionary army, and was a member of the famous Transylvania Company. His brother, Captain Nathaniel Hart, was killed by the Indians near Boonesboro, Kentucky, in 1782, and it was Susanna, daughter of Capt. Nathaniel, who married Col. Isaac Shelby, first governor of Kentucky. Col. Thomas Hart reared in his home his orphan niece, Ann, who became the wife of Jesse Benton, and her oldest son was the famous Thomas Hart Benton, the distinguished United States senator from Missouri.

Lucretia Hart Clay's mother was Susanna Gray, an heiress, only child of Col. John Gray and granddaughter of John Gray, Sr., who came to this country with Governor Gabriel Johnston in 1734 and settled in North Carolina. His son, Col. John Gray, was born in 1724 and died in 1775. He was a loyalist and is said to have opposed the marriage of his daughter on the ground that Colonel Hart was a rebel.

Col. Thomas Hart lived in North Carolina until 1780, when he moved to Hagerstown, Maryland, where his daughter, Lucretia, was born March 18, 1781. In 1794 he removed from Hagerstown to Lexington, Kentucky, where he died in 1808. He was the father of three sons and four daughters. His son, Capt. Nathaniel Hart, commanded the Lexington Light Infantry in the War of 1812, and was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of the River Raisin and massacred by the Indians. His oldest daughter married Dr. Richard Pindell, a surgeon in the Revolutionary army. The second daughter married Samuel Price, a lawyer, and she was the mother of Mrs. Marshall, wife of Chief Justice Thomas A. Marshall, of Kentucky. The third daughter married James A. Brown, United States senator from Louisiana and afterward minister to France during two administrations.

Lucretia Hart received her education in Hagerstown to the age of fourteen and afterward in Lexington, where there were better educational advantages than in most other inland towns. In a letter written by Colonel Hart to a friend in 1796 he speaks of his youngest daughter: "Lucretia, our first Marylander, is now fifteen years of age, a fine, sprightly, active girl, and pretty well accomplished in her education." She was married to Henry Clay in 1799 at the age of eighteen. At this time she was a slender, gracefully formed young girl with beautiful hands and feet, her complexion was fair, her features delicate, her eyes blue, and she had a wealth of beautiful auburn hair.

"Soon after their marriage Mr. Clay entered public life, and Mrs. Clay became what is now termed a national woman, the wife of one of America's greatest statesmen. For some inexplicable reason the public has an erroneous idea of her, and now, having given her antecedents, I will speak more particularly of herself. I knew her before my marriage, and intimately, from 1843, when I became her daughter-in-law.

"Let us first see what the author of a recent history entitled 'The True Henry Clay' says of her: 'Mrs. Clay was of good family, but uneducated; had she possessed intellectual qualities—those which would have acted as a counterbalance to her husband's impulsiveness—his career might have been different.' Having been intimately associated with Mrs. Clay for many years, I speak advisedly when I say that she was better educated than most women of her day, having had exceptional advantages. And as to her intellectual qualities, I scarcely understand what the writer means.

"From Mrs. Clay's antecedents, rearing and associations it can be seen that there could have been nothing commonplace about her. Her intellect was vigorous and remained unimpaired up to the time of her death in 1864, when she had just passed her eighty-third year. Her character was strongly marked, and all who knew her were impressed by the simplicity and sincerity of her nature. Unlike her illustrious husband, she was reserved in manner and undemonstrative, but beneath a seemingly cold exterior was a warm and loving heart, full of generous impulses and ready sympathy. She had a nature, too, of rare unselfishness, and a wonderful amount of self-control which sometimes astonished members of her own family.

"Again the writer of 'The True Henry Clay' says: 'Mrs. Clay seldom went to Washington. She had no taste for public life and the farm made great demands on her time. The estate was large and the slaves numerous. She superintended every operation. * * * She made the farm pay when her husband did not use up all the surplus in entertaining. On leaving for Washington he always gave her a generous check for expenses, which she as regularly gave back to him on his return. She was said to be the best farmer in Fayette County.'

"There is not a single assertion in the above that is not incorrect. In the first place, contrary to the author's statement, Mrs. Clay nearly always accompanied her husband to Washington until 1835. She was there during Madison's second term, and often told me of the ladies holding up their handkerchiefs to see which way the wind was blowing, fearing the coming of the British ships in the War of 1812. Mr. Clay left her in Washington when he went to Ghent in 1814. In a letter written from that city in March of the same year, she tells him that her sister, Mrs. Brown, will accompany her to Kentucky. Upon Mr. Clay's return to this country in 1815 he joined her almost immediately at Ashland, and in 1816 she went with him to Washington. The next year, November 9, 1817, their son, James Brown Clay, was born in that city. She returned home with her husband in 1818. In 1820, Mr. Clay, being obliged to retire from Congress on account of pecuniary troubles, brought on by loaning his credit, resigned the speakership and vacated his place in Congress until 1823, when he was returned again to the House of Representatives and re-elected speaker.

"About this time, 1823, they lost a lovely young daughter, Lucretia, and Mrs. Clay remained at Ashland until 1825, when her husband accepted the position of Secretary of State under John Quincy Adams. During this administration her life was saddened by the death of two daughters, a young girl of twelve, who died on her way to Washington, and a married daughter of twenty, who died of yellow fever in New Orleans. Nevertheless, the weekly levees were held alternately at the President's and Mrs. Clay's. Under the burden of her sorrows and of her trying social duties as the wife of the Secretary of State, her health gave way, but she continued to accompany Mr. Clay to Washington and was with him there every year until 1835, with the exception of 1829 and 1830, when he was out of public life and at Ashland.

"Mr. Clay, writing to Judge Brooke from Washington in 1834, says: 'I leave here today for the Virginia Springs on account of Mrs. Clay's health, which continues feeble and precarious.' Her health improved and she returned home to be met, alas, by other sorrows, and in 1835 her last daughter, Mrs. Erwin, died. This was a crushing blow to both mother and father, and from that time Mrs. Clay never returned to Washington, but led a quiet, retired life at Ashland. She was ever ready, however, to receive and welcome her husband's guests and hospitably entertained many distinguished men.

"And now for Mrs. Clay as a farmer—the best farmer in Fayette County, who made the farm pay when her husband did not use up all the surplus in entertaining.

"Mrs. Clay was not a farmer. Outside of a general knowledge of what was going on and a warm interest in it, she had absolutely nothing to do with the farm. There was always an overseer at Ashland whose duty it was to manage the farm according to Mr. Clay's directions.

"Life on a Kentucky estate before the Civil war was, on a small scale, similar to plantation life in the South, and often the duties of the mistress were arduous. Mrs. Clay was fortunate, however, in having in her service an English housekeeper, a Yorkshire woman, who lived with her for over fifty years and relieved her of many household duties for which she had no taste. Nevertheless, Mrs. Clay led an active life, but not in the management of the farm, which was entirely outside of her province. She delighted in the fine orchards and gardens, the beautiful pleasure grounds and the greenhouse. She had a competent white gardener, with efficient negro gardeners under him, and everything was kept in the most perfect order. Mrs. Clay was a kind, indulgent mistress, and it gave her pleasure to think that no slaves were better fed, better clothed or happier than those at Ashland. The women came to her from the farm houses (negro quarters) with their ailments, complaints and petty troubles and were sure of her sympathy and advice.

"Mr. Clay always came home during the recess of Congress, which usually lasted from April to November, and as farming is done in the spring and summer, it is natural to suppose that he would give it his personal attention. The following paragraph in a letter from him to Judge Brooke will show the interest he felt in his farm: 'My attachment to rural occupation every day acquires more strength. * * * My farm is in fine order and my preparations for the crop of the present year are in advance of all my neighbors. I shall make a better farmer than statesman. And I find in the business of cultivation, gardening, grazing, and the rearing of the various descriptions of domestic animals, the most agreeable resources.'

"After Mrs. Clay's return to Ashland, in 1835, Mr. Clay remained seven years in the Senate. He was with his family, however, five or six months in every year. In 1842 he retired from public life until called again to the Senate in 1849, to make his last effort to save the Union. He died in Washington in 1852, and his last words were 'my dear wife.'

JAMES BROWN CLAY, fourth son of Henry Clay, the statesman, was a favorite son and close representative of the principles of his distinguished father, and himself a man of no ordinary ability, and while indifferent to the honors of politics and with only a brief and occasional record of public service, he was a victim of a stormy passion and prejudice of the tempestuous age in which he lived.

He was born in the city of Washington November 9, 1817, was educated at Transylvania University, spent the two years 1835-36 with a commercial concern in Boston, and then studied in the Lexington Law School and practiced for a time as his father's partner.

His first public service was the Mission to Portugal, a position tendered him by General Taylor in 1849. He accepted this post largely from a desire to please his father. That he displayed great sagacity and ability is testified to by President Fillmore in his message of 1850 and by Secretary of State Mr. Clayton, who pronounced his first diplomatic note in the Armstrong case as unanswerable. Mr. Webster also spoke of his whole conduct of the negotiations with Portugal in terms of which the Hon. Henry Clay characterized as "bordering even on extravagance."

On his return from Europe in 1850 Mr. Clay retired to private life, settling in St. Louis in 1851. In 1853, after his father's death, he returned and in accordance with his father's desire purchased the Ashland estate, taking up his residence there and soon becoming engrossed in its improvement.

He made his first appearance as a public speaker in the political struggle of 1855 between the democrats and the newly organized know nothing party. In 1856 he and other leading whigs tried to revive the old whig party. But the whig party was dead, and regarding the democratic party as the only one truly representative of national interests Mr. Clay espoused the cause of Mr. Buchanan and made speeches in Kentucky, Indiana and Pennsylvania during the campaign. The impartial press of the country said that he did more to elect Buchanan than any other man, and the President himself recognized his debt to Mr. Clay, and in appreciation tendered him the Mission to Berlin, which was declined.

In 1857 Mr. Clay made the race for Congress against Roger Hanson, the greatest debater, the most effective speaker in the state, and the idol of the know nothing party. His election after an exciting campaign Mr. Clay regarded as the greatest triumph of his life, and the victory was celebrated by the democrats from one end of the Union to the other. Referring to this campaign a noted writer said: "Mr. Clay had much of his father's ability to inspire his friends with devotion and ardor, much of that father's pride, all of that father's courage."

During 1861 Mr. Clay was a delegate to the Peace Congress held at Washington City to consider and if practical agree upon some plan of adjusting the differences between the North and South. This was a service in entire accordance with his own and his father's principles, for both had struggled earnestly to stay the fanaticism which they foresaw could result in nothing else than civil war.

At the very beginning of the war Mr. Clay determined to go south, but betrayed by a guide he was apprehended by home guards in one of the mountain districts and conveyed to Camp Dick Robinson, where he was brutally treated by the soldiers and his life imperiled. At Louisville a warrant from the Civil Court took him out of the hands of the Military, and at the sitting of the court no evidence being found to sustain the charge the Grand Jury refused to find an indictment. He was at that time a victim of tuberculosis, was confined to his bed most of the time, but after Bragg's invasion of Kentucky he went south, first to Havana, subsequently to Halifax, and during the summer of 1863 reached Montreal, where on January 26, 1864, he died an exile.

James Brown Clay married Susan Maria Jacob, and they were the parents of ten children: Lucy J., who died at the age of nineteen; James Brown, Jr.; John C., who was born in 1847 and died in 1872; Henry; Lucretia Hart; Capt. Thomas Jacob; Susan J., born January 12, 1855, and died September 15, 1863; Charles Donald; George Hudson; and Nathaniel H., who died in infancy.

SUSAN M. J. CLAY, eldest daughter and child of John I. Jacob and his second wife, Lucy Donald Robertson, was born January 17, 1823, at Louisville, Kentucky. She attended school in Louisville until she was fifteen years of age, and was then taken by her father to Staten Island, New York, and placed in the school of two accomplished ladies from Edinburgh, Scotland, Mrs. Inglis and her daughter, Mrs. Macloed. Here "all the modern languages were taught—music on the harp, pianoforte and guitar—together with those things which make up the solid part of an English education." The young girl remained here for two years, and a number of letters written by her to relations in Louisville give an interesting account of the school life of a young girl in the years long past—1838 and 1839. Returning home, she remained in Louisville until her marriage to James Brown Clay, of Lexington, Kentucky, October 12, 1843. It would be impossible in a sketch such as this to even touch upon her life as a wife and the mother of ten children. The early years of her married life were spent at Ashland, and no daughter ever loved and idolized a father and mother more than she did her husband's parents. In 1849 she accompanied her husband to Lisbon, Portugal, and her life as the wife of the American minister was described in many interesting letters to friends at home. In one of them, written to her father-in-law, Henry Clay, February 2, 1850, she tells of her audience with the Queen. After describing the rooms through which she passed, the appearance and costume of the Queen, and her own beautiful costume, etc., she says: "This was the first time I had been out in Lisbon, and I received a great deal of attention, and have since heard that the Queen complimented my appearance very highly." Though fond of the society of her friends, she was eminently a domestic woman, and found her greatest happiness in the home circle with her husband and children. It would be impossible in so limited a space to give an account of her life in St. Louis, where they resided for a year or two; of her life at Ashland and Washington City; of her sad sojourn in Canada, where she joined her husband who was dying in exile; of her residence for a few years in Louisville; and her life at her country home Balgowan, near Lexington, where she spent the residue of her life—from 1884 to the time of her death, February 25, 1905.

And now we will say something about the ancestry of this wonderful woman. From her antecedents, rearing and associations it can be seen that there could have been nothing common-place about her. Her father, John I. Jacob, of Louisville, Kentucky, was born October 20, 1778, in the city of Baltimore, Maryland. He was descended from John Jacob (his great-great grandfather) who immigrated from England and settled in Anne Arundel County, Maryland, in 1665. The immigrant, John, acquired large tracts of land and became a tobacco planter. His will and that of his son John are now on file at Annapolis. "John I. Jacob moved to Louisville about the year 1800, and invested largely in real estate in and about the city, which rapidly increased in value and in a few years made him a very rich man. He was Louisville's first millionaire, and one of its most public spirited and highly respected citizens. His own and his wife's benefactions to both public and private charities were large and constant, but always without parade or ostentation. For many years Mr. Jacob was president of the Branch Bank of the United States at Louisville. He was also one of the founders and the president of the Bank of Kentucky, which is still the most important financial institution in the state. And he was the first president of the first railroad in Kentucky—that between Frankfort and Lexington. He died April 1, 1852. The Jacob family is one of the oldest in England. "They were King's Thanes (Thane Regis) holding their privileges and distinctions directly from the king. The one who filled the office at the time of the Conquest had been Thane under Edward the Confessor, as his ancestors had been under previous Saxon kings. Some individuals of this old family had titles, and mention is made of those who have become known to the public as writers, as lawyers, as scientists, as officers in the British Army, and theologians. A member of the family in America, was the first Secretary of the Society of Cincinnati, organized in the time of Washington."

John I. Jacob (Mrs. Clay's father) married Lucy Robertson, a daughter of Isaac Robertson and his wife, Matilda Taylor, daughter of Commodore Richard Taylor, late of the Virginia Revolutionary Navy. Isaac Robertson, a lawyer by profession, was descended from the "Clan Donachie" (Robertson) which traces its lineage to the ancient Earls of Atholl, whose progenitor was Duncan, King of Scotland. Skene, the learned historian, says, "The Robertsons are unquestionably one of the oldest and most eminent families in Scotland, being the sole remaining branch of the royal house which occupied the throne during the eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and from which they can easily trace their descent." Mrs. Clay's great-great-grandfather, Charles Robertson, "took part in the ill-fated battle of Culloden, and was among those whose estates were thereafter confiscated by the crown." His second son, Donald Robertson, having despaired of advancement on account of political conditions, determined to try his fortunes in the new world. The record made by himself in his Latin Bible shows that he arrived in, or rather saw, Virginia (prospexit Virginiam) on March 29, 1753. The education and training acquired by him under the best instructors of his time at Aberdeen and Edinburgh were of inestimable value to him in the Colony of Virginia. Institutions of learning in America were scarce, and so he established an academy and boarding school in Drysdale Parish in King and Queen County. Owing to the scarcity of text books he was obliged to prepare those used by his pupils. One of these, in his own hand-writing, is now in possession of one of his descendants. "The chirography is beautiful, and the contents prove that his knowledge of rhetoric, history, literature and the Latin language was accurate and profound." Among his pupils were James Madison, fourth president of the United States, and George Rogers Clark, the famous pioneer and "Conqueror of the Northwest." Some years after the death of his first wife (by whom he had no children) Donald Robertson married Rachel Rogers, youngest child of John Rogers of King and Queen County, Virginia. Her sister, Ann Rogers, was the mother of George Rogers Clark, and another distinguished member of the family was Maj. George Croghan, the youthful "hero of Fort Stephenson," who was a nephew of George Rogers Clark. Giles Rogers, the grandfather of Rachel Rogers, immigrated from Worcestershire, England, to Virginia in the year 1686. One of his descendants, the late Judge Joseph Rogers Underwood, United States Senator, and an intimate friend and colleague of Henry Clay, "spent considerable time and money in endeavoring to trace the antecedents of Giles Rogers, and for this purpose employed the College of Heraldry at London to prosecute the investigation. Enough information was discovered to warrant the claim that he was descended from the great reformer John Rogers, 'the Martyr' who was burned at the stake in Smithfield February 4, 1555, by order of 'Bloody Mary.' In token of Judge Underwood's descent from an ecclesiastical ancestor who suffered martyrdom the College authorized him to add a crossed crosslet to the family arms.*

Mrs. Clay was connected by ties of blood with many whose names have shed lustre upon the history of this country, and for this reason a sketch of her would not be complete without some mention of them.

Her grandfather, Isaac Robertson, as already stated, married Matilda Taylor, a daughter of Commodore Richard Taylor, an officer in the Revolutionary Navy, and after the close of the war was placed in command of the Virginia Navy. James Taylor, the first of the family in America, immigrated from Carlisle, England, to Virginia, between the years 1650-1667. The exact date is not known. Among his descendants are the names of many of the most prominent men that the country has produced—Edmund Pendleton, the celebrated patriot and chancellor; Col. John Taylor of Carolina County, U. S. Senator, and one of Virginia's most noted men; John Penn, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence; President James Madison; Col. George Taylor, whose ten sons were officers in the Revolutionary War; President Monroe, President Zachary Taylor and others.

The Lexington Herald of February 26th and 28th, 1905, had this to say of Mrs. Clay, just after her death: "Our links with the past are breaking and more and more the Kentucky of today is becoming separated from the Kentucky of splendid history. So long as Mrs. James Clay lived it was impossible for those who came within the circle of her acquaintance to lose all the inspiration of the past. She was a link with that day and this; with an active interest in the life of today, with a quick sympathy for every worthy act and progressive movement, she combined so lively a remembrance of a noble past, so true an enthusiasm for the high qualities of that time, that it was impossible to come in contact with her, even briefly, without imbuing both knowledge and inspiration. Mrs. Clay, who was a Miss Jacob of Louisville, married James B. Clay, the son of Henry Clay, and for many years of her married life lived at Ashland. She became not only the loved and loving daughter of the great statesman, but his friend and helper. Sometimes she wrote out his speeches for him—for that was before the time of stenographers and the typewriter. She knew and sympathized with his political aspirations and plans. In hearing Mrs. Clay speak of the great statesman, of the beauty of his home relations, of the tenderness and affection of the man, of the calmness and dignity, the complete self-control and philosophy with which he received the news of political reverse, of wrecked plans and disappointed confidence, we have been reminded of those words of St. Paul to the Corinthians, 'Ye are our epistle written in our hearts, known and read often.' The statesman could have had no testimonial written in tables of stones so vivid, so convincing, as that written in the fleshly tables of the heart of her who spent the years of her young womanhood in close association with him. The insinuations of the calumniators of his own day, the petty fault-finding of later biographers who have searched eagerly for the mote in the great man's character, faded into insignificance before the direct testimony of the heart and mind of this eye-witness of his daily life. * * *

"Mrs. Clay's character stood the test of grief and adversity, of the loss of those whom she held dear, and of wealth, as it had stood the test of the favors of fortune, position, distinction, beauty and means; throughout she showed the same gentleness and dignity, the same tender affection, and the same quickness to resent injustice or corruption, that makes her loss great to those who knew her, not only as a loving friend, but as an example and inspiration.

"Her life was beautifully rich in memories. Born in 1823, taking an active part in the social events of Kentucky and Washington from 1845 to 1860, with a memory rarely excelled, and an acute, active, analytical intellect, had she been a man there is no eminence she might not have attained.

"It is the cause of profound regret that there is not a memoir of her and a history written by her. Such as she have made Kentucky's name honored where they were known."

Mrs. Clay was a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church from her early girlhood, and her faith in the Saviour of the world enabled her to bear with sublime courage and fortitude all the trials and vicissitudes of a long life.

CAPT. JAMES B. CLAY, oldest son of Hon. James B. Clay and grandson of Henry Clay, was born at Lexington January 27, 1846, and was educated at Lexington and Baltimore and at the age of fifteen joined a company of cavalry in the Kentucky State Guard. In the summer of 1862 he joined the Confederate army and was attached to the staff of Gen. Kirby Smith, and after Bragg retired from Kentucky was transferred to the staff of Maj. Gen. John C. Breckinridge at Knoxville. He was with General Johnston's Command in some of the operations around Vicksburg, conducted himself with remarkable distinction in the battle of Chickamauga, and in November, 1863, ran the blockade to visit his father on his deathbed at Montreal. In April, 1864, he rejoined General Breckinridge in Virginia and was in the battle of Winchester and Monocacy. After Lee's surrender he again joined the personal staff of General Breckinridge, who in the meantime had become secretary of war and accompanied the Confederate Government south to Georgia and was captured near Macon that state. "From the time he rode out of the gate of his father's home, the historic Ashland, until the time he returned to his widowed mother, bringing back to her the honors he had won in battling for the noblest cause for which a brave people ever fought and suffered, he had borne himself in manner worthy of his name and his young Kentucky manhood. Though generally known as Captain Clay, his official rank at the close of the war was that of lieutenant and aide de camp. He was one of the four grandsons of Henry Clay in the Confederate army, the others being Thomas Clay, son of Colonel Henry, Henry B., oldest son of Thomas H. Clay, and Eugene Irwin.

In later years Captain Clay was elected brigadier-general commanding a division of the Confederate Veterans Association of Kentucky. For many years he devoted himself to the ancestral occupation of farming and planting in Fayette County, and his name became widely known among thoroughbred breeders. He died in 1906. His wife was Eliza Ingles.

HENRY CLAY, third son and fourth child of Hon. James Brown Clay, was best known in his generation as "Harry" Clay.

He was born November 17, 1849, at Lisbon, Portugal, while his father was charge d'affaires to that country. He was educated by private tutors at Ashland, accompanied his mother to Montreal in 1863, where he attended briefly McGill College and subsequently he and his brother, John, entered Upper Canada College at Toronto. In 1866 they entered Washington and Lee University at Lexington, Virginia, where they came under the direction and guidance of Gen. Robert E. Lee, president of the college. After a tour abroad, Harry Clay in June, 1870, rejoined his mother at Louisville and began the study of law. He soon left Kentucky to join his brother, John, who had bought a California ranch, and after receiving his diploma at the law school began practice at San Francisco. His beloved brother died September 15, 1872, and the young lawyer then closed his San Francisco office and moved to Denver, and a year or so later returned to Kentucky and took his place at the bar of Louisville.

Then, in May, 1880, he surprised his friends by announcing his determination to join the Howgate Arctic Expedition, having been appointed aide to the commanding officer. A brief account of this experience and adventure is found in the columns of a local paper: This brave son of Fayette County, who resigned an honorable and lucrative office in Louisville to join an expedition in the Arctic regions in the interest of science and humanity, returned home by way of New York a few days ago. The ship (Gulnare) on which Mr. Clay embarked penetrated the frozen regions until destruction or retreat were the alternatives presented. While the rest of the expedition retreated south, Mr. Clay and Dr. Octave Pavy (a Frenchman by birth), the talented naturalist and surgeon of the Howgate Expedition, remained in Greenland to await the return of their comrades, and for fifteen months were the only Americans in that inhospitable clime. When General Greely stopped at Disco Island, Greenland, en route to Lady Franklin Bay, Mr. Clay and Doctor Pavy joined them. The latter remained with the expedition, but Mr. Clay tendered his resignation to General Greely, and returned to the United States on the vessel which had carried them to the far north. In resigning he showed the nobleness of his nature. While in Greenland some disagreement had arisen between him and Doctor Pavy, and knowing that it would be detrimental to the welfare of the enterprise if any discord existed between the members of the expedition, who necessarily would be thrown constantly together, he determined to return to the United States rather than throw any obstacles in the way of the success of the undertaking. He knew that the services of Doctor Pavy—the surgeon of the expedition—were indispensable, and therefore he listened to the call of duty rather than inclination, as most men would have done, and turned his face southward.

It would be impossible in an article such as this to give an account of Mr. Clay's experience in the north. During his sojourn in Greenland, and on the voyage to Lady Franklin Bay, the young Kentuckian acquired a great deal of knowledge respecting the Arctic regions, and in his diary he noted many interesting and valuable facts relating to the Danes and Esquimaux of Greenland, the fauna and flora, the climate, etc., of that little known land within the Arctic Circle which he called "a land of enchantment." Though we cannot even touch upon these subjects in a space so limited, some mention must be made of his efforts to save his former companions from starvation. Knowing that grave fears were entertained in some quarters for the safety of General Greely and his party at Fort Conger, on the northern shore of Lady Franklin Bay, and that the plan of relief proposed by the Government would, according to his judgment, result in disaster, he, under date of May 12, 1883, wrote a long and earnest protest against the plan adopted by the Government for the relief of General Greely, showing the impracticability or uselessness of landing provisions at Life-boat Cove. He ended this protest with the words, "I can do no more. I have told the truth and sounded my note of warning. If these men at Fort Conger are lost, let the responsibility rest upon those who have their safety in charge."

The following letter from Sergeant Brainard, who with Lieutenant Lockwood reached the highest northern latitude ever trod by the foot of man up to that time, shows Henry Clay's advice to have been sound and prophetic. Writing from the Navy Yard, Portsmouth, New Hampshire, August 11, 1884, he says:

"Mr. Henry Clay, Louisville, Kentucky, Dear Sir: In behalf of the few of my comrades now living, and the many who struggled so bravely for life, but had finally to succumb to starvation, I desire most earnestly to thank you for the kind letter of May, 1883, written in our interests and published in the Courier-Journal. The advice was sound, practical, and as it seemed to us then, and afterwards transpired, prophetic. With our own views of what was required for our safety it coincided perfectly. It was found in the Proteous wreck cache, landed by Lieutenant Garlington near Cape Sabine (he had received orders to leave a few rations at this place) and was read and re-read in the gloom and darkness of our miserable hovel. In appreciation of your noble efforts to succor your former Arctic comrades, the camp in which we were then located received your name. I am, very respectfully, D. L. Brainard."

The New York Evening Post, commenting on the charge of cannibalism brought against the members of the Greely Expedition, said: "It is only distracting public attention from the main issue, which is Hazen's and Chandler's responsibility, not for acts of cannibalism, but for the failure of the former expedition, and for the lives of the unfortunate men belonging to it. Had the advice of Henry Clay, son of the late James B. Clay, been adopted, not a life would have been lost. After fifteen months' sojourn in the Arctic regions this accomplished gentleman, of whom Kentucky may well be proud, spoke in no uncertain terms of the folly of the plan proposed by the Government, and he urged that the landing be made on the west side of Smith's Sound. Greely and his men reached the point designated by Clay without the loss of a man, and met their fate by starvation and not the rigors of the Arctic region."

After his return from the Arctic region Henry Clay resumed the practice of the law. In 1883, urged by his friends, he became a candidate for the Legislature. Of his candidacy the Courier-Journal had this to say: "Mr. Henry Clay is a young man of fine ability, both as a lawyer and a debater, and his talents and character are such as will win him a high place in our State Legislature. No man is braver, firmer or more honorable. With his experience and knowledge of our local affairs he will ably represent us, and, mark the prediction, the great name of Clay which has slept since the death of his father some twenty years ago will again rise in Kentucky politics. We wish him all success." Henry Clay was defeated—how could it have been otherwise when he had the strong combination of the mayor of the city and all the machinery of the city government with an unlimited amount of money against him? Though defeated for the Legislature, he gained rather than lost prestige by it. His eloquence as a speaker, and his dignified, manly course gained the respect, indeed admiration, of the highest and best men in the community. He was already spoken of for a higher position, and had he lived would doubtless have made a great name for himself.

He died on the 22nd of September, 1884. The devotion and admiration of his lawyer friends and the people of Louisville generally were expressed in the eulogies pronounced upon him by the different members of the Louisville bar. All united in paying tribute to his memory, feeling that it was their right and privilege to bear witness to the noble qualities of the young Kentuckian who was, as Gen. Basil Duke expressed it, "the very incarnation of stainless integrity and romantic honor."

LUCRETIA HART CLAY, fifth child of Hon. James Brown Clay, has many distinctions apart from her family relationship. She has been a scholar and student, is widely traveled, and exemplifies some of the best traditions of our old American culture. She was born at the old Ashland estate in 1851. Miss Clay for many years has been a devout member of the Episcopal Church, the church of her mother. For the past fifteen years she has devoted a great deal of time to an intensive study of the Bible and has recently finished the manuscript for a book entitled "Art Thou the Christ, Art Thou He That Cometh or Look Ye for Another?"

Miss Clay perhaps more than any other member of her family has carefully collected and preserved the great volume of written and traditional material concerning the life and career of her illustrious grandfather, Henry Clay, also of her father and other prominent members of the family. Her collections include many letters, embracing part of the correspondence between Henry Clay and his eminent contemporaries, and she has letters written by Washington, Daniel Boone, Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson. Her home is also adorned by oil portraits of Henry Clay and her father and other members of the family.

Miss Clay has long been prominent in the Daughters of the American Revolution, served two terms as senior regent, one term as state regent, and now is vice president. She was appointed chairman of the Woman's National War Relief Association and organized the Auxiliary Chapter at Lexington during the Spanish-American war. She is also a member of the Humane Society and the Filson Club of Louisville. Her life has been a busy one, associated with organizations for practical welfare work, though she regards herself as an old-fashioned woman and has never participated in some of the modern activities of her sex.

CAPT. THOMAS JACOB CLAY is the sixth child of Hon. James Brown Clay and was born at historic Ashland, April 5, 1853. He was educated in the schools of Montreal, Canada, at Northampton, Massachusetts, and in 1873 graduated in medicine from the Louisville Medical College. For about 2½ years he was engaged in practice at St. Louis, and was then appointed a second lieutenant in the Tenth Infantry Regiment of the United States Army by President Rutherford B. Hayes. Lieutenant Clay was with the regular army nearly twenty years and in a period marked by many Indian wars in the West. His services took him to Texas, Arizona and New Mexico, and he served with Major General Lawton during the campaign against the great leader of the Apaches, Geronimo. Being an expert shot, he was detailed as inspector of small arms practice on the staff of Gen. Nelson Miles in Arizona, also with Gen. Alexander McDowell McCook in California, subsequently commanded an Indian company at Fort Bowie, Arizona, was a post agent in Oklahoma, and for a time was with his command in Chicago in 1893. Finally, on account of ill health and disability, he was relieved from active service in 1894, and on leaving the army returned to Kentucky and for a quarter of a century has been associated with his brother, George H., as proprietors of the Balgowan Stock Farm, five miles from Lexington on the Versailles Pike. Balgowan Stock Farm has produced some of the greatest thoroughbreds in Kentucky history.

LIEUT.-COL. CHARLES D. CLAY, whose place in the Clay family history is as the eighth child of Hon. James Brown Clay, and one of the grandsons of Henry Clay, is now living in quiet retirement at his country place four miles west of Lexington on the Versailles Pike.

Lieut.-Col. Charles D. Clay gave many of the active years of his life to the service of his country in the army. He spent some of his youth at historic Ashland and at Louisville, was educated at Racine College in Wisconsin, and as a young man received an appointment as second lieutenant of the Seventeenth Regiment of the United States Regular Army. He saw active service in the West and later graduated from the Infantry and Cavalry School at Fort Leavenworth. During the Spanish-American war he was in Cuba and took part in the battle of El Caney and was recommended for a brevet for bravery. From there he was sent to the Philippines and served as adjutant general on the staff of Gen. Robert H. Hall. He was desperately wounded in one of the battles with the Filipino insurgents and returned home with special recommendations for his courage and bravery. On account of these wounds he was placed on the retired list, but during the World war he volunteered in the Quartermaster's Department and again rendered efficient service to his country at various points. In September, 1897, Lieutenant-Colonel Clay married Miss Maria H. Pepper, a daughter of Col. R. P. Pepper, of Frankfort, Kentucky. They are the parents of four children: Susan Jacob Clay, Charles D., Jr., Robert P., and Elizabeth S. Charles D. is a second lieutenant in the regular army, and Robert P. entered West Point Academy in 1921.

GEORGE HUDSON CLAY is the ninth and youngest surviving child of Hon. James Brown Clay, and is mentioned here to complete this account of the Clay family.

Mr. Clay has earned real distinction as a breeder of thoroughbred horses and is one of the oldest men still active in that industry in Kentucky. He became associated with his brother, Capt. Thomas J. Clay, in the ownership of the great Balgowan Farm, five miles from Lexington on Versailles Pike. Mr. Clay acquired a liberal education and studied law, but never practiced, and his life has been devoted to his stock farm and the duties of good citizenship.

The following article concerning the Balgowan Stock Farm is taken from an issue of The Lexington Herald, dated April 13, 1917:

The Balgowan Stud, the property of Capt. Thomas J. Clay and his brother, George H. Clay, came into existence in 1882, at which time the younger brother began his operations as a producer of thoroughbred race horses. The first purchase was the chestnut filly Modesty by War Dance, out of Ballet by Planet, afterward one of the most famous matrons in America. Modesty won the Ladies' Stakes at Louisville and was then sold to Edward Corrigan, in whose ownership she won at three, the American Derby, the inaugural of that event, and the only filly in the history of that race to capture the rich prize. Following Modesty came many stake winners from the daughter of Planet, including Peg Woffington, winner of the September Stakes at 1¼ miles, and afterward a noted brood mare in the Ashland stud and the dam of Bracegirdle, David Garrick, winner of the Chester Cup in England, The Manager and several other high class race horses.

From Balgowan came Elizabeth L., winner of the Produce Stakes of a value of $18,000; Busted, winner of thirteen races; The Chevelier, which accounted for the Phoenix Hotel Stakes; Hypocrite, winner of twenty-four races and later the dam of the flying filly Admiration; Zolring, winner of the Flash Stakes; Sumo, the first horse to run a mile as fast as 1:41 over the old course at St. Louis in the Street Railway Stakes, which he won; Bugler, winner of the Mound City Derby at the same place; John Smulski, the best two-year-old in the West during his year; Cock o' the Walk, winner of the Saratoga Handicap and the crack of the three-year-olds of his season; Chalmers, now racing and a stake winner, as well as one of the fastest horses in training.

This list does not include all the high class horses sent forth from Balgowan, a breeding establishment that has played an important part in the production and development of the American thoroughbred, nor can a complete history be written at this time of the sterling race horses bred by the present owners of the stud individually or as a firm. George H. Clay has been actively engaged in the production of the blood horse since 1882, and is in point of years one of the oldest breeders living, thirty-five years having passed since he first became interested in the sport of racing and the industry of breeding the thoroughbreds. The stud at Balgowan has always been small but very select, and with a very few mares has sent forth a greater number of winners of real merit than many others conducted on a more elaborate scale.

Ballet, the famous daughter of Planet, and Baloon by Yorkshire, founded a family quite the equal to any in the American Stud Book, and one from which have come many of the greatest race horses ever seen on the turf in this country. The only two mares to win the two most important events to three-year-olds in this country, the American and Kentucky Derbies, came from the noted matron, Modesty, the winner of the first named event, and her great-granddaughter, Regret, which captured the Kentucky Classic. Other mares at Balgowan to gain fame through the performances of their produce have been Miss Haverly, by Waverly, dam of The Chevelier, winner of the Phoenix Hotel Stakes; Ellengowan by Imp, De Beauvoir, dam of Cock o' the Walk, winner of the Saratoga Stakes; Lady Longfellow by Longfellow out of Ballet, dam of several winners, and Lady Hope by Imp. Deceiver.

The elder of the two owners of Balgowan, Capt. Thomas J. Clay, a retired army officer, and one who has seen many years of active service, is a racing official of ability, whose character, standing and knowledge of the rules have made him sought after by the leading associations both in the East and West. He presides at the meetings of the Kentucky Association, the oldest in this country, where his presence is a guarantee for fair play and strict discipline. It was in his colors that the then two-year-old Balgowan won the rich Hyde Park Stakes at Washington Park, about which the courts were asked to decide the award of first money, and which suit was won by Balgowan's owner. He was at the time on duty in the far West, where he had been in command of troops in quelling the Indian uprisings that were so frequent in those days, and missed seeing his gallant colt gallop away from his field. Both the Clay brothers are sportsmen of the highest type, breeders with rare knowledge of blood lines, practical horsemen and imbued with the highest ideals of fair dealing and good sportsmanship.

WALTER NEWMAN HALDEMAN. While the personality of its great editor, Henry Watterson, is so closely associated in the popular mind with the Courier-Journal the credit for making it a great business institution as well as a great newspaper primarily belongs to its founder, Walter Newman Haldeman, who up to the time of his death in 1902, was its principal owner, had entire control of its business interests, and who associated with him Mr. Watterson as editor.

The Haldeman family, which has had so conspicuous a part in Kentucky affairs, originated in Switzerland, where Honus Haldeman or Haldiman lived until 1727, and in that year established his home in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, where he lived out his life. His son, Jacob Haldeman, was born at Neufchatel, Switzerland, October 7, 1722, and died in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, February 2, 1783. His son, Jacob Haldeman, Jr., was born in Lancaster County August 14, 1747, married Elizabeth Muselman, and they spent their last years in Virginia.

Representing the fourth generation of the family in America and the first Kentuckian of the name was John Haldeman, who was born in Lancaster County October 5, 1771. More than a century ago he came to Kentucky, lived at Maysville in Mason County, and in 1837 moved to Louisville, where he continued in business until his death, January 19, 1844. John Haldeman married Elizabeth Newman, who was born near Point Pleasant, Virginia, January 7, 1790, and died December 25, 1874. Her father, Walter Newman, was a Virginia soldier in the Revolution and finally removed from the Virginia side of the Ohio River to Newark, Ohio, where he died in 1840.

Walter Newman Haldeman, who received the name of his maternal grandfather, was born at Maysville, Kentucky, April 27, 1821, and died May 13, 1902, at the age of eighty-one. As a boy he attended for a time an academy at Maysville, where one of his fellow students was Ulysses S. Grant. Soon after the family moved to Louisville he began earning his living in a grocery and provision house. In 1840, when he was nineteen years of age, he began an association with the old Louisville Journal, a paper that had been founded in 1830 and in point of time is the original constituent part of the present Courier-Journal. While with the Journal Walter N. Haldeman acquired a general knowledge of the newspaper business. He left the Journal to open a modest book and periodical business on Fourth Street, conducting at the same time a circulating library. While in this business in 1844 he bought the Daily Dime, a newspaper established the preceding year by some practical printers. He changed its name to the Daily Courier, and devoted his entire time and management to its affairs. He overcame successive financial and other obstacles, and after a long uphill fight placed the as one of the most influential and successful daily papers in Kentucky. In 1859 the business was re-organized and incorporated as the Louisville Courier Printing Company, with Mr. Haldeman as president and principal owner. The Courier was thoroughly southern in its sympathies, and was suppressed by the Federal authorities soon after the Civil war. Mr. Haldeman at once sought refuge within the Confederate lines, and two months after the suspension of the paper at Louisville published the Courier at Nashville, Tennessee, until that city was taken by the Federal forces.

At the close of the war he returned to Louisville and resumed publication of the Courier. In 1868 was consummated the consolidation of the Daily Courier with the Daily Journal, so that the joint title of Courier-Journal is now more than half a century old. At this time also Henry Watterson became associated with Mr. Haldeman as the editor of the Courier-Journal. By taking over the Daily Democrat the Courier-Journal became the only morning paper in Louisville. Of its growing prestige and success, eventually ranking it as one of the few great and really representative American newspapers, nothing need be said here. Walter N. Haldeman continued to be actively in charge of the management of the Courier-Journal and was president of the company until the accident which caused his death, and thus attained an oft-expressed wish to "die in the harness." Mr. Haldeman in 1884 also established the Louisville Evening Times, and he carried heavy burdens of business management during the period while this paper was struggling for the leadership and prestige attained by it as an evening daily.

Walter Newman Haldeman was one of the truest exponents of the old time Democracy in politics. He was a leader in the Southern Presbyterian Church, and his financial aid largely provided the first home of the Southern Presbyterian Theological Seminary in Louisville, a service subsequently recognized by Haldeman Hall, one of the buildings of that institution.

October 30, 1844, Mr. Haldeman married Miss Elizabeth Metcalf, who was born at Cincinnati March 27, 1827, daughter of William Metcalf. She died January 20, 1908. They were the parents of seven children, two of whom died in infancy. One son, John A. Haldeman, was for years business manager of the Louisville Evening Times and died in 1901. The two surviving sons are Gen. William B. and Bruce Haldeman, and there is one daughter, Isabelle.

A son, Bruce Haldeman, was born at Knoxville, Tennessee, November 5, 1862, joined the staff of the Louisville Courier-Journal and Louisville Times in 1885, and served it as reporter and managing editor until 1895. After his father's death he was made president of the Louisville Courier Journal Company and the Louisville Times Company, and served in that capacity until 1917 when he was succeeded as president of these companies by Henry Watterson. He was president of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association from 1910 to 1918. Bruce Haldeman married Annie Ford Milton, of Louisville.

GEN. WILLIAM BIRCH HALDEMAN, former editor-in-chief of the Louisville Times, began his newspaper work in Louisville under his father, the late Walter Newman Haldeman, soon after his return from his duties in the field as a Confederate soldier. Kentucky has a grateful appreciation of General Haldeman's many and varied services in fields outside of journalism.

He was born at Louisville July 27, 1846, and up to the age of fifteen attended public and private schools in that city and was in Forest Academy at O'Bannon, Kentucky, when the war broke out. Without permission he left school, made his way inside the Confederate lines, and while too young to enlist performed in a large measure the duties of a soldier and in the early part of 1862 served for a brief time in the command of General John Morgan in Tennessee. In October of that year he was intrusted with important dispatches and sent by Gen. John C. Breckenridge from Tullahoma, Tennessee, to General Bragg at Lexington, Kentucky. He performed his dangerous duty with complete success. He was finally regularly enlisted during the winter of 1862-63 as a private in Company G, Ninth Kentucky Infantry, a part of the famous Orphan Brigade. He was with that command until the spring of 1864, when he was appointed midshipman in the Confederate States Navy. He was on the school ship Patrick Henry and was transferred from that ship to the land forces in defense of Bermuda Hundred in repulsing the attack of General Butler in August, 1864. He soon afterward left the navy and rejoined the Orphan Brigade at Aiken, South Carolina, and was in service until its surrender and was paroled with the Ninth Kentucky Regiment at Washington, Georgia, in May, 1865.

General Haldeman is one of the youngest of the surviving veterans of the great conflict. He has been closely identified with the Confederate Veterans organization and in August, 1910, General Gordon appointed him commander of the Kentucky Division of the United Confederate Veterans Association with the rank of major general, to which position he was subsequently elected each year, serving as such until 1913. September 8, 1913, he was elected commander for life of the Orphan Brigade, Confederate States of America, and at once resigned as commander of the Kentucky Division. He succeeded Gen. Bennett H. Young as commander of the Kentucky Division and in 1919, upon the death of General Young, he was elected president of the Jefferson Davis Home Association. General Haldeman has also taken an active part in state military affairs, and from April, 1906, until July, 1909, served as colonel of the First Regiment Infantry, Kentucky National Guard, and during 1911-12 served as adjutant general of Kentucky.

While he did newspaper work for his father after the war General Haldeman also continued his higher education, and in 1869 graduated A. B. from the Kentucky Military Institute near Frankfort, and in 1871 received the Master of Arts degree from that institution. He has filled nearly every position on the Courier Journal, and in 1875 became editor and general manager of the weekly edition of the Courier-Journal. In 1885 he was made general manager of the Courier-Journal and the Louisville Evening Times, and in April, 1902, became editor-in-chief of the Louisville Times.

He retired from this office August 6, 1918, when he sold his interests.

General Haldeman has long been an influential figure in the democratic party of Kentucky. From 1884 to 1890 he was a member of the State Central Committee, and was a delegate from the Fifth Congressional District to the National Conventions of 1892, 1896, 1912, and a delegate at large from the state to the conventions of 1904 and 1908. From 1916 until April 21, 1920, he was also national committeeman of the party, resigning that post on account of ill health. For a number of years he had spent his winters at his home at Naples in Lee County, Florida. General Haldeman was elected president of the Kentucky Press Association in 1910, is a member of the Board of Visitors of the Kentucky Military Institute and a member of the Presbyterian Church.

November 30, 1876, he married Miss Lizzie Robards Offutt, daughter of Henry Y. and Clara F. Offutt of Shelbyville, Kentucky. Of their five children two died in infancy, and the three to grow up were: Clara Bruce, wife of J. Frazier Bonnie, of Louisville; Anne, wife of Lieut. Col. Frank K. Espenhain; and Lizzie Offutt, who died at Paris, France, June 6, 1909.

JOHN AVERY HALDEMAN was one of the three brothers whose careers have been so intimately and prominently associated with Louisville journalism, and was a son of the distinguished publisher Walter N. Haldeman. The family history of the Haldemans is fully told on other pages of this publication.

John Avery Haldeman was born at Pewee Valley, Oldham County, Kentucky, December 2, 1855, and died when in the very prime of his powers and usefulness September 17, 1899. He was educated at Washington and Lee University in Virginia, and while there took an active part in athletics, which he continued for many years in Louisville. In 1887 he became associated with his father as business manager of the Louisville Times. It was under and a direct proof of his capable management that the Louisville Times became one of the most successful evening papers of the South.

On September 7, 1887, Mr. Haldeman married Anna Buchanan. She was born at Crab Orchard, Kentucky, a daughter of John and Jane Buchanan, her mother was a native of Lincoln County. Through her mother Mrs. Haldeman is a great-great-granddaughter of Col. William Whitley, who constructed the first brick house in Kentucky, when Kentucky was still a part of Virginia. William Whitley was a Virginian by birth and a Revolutionary soldier. He was a Colonel in the American army in the war with England 1812-1815 notwithstanding his advanced age and was killed in the battle of the Thames while leading the famous Forlorn Hope charge. John Buchanan's ancestors came from Scotland and settled in Vermont where he lived for a time and then moved to Lincoln County, Kentucky, where he was a prominent business man and farmer. He died at the age of eighty-one, and was a member of the Scotch Presbyterian Church and a staunch and life long Democrat. Mrs. Haldeman is the mother of three daughters: Jean Bruce Haldeman, now Mrs. George R. Wendling, Jr., of St. Louis, Bessie Avery Haldeman and Isabel Brown Haldeman.

HENRY WATTERSON. To present a formal biography of Henry Watterson would add no value to a publication the greater part of whose readers know the outstanding counts in his career as perhaps they know the life of no other public American. It is a real service therefore, one properly appreciated by publishers and editor of this history, that Arthur Krock, editor of the Louisville Times and former Washington correspondent and managing editor of the Courier-Journal, has prepared and contributed the article that follows:

Since newspaper making has become a great corporate business, the size of editors' influence has diminished. Therefore, there will be no more Gradys and Danas and Greeleys and Wattersons, at least for a long while. The new type—the Pulitzers and Bennetts and Ochses—are the successors of the editors; the publishers have edged the writers out of the sphere of great achievements.

This is a natural result, and, on the whole, a desirable one. A newspaper is property, like a mine or an acre, although unlike property it is somewhat impersonal in that it belongs to the public as much as to the publisher. All useful and successful newspapers adopt this viewpoint and feel and discharge a public responsibility to be patriotic as strongly as a private responsibility to be profitable.

In another day the newspaper was a four or eight-sheet publication, devoted almost solely to furthering the political, social and commercial ideas of its editor. If he was a great and good man, his paper was a power for good. If he was a small and selfish man, his paper was a power for harm. None of them made any great sums of money. The annual millions cleared by newspapers like The New York World and The Chicago Tribune were as unknown as six-cylinder automobiles.

Now the newspaper is a large daily publication, designed to be both useful and profitable and reflecting more the ideas of its publisher than its editor. The publisher is more inclined than was the old-time editor to absorb the general views of his community and of a counselling group of staff men employed by him for their knowledge of general and specific conditions. It is not often that the publisher arbitrarily pursues a single personal idea because it is his own. In this way, while genius may be checked and personality may be more confined, and while editorial and news writing is more technical and responsible than brilliant, the modern newspaper is more readable, and indirect influence has been substituted for direct suasion.

To be vivid and interesting, the newspaper of today must be as surely reflective of a strong personality as the newspaper of the past. But this expression now takes the form more of activity in public matters than in literary accomplishments on the editorial page. For instance, The New York World's recent successful campaign for a disarmament conference is of more importance than any brilliant article or series Mr. Greeley ever wrote. The personality of the editor or publisher nowadays must live in the policies and news columns as well as on the editorial page.

Henry Watterson was the leading genius of the elder day. The Courier-Journal, like every other publication to which he put his virile hand, was the expression of his personality. But, being a genius with a sound head on his shoulders and great concepts of patriotism and public service, he managed to do the incredible thing of publishing a newspaper that possessed the virtues of both the old and the new school. It takes a genius to do this, and a good partner on the business end, and they are not harmoniously joined very often.

When he came to the editorship of the Courier-Journal in 1868, Mr. Watterson was fresh from the sorrow and sacrifice of the Confederate cause. At heart always a Union man, he went out with his people as was the Southern sentiment in those days. The war once ended, he set himself to binding up the wounds of the war which ran chiefly along the border marked in part by the State of Kentucky. Slavery to him was always abhorrent, and he proceeded at once to stamp out the lingering tendrils of the system that clung around the sentiment of the South. An appreciation of Abraham Lincoln he considered necessary to restoring a North-South entente, and he gave the best years and the best work of his life to that effort. The nationalization of the democratic party he believed to be vital to the success of the Republic; and in convention, in committee, on platform and on stump, as well as in his newspaper columns, he devoted himself to that cause.

In all of these things he was successful. A dominating personality, a great oratorical gift, an ability to write with music and with fire, all joined with a level head to accomplish the tasks of reconstruction. In averting worse evils than the South ever experienced—the fate of a conquered province—Henry Watterson played a greater part than any man in the United States. Through the darkness of Know-Nothing days, the fantasy of Free Silver, the nightmare of Government Ownership and the menace of the Roosevelt dynasty, Mr. Watterson followed his brilliant course. In every great issue that arose before the American people for over fifty years, his voice and his pen wielded more influence than nearly any other.

His greatest day came, however, with the bomb of Serajevo. After Austria presented her ultimatum to Serbia, and Russia and France and Germany mobilized, and Britain came into the arena like Herakles into Hades; at a time when the American world could not see any local connection with the conflict, Mr. Watterson sounded his battle cry. On September 3, 1914, when this nation merely thought of the war as Europe's great encounter, the editor of The Courier-Journal wrote and flew them at his masthead the words that eventually became the battle cry of the Allies and the United States: "TO HELL WITH THE HOHENZOLLERNS AND THE HAPSBURGS!"

From that moment until the war had ended, Mr. Watterson bombarded the military and imperial idea represented by the Kaiser until his own country had joined the defenders of democracy and had called prophet him whom in 1914 they considered a jingo.

The man who wrote his name in such flaming letters across the tablets of his time was born at Washington, February 16, 1840, the only son of Harvey Watterson, a congressman from Polk's district in Tennessee, and minister to the Argentine under Tyler and Polk; and Talitha (Black) Watterson. Henry Watterson's editorship was of "The Ciceronian," published at the Academy of the Diocese, in Philadelphia, where he went to school under the Rev. Dr. George Emlen Hare. At McMinnville, summer home of the family in Tennessee, his second venture, "The New Era," received wide attention in a national campaign while the youth was pursuing his studies under the Rev. James W. Poindexter.

When he was eighteen years old he tried the journalism of New York, writing for "Harper's Weekly" and on the staffs of The Times and The Tribune; and in 1859 "The States," published at Washington by Roger A. Pryor, employed him as its representative in the Press Gallery. While the Confederates occupied Nashville in 1861, Mr. Watterson, then consecrated to a gray jacket, was an associate editor of The Banner, leaving there on the evacuation of the city to serve as aide to Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest. Service on the staff of the general, Bishop Leonidas Polk, and activity as chief of scouts during the campaign between Joseph E. Johnston and William T. Sherman did not prevent him from editing at Chattanooga "The Rebel," a brilliant semi-official army paper which was a definite and joyously received liaison between the commanders and the rank and file of the Confederate Army. Nine months, from October, 1862, to September, 1863, this amazing publication flourished, until the fall of Chattanooga returned its editor to the service.

After the war Mr. Watterson married Miss Rebecca Ewing, daughter of a famous Tennessee house, and spent some time abroad in journalistic work, being thrown in the society of Herbert Spencer and other great Europeans. Returning to this country he re-established The Banner at Nashville and so great was his success that the Old Lion of Southern Journalism, George D. Prentice, called him to the managing editorship of the Louisville Journal in 1868. He so thoroughly revived this dying newspaper that overtures came from its rival, the Louisville Courier, and he and Walter N. Haldeman, publisher of the latter, established the Courier-Journal which was to make a shining mark in the newspaper world. November 8, 1868, this newspaper appeared, having absorbed the Louisville Democrat as well, and assumed at once the leadership of the liberal and progressive element of the nation.

For thirty years his ideas and ringing phrases found their way into the press and speech and political platforms of the American people. Only once did he accept office, and that at the earnest request of Samuel J. Tilden that the Louisville editor fill out an unexpired term in Congress to serve as floor leader. He took membership on the Committee on Ways and Means, and "the star-eyed goddess of tariff reform" and "a tariff for revenue only" became the sentinels of the democratic tariff position. This was in 1876-77. He was temporary chairman of the convention that nominated Mr. Tilden and he wrote the platform of half a dozen national conventions. When besought, as he was in 1883 to stand for the senatorship, as in other years to run for Governor and President, he said: "I will stay where I am. Office is not for me. Beginning in slavery to end in poverty, it is odious to my sense of freedom."

Always committed to a high sense of devotion to the Constitution and the governmental ideas of Thomas Jefferson, Mr. Watterson had notable disagreements with Presidents Cleveland and Wilson. None of these began as personal, and his attacks upon the positions of these statesmen were always felt the more because he did not hesitate to commend them in acts of greatness. With the name of Cleveland his phrase "marching through a slaughter house into an open grave," is as closely associated as are the words, "a schoolmaster rather than a statesman," with Woodrow Wilson.

After the sale of his newspaper interests to Judge Robert W. Bingham in August, 1918, he retired to his country home, Mansfield, near Jeffersontown, Kentucky, nine miles from Louisville. He performed a year's service as Editor Emeritus of The Courier-Journal at the pressing request of Judge Bingham. That period ended in May, 1919; and from that time until his death at Jacksonville, Florida, December 22, 1921, Mr. Watterson lived apart from the world.

His ancestry was Scotch-Irish and English. His paternal grandfather was William S. Watterson, who came to Tennessee from Virginia in 1804 and died there, one of the leaders of the State in 1850. His mother's father was James Black, one of Kentucky's eminent pioneers. There are Wattersons to be found in County Down and among the Manxmen, and the Blacks hail from north of Perth, so that perhaps this dominant Celtic strain was responsible for Mr. Watterson's lifelong devotion to the cause of Irish independence and his strong disapproval of British rule in Ireland.

He was always a democrat, of the type that preferred to do his fighting within the party ranks. In this character he was a leader against the concept of the League of Nations, and with ammunition furnished by him many an antagonist poured hot-shot into the League ranks in 1919 and 1920. He supported Cox and Roosevelt in 1920.

Due to birth in congressional circles in Washington, and Tennessee ancestry, Mr. Watterson knew personally every President since John Quincy Adams whose fatal stroke he witnessed as a page on the floor of the House of Representatives. On "Old Hickory's" knee he sat in The Hermitage, and Polk and Pierce were familiars at his family hearthstone. Although he vigorously opposed "the return from Elba" of "The Man on Horseback" he and Theodore Roosevelt were warm personal friends.

Mr. Watterson was a life member of The Lambs, The Lotus Club and The Manhattan Club of New York City, an honorary member of numerous press clubs and the only honorary member of The Pendennis Club in Louisville. He was a Chevalier of the Legion d'Honneur of France and a Commander of the Order of the Crown of Belgium—these for service in the war.

He was the stage's foremost literary patron, himself the intimate of the Belascos, the Frohmans, the Jeffersons, the Irvings and the Mansfields. He was the foe of prohibition and all forms of sumptuary law. In short, he wrote his name in slashing letters across three generations of history in the United States and Europe.

BRECKINRIDGE FAMILY.* Alexander Breckinridge, a man of education, a native of Ulster Province, Ireland, came to America about 1739 and settled on land near the present site of Staunton, Virginia. He was accompanied by his wife, Letitia Preston, and by her brother, John Preston. Alexander Breckinridge and John Preston were Scotch-Irish Presbyterians and their ancestors had been Protestant since the Reformation. John Preston was the ancestor of the Prestons, Browns, Blairs, Marshalls, Woolleys, McDowells and other families.

Robert Preston, a son of Alexander, by his first marriage, had two sons, Robert and Alexander, who settled near the present site of Louisville, Kentucky, in 1783. Robert was a subaltern officer in the Revolutionary army and after coming to Kentucky served in several Indian campaigns, was a member of the various conventions in the Territory of Kentucky and was the first speaker of the House of Representatives in 1792.

The second wife of Robert Breckinridge, son of Alexander, was Letitia Preston, daughter of John Preston. The oldest child of this marriage was John Breckinridge.

HON. JOHN BRECKINRIDGE,* lawyer, was born December 2, 1760, on a farm where Staunton, Virginia, now stands and was the oldest child of Robert and Letitia Breckinridge. His brother, Robert, was a subaltern officer in the Revolutionary army, and after the declaration of peace came to Kentucky, settling in Jefferson County. He served in several Indian campaigns during that period; was a member of the various conventions in the Territory of Kentucky, and was the first speaker of the House of Representatives in 1792. His mother, Letitia Preston, was his father's second wife, and the daughter of John Preston, an ancestor of the Prestons, Browns, Blairs, Marshalls, Woolleys, McDowells and other families. His grandparents, Robert Breckinridge and John Preston, were Scotch-Irish Presbyterian, whose ancestors had been Protestants since the Reformation. John Breckinridge's father moved to Botetourt County, where he died, leaving a large family in narrow circumstances, when the subject of this sketch was but eleven years old. After the death of his father, his opportunities for education were exceedingly limited, he attending no school until reaching his nineteenth year, at which time he entered William and Mary College. While attending that institution he was elected to represent his county in the House of Burgesses, without his knowledge, and being under age was elected the third time before being permitted to take his seat. From that time, throughout his life, he was almost constantly in public position. In 1785 he married Mary Hopkins Cabell, daughter of Col. Joseph Cabell, an officer in the Revolutionary army, who was a son of Dr. William Cabell, from whom the Cabells, Carringtons, Dixons and others are descended; settled in Albemarle County, where he practiced law for seven years; emigrated to Kentucky late in 1792; purchased and settled on a tract of land in Fayette County, which he called Cabell's Dale, in honor of his wife. He soon became one of the leading citizens of Kentucky, and at that time had but one rival (George Nicholas) as a lawyer in the state. As a public speaker he was probably without an equal until Henry Clay rose to position; he obtained a large and lucrative practice; at first declining political honors, he soon became the head of the Democratic Society as it was then called, whose purpose was the securing of the free use of the Mississippi River and a state rights' construction of the Federal Constitution; as early as 1793 he advocated the acquisition of Louisiana by peaceable or forcible means; he was an intense anti-Federalist, and probably shared Patrick Henry's opposition to the Federal Constitution; was the undoubted author of the Resolutions of 1799, and probably of those of 1798; at least, his immediate friends and relatives never doubted that he was. In 1801 he took his seat in the Senate of the United States, as the recognized leader of the Administration or Jefferson party, and to his views Mr. Jefferson finally yielded, as to the power of the general Government in acquiring new territory. In 1805, he became attorney-general in the cabinet of Mr. Jefferson. He died December 14, 1806, at Cabell's Dale, Kentucky, barely in middle life and at a time when there seemed to be no eminence which he could not reach. Humanly speaking, no life could have had a more untimely end. In stature, he was slightly over six feet in height, slender and muscular; a man of great power and noble appearance; was extremely grave and silent in his ordinary intercourse, but courteous and gentle in manners; possessed a melodious and impressive voice; was unostentatious and exemplary in his habits; a man of numerous but private charities; patient, forbearing and just; possessed great bravery; was extremely warm in his friendships and was everywhere beloved. He left a widow and seven children, the youngest of whom died in youth; another, the wife of David Castleman, died within a few years, and the five remaining children were Letitia Preston, Joseph Cabell, John, Robert Jefferson and William Lewis.

His wife was one of the most brilliant women of her day. She survived her husband for nearly fifty-two years. Few women had so wide an acquaintance; plain, simple, generous, and pious, she was universally respected and beloved, and even at the advanced age of ninety, her distinguished sons were obedient to her.

Her daughter, Letitia Preston Breckinridge, married Colonel Grayson, who had one son, John Breckinridge Grayson, educated at West Point and in the regular army until 1861, when resigning his commission, he entered the Confederate service, and died, in Florida, in 1862, as brigadier-general. After the death of her first husband Mrs. Grayson married Gen. Peter Porter of New York, secretary of war under John Quincy Adams, and by that marriage had one son, Peter A. Porter, who was killed at the head of a brigade under General Grant, in one of the terrific charges at Cold Harbor, in 1864, a man of splendid social and soldierly attainments and one of the most daring and able of the defenders of the National cause, who like many of his relatives on the opposite side, gave his life in defense of his convictions.

HON. JOSEPH CABELL BRECKINRIDGE,* lawyer, was born July 14, 1788, in Albemarle County, Virginia, and was the second child and first son of Hon. John Breckinridge and his wife, Mary Hopkins Cabell. His mother was the daughter of Col. Joseph Cabell, of Buckingham County, Virginia. At the age of fourteen he was placed under the tutelage of Dr. Archibald Alexander, afterwards a distinguished professor of theology at Princeton; in 1804 entered Princeton College, remaining until the death of his father in 1806; returned to Princeton in 1808 and graduated with honor in 1810; after graduating, studied law, and entered upon its practice at Lexington, Kentucky; served as major on the staff of his relative, Gen. Samuel Hopkins, during the war of 1812; in 1816, was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, without opposition; in 1817 was re-elected and chosen speaker; in 1818 was again a member and speaker, and at the age of thirty, occupied a most enviable position as a lawyer, orator and politician; in 1820 was appointed secretary of state under Governor Adair, and removed to Frankfort, engaging, at the same time, in the practice of his profession. He died September 1, 1823, a victim to an epidemic fever and thus was lost to his family, friends and country before the prime of life. Joseph Cabell Breckinridge, a man, who, from his first appearance in public life, had steadily grown in the affection and estimation of the people, and whose noble character and genuine talents promised in any sphere, to reflect honor upon the state. In person, he was about middle height, with a symmetrical form, his whole appearance being graceful and manly. For a number of years he had been connected with the Presbyterian Church and was one of the founders and ruling elders of the second church of that denomination in Lexington. Mr. Breckinridge was married to Mary Clay Smith, daughter of Rev. Samuel Stanhope Smith, president of Princeton College. She was a granddaughter of John Witherspoon and a lineal descendant of John Knox, and with five children, four daughters, Letitia, Mary, Frances, Caroline, and one son, John Cabell, survived her husband. Letitia died without children; Mary married Dr. Thomas Satterwhite, a well-known physician of Lexington, who was killed by being thrown from his horse, and their child, Dr. Thomas P. Satterwhite, became a leading physician in Louisville; Frances married Rev. John C. Young, who was for twenty-seven years president of Centre College, and left four daughters; Caroline married Rev. Joseph J. Bullock, and died leaving a large family. Their son is Gen. John Cabell Breckinridge, whose sketch, with portrait, is given on following pages.

GEN. JOHN CABELL BRECKINRIDGE,* lawyer, soldier, and statesman, was born January 21, 1821, near Lexington, Kentucky, and was the only son of Hon. Joseph Cabell Breckinridge, and grandson of Hon. John Breckinridge. He was liberally educated, graduating at Centre College, Danville, in the fall of 1839; studied law at Transylvania University; practiced for a short time at Burlington, Iowa; returned to Lexington, Kentucky, where he continued his profession with success until the breaking out of the Mexican war, when he entered the volunteer service as major of the Third Kentucky Regiment; and although mustered in too late to give him much opportunity for military service, he succeeded in winning distinction for his ability as an advocate for General Pillow, in the controversies between that officer and Generals Scott and Shields; was elected to the Kentucky Legislature in Fayette County in 1849, and from that time he rose rapidly into public distinction; in 1851 he was elected to Congress from the "Ashland" (Henry Clay's) district, by the untiring energy of his canvass, his acknowledged ability, and his extraordinary personal attractions, defeating Leslie Combs, who, although then venerable, outlived his brilliant competitor; was re-elected in 1853, after a still more violent contest with Governor Letcher; was barely thirty years of age when he took his seat in the House of Representatives; was tendered the mission to Spain by President Pierce, but declined; in 1856, he was nominated for the Vice Presidency by the Democratic National Convention, at Cincinnati, and was elected with Mr. Buchanan, being the youngest man who ever filled that position; for the next four years presided over the Senate of the United States with great dignity and ability and, in 1860, was nominated by one wing of the democratic party as their candidate for President. The great historic events of that time are a part of the common history of the country. After his inevitable defeat for the Presidency, he was elected to the United States Senate and took his seat March 4, 1861, in the midst of the great preparations for civil war. He made a brilliant but hopeless struggle for the compromise proposed by his predecessor, John J. Crittendon, but, in the fall of 1861, resigned from the Senate and threw himself on the side of the South. He was appointed brigadier-general and placed in command of a brigade at Bowling Green, under Albert Sidney Johnson, and, at the battle of Shiloh was conspicuous for his gallantry and for the valor he infused into his Kentucky brigade; he was soon after promoted to major-general, and placed in command of a division; in June, 1862, successfully resisted with his command the famous bombardment of Vicksburg; commander in chief at the storming of Baton Rouge. At Stone River his division of Kentuckians was put in the front of the battle and in a desperate charge, lost nearly one-third of its number; soon after joined Gen. Joseph Johnston, in Mississippi, and was engaged in the battle at Jackson; afterwards participated, under Bragg, in the battle of Chickamauga, and commanded a corps at Missionary Ridge; in the spring of 1864, took command of the Department of Western Virginia, where he made a brilliant and successful campaign; his troops were afterward incorporated with General Early's and he was placed in command of a corps; after the battle of Winchester he returned to Southwestern Virginia, continuing in command of that department until January 4, 1865, when he was appointed secretary of war, continuing in that position until the final surrender of General Lee. He joined the cabinet of Mr. Davis at Danville; assisted in negotiating the treaty of peace with General Sherman, which President Johnson refused to ratify and, after the final collapse of the Confederate cause, escaped from Florida to Cuba and from thence went to England and Canada. After returning to his home at Lexington, he lived in perfect quiet, so far as the political events of the day were concerned, even declining to express an opinion and gave his attention to the interests of the Lexington and Big Sandy Railroad, of which he was vice president. Very little of General Breckinridge's life could have been given to the practice of law, so much of it being occupied in the various positions to which he was incessantly called. Yet he was concerned in several important cases, in which he displayed great ability. He was, physically, a noble specimen of manhood; his features were classical, his head intellectual, and his figure at once elegant and commanding. He died at his home in Lexington, May 17, 1875.

REV. JOHN BRECKINRIDGE,* D. D., was born July 4, 1797, at Cabell's Dale, Fayette County, Kentucky, and was the second son of Hon. John Breckinridge and his wife, Mary Hopkins Cabell. He received his early education in Kentucky, and graduated with high honor at Princeton College, in 1818. He united with the Presbyterian Church while at Princeton College and chose the ministry as his profession; he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, and in due time was licensed and ordained; in 1822 he acted as chaplain of the Lower House of Congress; from 1823 to 1826, was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Lexington, Kentucky; from 1826 to 1831, was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Baltimore; from the latter date until 1836 he was at the head of the Presbyterian Board of Education; he became professor in the Theological Seminary, Princeton, New Jersey, in 1836; from 1838 to 1840, was secretary and general agent for the church board of foreign missions; at this time he wrote voluminously; he became exceedingly popular as a preacher, platform speaker and controversialist and carried on public debates with Archbishop Hughes on Catholicism. Failing in health he spent the winter of 1840 in New Orleans, and while there was elected to the presidency of Oglethorpe University in Georgia. He died August 4, 1841, at Cabell's Dale. "He was a man of extraordinary powers; gentle and refined in manners, yet ardent, intrepid, and vigorous; was universally admired, and was one of the most popular ministers of his church; was an orator of rare force and magnetic influence; was above middle stature, and possessing great activity and strength and in his personal, social, public and private character was a man of matchless excellence." Mr. Breckinridge was twice married, first to Margaret Miller, daughter of Rev. Samuel Miller, a distinguished professor of Princeton College, and afterwards to Miss Maley Babcock, born in Connecticut. He left but one son, Judge Samuel M. Breckinridge, a distinguished lawyer of St. Louis. One daughter, Mary Cabell, married Peter Porter and died of cholera in 1852, and another one, Margaret, nursed the wounded soldiers of the Union army and died from a malady brought on by those exhausting efforts.

REV. ROBERT JEFFERSON BRECKINRIDGE,* D. D., LL. D., was born March 8, 1800, at Cabell's Dale, Fayette County, Kentucky, and was the son of Hon. John Breckinridge and his wife, Mary Hopkins Cabell. He was taught in the schools of this state under Thompson, Wilson, Kean O'Hara and Brock, popular teachers of that day, and at the age of sixteen entered Princeton College, where he remained two years; spent one winter at Yale, but graduated in the fall of 1819 at Union College, Schenectady, New York, then under the presidency of the famous Dr. Samuel Nott. After returning to Kentucky, spent three years in the management of his mother's and his own farm, and in a wide course of reading; in 1824, began the practice of law in Lexington, in partnership with Charleton Hunt; espoused with great warmth the "Old Court" and "Anti-Relief" side in politics and was elected to the Lower House of the Legislature in 1825, 1826, 1827, 1828; during the session of 1828, was attacked with a severe illness, from which he never recovered, his long subsequent life being full of physical weakness and pain; in 1831, ran as an independent candidate for the Legislature in advocacy of gradual emancipation and the abolishment of Sunday mails, but withdrew before the close of the election; in 1828 was grand orator of the Grand Lodge as his brother, Cabell, had been before him and as his nephew, John C. Breckinridge, was afterward. He joined the Presbyterian Church and in the spring of 1832, was licensed to preach; went to Princeton and, after pursuing his studies in the Theological Seminary for a few months, became successor of his brother, Rev. John Breckinridge, as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, Maryland; in 1831 and 1832, had been a member of the General Assemblies and had become a prominent leader of what was known as the Old School Wing of the Church; was the author of the "Act and Testimony," and, under his lead, the Assembly of 1837 passed the celebrated acts which settled the controversies for thirty years; soon after settling in Baltimore, engaged in an exciting controversy with the Catholics and Universalists; in 1835 was one of the founders of The Baltimore Literary and Religious Magazine, of which he afterward became sole owner and editor. "The Spirit of the Nineteenth Century," was published for nine years; through his efforts the Bible was introduced into the public schools of Baltimore; and the colored people of Maryland presented him with a gold snuff-box, in gratitude for his efforts in defeating a bill designed to prevent free colored people from residing in Maryland. For thirteen years he continued his connection with the Church in Baltimore, in addition to his various arduous labors, excepting one year, 1836, which he spent as a delegate from his General Assembly to the Protestant Churches of Europe; while in Scotland held a debate on American slavery, continuing two weeks at Glasgow, with the notorious George Thompson, and out of that debate sprang his famous letter to Doctor Wardlow on slavery. In 1841, was elected Moderator of the General Assembly; in 1845 became the president of Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, Pennsylvania, only remaining in that position two years, his enfeebled constitution being unable to bear the severity of the climate; resigned in 1847 to become pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Lexington; in the same year was appointed by Governor Owlsey, superintendent of public instruction; was reappointed by Governor Crittenden, and in 1851 was elected by the people, and resigned both positions in 1853 to become Professor of Theology in the Seminary at Danville, of which he was chief founder, and to him is largely due the establishment and growth of the common school system of education in Kentucky; in 1849 was a candidate for the Constitutional Convention as an Emancipationist, but after one of the most spirited contests in the history of the state was defeated; he was one of the original stockholders and directors of the State Agricultural Society and took an active interest in the formation and maintenance of every public enterprise. He delivered the oration at the laying of the cornerstone of the monument to Mr. Clay at Lexington; opposed with great ability, but unsuccessfully, the loan of county aid for building railroads and was a successful farmer and breeder of thoroughbred cattle; and in 1856 received three prizes for agricultural essays. He delivered scores of speeches, sermons and lectures yearly, and contributed constantly to secular and religious papers, participating freely in all the controversies of the day. His open letters to Doctor Wardlow in 1837, Charles Sumner and William H. Seward in 1856; and upon the American question in 1855; to Gen. John C. Breckinridge in 1860; and on the temperance question in 1852; and upon the revision of the Bible in 1858, were extensively copied and read throughout the country. In the late war he espoused the cause of the National Government with great intensity and with pen and voice exerted his utmost capacity in support of the administration; and published a magazine called the "Danville Review" as his special organ; was delegate to and temporary chairman of the Republican Convention which met at Baltimore in 1864, and there refused to permit the nomination of Andrew Johnson as candidate for Vice President to be made unanimous on account of his distrust in him; and his great moral and intellectual worth gave strength to the cause of the Government, not only in his own state, but abroad, and during the great conflict he arose to his greatest height as a writer, statesman and patriot. He was a man of indomitable will and unquestioned courage; profound and sincere in his convictions; of ardent, intense nature; possessed a singularly quick, active intellect; of quick impulses; was a warm and generous friend, and probably not always a just enemy; fought with all his power and forgave with absolute completeness when he professed to forgive. His information covered every department of knowledge; his memory was almost perfect, and his capacity of labor, with an enfeebled body, was apparently without limit; as a debater he never met his superior; was for thirty years the acknowledged leader in every Church Court in which he sat, and was as formidable before the people as on the floor of a deliberative body; had all the personal gifts of the genuine orator and was undoubtedly the most powerful member of the Breckinridge family. In his personal manners, habits and tastes, he was plain, simple, frugal, and severe; but as a friend and host was indulgent and exceedingly attractive, having uncommon conversational powers and a free, unaffected hospitality, certainly displaying himself to as great advantage among his friends, and at his home, as in his great contests before the people. His children were his companions, and were treated by him as equals and he gave them his confidence, his paternal affection being of the most tender and forbearing nature. In stature he was nearly six feet, erect, active, graceful and muscular; but toward the close of his life, his continued bad health and incessant labors bent his frame somewhat and gave him the appearance of feebleness; but to the last he maintained his great mental vigor, and displayed all the noble traits of his life. In 1869 he resigned his professorship in Danville Seminary and after two years of continual suffering died December 27, 1871, in Danville, Kentucky, his last words being, "More light." Doctor Breckinridge was twice married; first, March 11, 1823, to his cousin, Ann Sophonisba Preston, daughter of Gen. Frank Preston, of Virginia and granddaughter of Gen. William Campbell. She died in 1844, leaving a large family. In 1847, he was married to Mrs. Virginia Shelby, daughter of Col. Nathaniel Hart of Woodford County. Doctor Breckinridge left seven children, four sons and three married daughters. His oldest daughter, who most resembled him in person, character and intellect, married William Warfield, a well-known, successful and influential farmer and breeder of fine cattle in Fayette County. His second daughter married Rev. William C. Handy, a Presbyterian minister of New York, and his youngest daughter married Dr. Theophilus Steel, who was a colonel of cavalry in the Confederate army and afterward a physician in the City of New York. His youngest son, John R., was murdered at Lebanon, Tennessee, in 1874, while a student at Cumberland University. (Sketches of his other sons follow on later pages.)

REV. WILLIAM LEWIS BRECKINRIDGE,* D. D., was born in July, 1803, at Cabell's Dale, Fayette County, and was the son of Hon. John Breckinridge and his wife, Mary Hopkins Cabell. He was educated at Transylvania University. He entered the Presbyterian ministry and his first pastorate was at Maysville, Kentucky. He was for a time professor in Centre College; for twenty-three years was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Louisville; accepted the presidency of Oakland College, Mississippi, but resigned to become president of Centre College; enfeebled by ill health and old age, he resigned his place at the head of that institution and retired to his farm in Cass County, Missouri, which he called Cabell's Dale, in memory of his Kentucky home; afterwards preached constantly, but had no regular charge. He was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1859. He was a man of admirable personal and social traits; an orator of great ability; a man of wide charities, of great candor and transparent honesty; a genuine Christian and one of the most learned, able and valuable men in the Presbyterian Church. He died December 26, 1876, at his home in Missouri. Doctor Breckinridge was twice married; first, at the age of twenty, to Miss Frances Prevost, granddaughter of Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith. She died after removing to Missouri, and not long before his death he was married to the widowed daughter of Judge Christopher Tompkins. Doctor Breckinridge had a large family of six sons and two daughters. His second son, Dr. Robert J. Breckinridge, who was considered one of the most brilliant and talented men of his name, was at twenty-one elected professor of the Medical College, Louisville, at twenty-four was nominated by the democratic party for Congress, but declined to enter politics, was division surgeon under General Hood, was afterward medical inspector on the staff of General Lee. After the close of the war he removed to Texas, and died in the thirty-eighth year of his age.

JUDGE ROBERT JEFFERSON BRECKINRIDGE,* lawyer, was born September 14, 1834, in Baltimore, Maryland, and is the oldest son of Dr. Robert J. Breckinridge. He received his education at Centre College, Danville, and in the University of Virginia, graduating in the latter institution in 1852, when Dr. Gessner Harrison was president. After leaving college, he spent two or three years in the service of the United States Coast Survey, resigning that position in the fall of 1854; soon after began the study of law at Danville, under General Boyle and Hon. W. C. Anderson; in the spring of 1856 graduated from the law department of Transylvania University and engaged in the practice of his profession at Lexington, until the commencement of the Civil war. He raised a company of men for the Confederate service, and it became the Second Company in the Second Kentucky Infantry at Camp Boons; served with his regiment until 1862; and soon afterward was elected to the Confederate Congress; shortly afterward resigned his seat and again entered the army as colonel of cavalry; in the spring of 1864 was captured and retained as prisoner of war in the Ohio Penitentiary and at Johnson's Island until the close of the great conflict. He then settled on a farm near Stanford, in Lincoln County, engaging also in the practice of his profession. In 1873 he went to New York City with the view of practicing law, but soon after returned to Kentucky and settled at Danville. In 1876 he was elected judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the Boyle District, consisting of seven counties, and is now discharging the duties of that office. In politics he is a democrat. He is a man of fine attainments; is able as a lawyer, and possesses many of the admirable and brilliant qualities of his distinguished family; is possessed of great breadth and strength of character and is distinguished for many amiable and generous traits. Judge Breckinridge was married in 1856 to Miss Kate Morrison, daughter of M. B. Morrison of Lexington, Kentucky. They have two children.

COL. WILLIAM CAMPBELL PRESTON BRECKINRIDGE, LL. D., second son of Dr. Robert J. Breckinridge, was born August 28, 1837, near Baltimore, Maryland; graduated at Centre College and in the law school of Louisville; entered the Confederate army as a captain under Gen. John H. Morgan; rose to the rank of colonel of the Ninth Kentucky Cavalry, and the command of a cavalry brigade; was for two years editor of The "Lexington Observer and Reporter," and later a member of the Lexington Bar.

Colonel Breckinridge possessed an unusual range of versatile gifts and accomplishments and these combined with his personal integrity and lofty character opened for him opportunities for service and honor such as have been extended to few Kentuckians. He was sent to Congress in 1884 as representative of the Ashland District, and was re-elected four times. While in Congress he was conspicuously identified with the effort to revise the tariff on a revenue rather than on a protective basis. He served on the two most important committees, Ways and Means and Appropriations. In the campaign of 1896 he was a leader in the movement known as "sound money wing" of the democratic party. While it is superlative praise, there is no doubt that Colonel Breckinridge was among the most eloquent orators and advocates of his generation. On this score the following tribute would perhaps express a consensus of estimate: "He was recognized as one of the most gifted orators in the house of representatives and his eloquence and masterful understanding of the issues discussed won him a national reputation. In the trial of criminal charges involving the penalty of death, Colonel Breckinridge's voice was often raised in behalf of mercy and in defense of men so charged he was exceptionally successful in securing acquittals, his addresses to a jury in such cases being models of oratory calculated to awaken every human instinct of the heart and appeal not only to the sense of right but also to those higher and nobler traits of the mind that find expression in the conviction that it is more divine to forgive than to punish."

Colonel Breckinridge for a number of years was professor of Law in the University of Kentucky. Among other social attachments he was a Royal Arch and Knight Templar Mason and for a number of years beginning with the political campaign of 1896 he was associated with his son Desha Breckinridge as an editor of the Lexington Herald. Colonel Breckinridge died at Lexington November 19, 1904.

His first wife was Lucretia Hart Clay, daughter of Thomas Hart Clay and granddaughter of Henry Clay (see Clay Family sketch). For his second wife Colonel Breckinridge married Issa Desha. She was a daughter of Dr. John R. and Mary (Curry) Desha. Her grandfather Joseph Desha was governor of Kentucky from 1824 to 1828. After her death Colonel Breckinridge married Mrs. Louise (Scott) Wing, widow of Rumsey Wing and daughter of Robert W. Scott. The four children of Colonel Breckinridge were Eleanor Breckinridge Chalkley, Miss Sophonisba Preston Breckinridge, Desha (whose sketch follows this) and Curry Desha Breckinridge. His daughter Sophonisba Preston Breckinridge since 1908 has been a member of the faculty of the University of Chicago, as Dean of Women and Dean of the Chicago School of Civics and Philanthropy.

DESHA BRECKINRIDGE, son of Col. William C. P. Breckinridge and Issa (Desha) Breckinridge, was prepared for the profession in which so many Breckinridges have been distinguished, the law, but for a quarter of a century has been better known in his work as an editor and publisher and business man.

He was born at Lexington August 5, 1867. His early education was largely supervised by the eminent Kentucky author James Lane Allen. He attended the Lawrenceville Preparatory School of New Jersey, and later Princeton University and the University of Virginia. Mr. Breckinridge was admitted to the Kentucky bar in 1893 and from that year until 1900 was a member of and associate of the law firm of Breckinridge and Shelby, in which his father was the senior.

Beginning in the sound money Democratic campaign of 1896 Mr. Breckinridge became interested in the editorial work of the Lexington Herald, became publisher of that great Kentucky journal in 1897, and since 1904 has also combined the duties of editor. He is president of the Lexington Herald Company. During the Spanish-American war he served as a lieutenant in the Third Volunteer Engineers and as aide de camp to Maj.

Gen. J. C. Breckinridge, his uncle. Desha Breckinridge is a director of the First and City National Bank, the Fayette Home Telephone Company, Phoenix Hotel Company. He is a democrat, but as an editor has been distinguished by his independent advocacy of men and measures who best expressed his ideals of the public welfare. He is a Presbyterian, a member of the Princeton Club of New York, the Lexington, University and Country Club of Lexington.

November 17, 1898, Desha Breckinridge married Madeline McDowell, daughter of Maj. Henry Clay and Ann (Clay) McDowell.

MADLINE McDOWELL BRECKINRIDGE. An enthusiastic devotion to some of the broadest movements affecting human welfare is not inconsistent with an intensive and constant effort to improve conditions in more restricted fields and in definite undertakings that may be accomplished from day to day or well within the scope of a single lifetime. That is perhaps a most important significance to be derived from the life and work of the late Mrs. Breckinridge. For a number of years she stood high in the councils of American women devoted to the serious work of social welfare. But this distinction rested primarily upon the work she had laboriously performed, piecing it together bit by bit, in her home community at Lexington and over the state. As has been well said "the range of her influence and activities extended from a deep personal interest in the welfare of the under-privileged child to subjects of national and international importance, and in all these spheres she displayed a degree of ability and a courage and rendered a quality of service of which anyone might well be proud."

Madeline McDowell was born at Woodlake, Franklin County, Kentucky, May 20, 1872, and died Thanksgiving morning November 25, 1920. It is sufficient merely to indicate her relationship to the two great Kentucky families of Clay and McDowell since other pages cover the record of those families. She was a daughter of Henry Clay McDowell and Anne (Clay) McDowell. Her paternal grandfather was Dr. William A. McDowell. Her mother was a daughter of Col. Henry Clay, who was killed during the Mexican war, the favorite son of the great statesman Henry Clay.

Madeline McDowell attended the State College of Lexington and finished her education in Miss Porter's School at Farmington, Connecticut, November 17, 1898, she became the wife of Mr. Desha Breckinridge. Mrs. Breckinridge was president of the Kentucky Equal Rights Association from 1912 to 1915 and again in 1919. She was second vice president of the National Woman Suffrage Association in 1913-14, and in the summer of 1920 she went to Geneva, Switzerland, as one of the delegates to the International Suffrage Conference from the United States. She served as vice president of the Kentucky Child Labor Commission, as member of the Board of Trustees of the Fayette County Tuberculosis Sanitarium, was a director of the Fayette County Public Health Nursing Association, Fayette County Associated Charities, on the executive committee of the Lexington Civic League and its president. For four years she was chairman of the Legislative Committee of the Kentucky Federation of Women's Clubs, and among the bills passed by the Legislature during this time and in response to the Federations' efforts should be mentioned those creating a State Library Commission, a Forestry Commission, the separate drinking cup bill, school suffrage for Kentucky women, the State Tuberculosis Commission, the Juvenile Court and Compulsory Educational Laws, the present County School Board Law and the Small School Board Law. As vice president of the Kentucky Child Labor Committee she had some part in the passage of the Child Labor Law by reason of which Kentucky stands with the most advanced states. She was also active in securing the law limiting the work of women in industry to ten hours a day.

One of the most important achievements in Lexington credited to her was the establishment of Lincoln School in the west end of the city. Through her energy and enthusiasm a fund of $35,000 was raised from private sources to supplement the $10,000 appropriated by the School Board. It is a public school named for Abraham Lincoln and in addition to the ordinary subjects taught it has manual training for every grade, cooking, sewing, carpentry work, and other branches. On the official minutes of the Board of Education is inscribed the following record: "The law creating the Board of Education in cities of the second class, in its present form, is due more to her than perhaps to any other person. With brilliant ability and untiring energy she secured its passage and has since kept in constant touch with the Board and its activities. The needs of the poorer children, undernourished and those below the normal standards challenged her especial attention and from the impulses of her generous heart the Abraham Lincoln School became a vision and then through her indefatigable effort a reality. In her death the Board of Education has lost its sanest counselor and its most active and unselfish coworker."

Space forbids any further reference to her work and character. It is doubtful if the death of any Kentuckian in recent years has touched so many of the generous and aspiring hearts not only in her own faith but in every center where there is an appreciation of consecration to unselfish effort in behalf of human progress. However, this article cannot conclude without one tribute, the sincerity and beauty of whose literary expression could only have been inspired by the nobility of its object:

"Memory will bring to different hearts different pictures of her; a child, all eyes and legs, climbing upon her father's horse to ride with him over the farm, seeking and giving companionship to him to whom difference of age made no difference; a girl, with eyes that still seemed bigger than her body, and long legs below her skirts, who romped with boy and girl, and led in chase and in study at the old schoolhouse, and over the hills around the pond on the Woodlake Farm.

"And then, grown taller, with soft brown hair, she came to a new town and made new friends; still romped and played and danced; the best tennis player, the most tireless dancer, the most daring rider. And then memory brings the picture of an accident and lameness came, and there was no more tennis, and no more dancing, and she drove instead of rode.

"There was never complaint, never a suggestion of loss. Memory shows tennis parties where others played and she looked on; and dancing parties where she was hostess, but did not dance; and riding parties and rabbit hunts where she drove and others rode. But none might know that she would rather ride than drive, and rather dance than sit, and rather play tennis than serve tea.

"She made her life full. There were things to learn and books to read and older people to amuse. And the picture of those days are full of duties done, full of pleasures given and shared, the days of girlhood, and joyous house parties. Then when the home and the woods where the long shadows fell rang with laughter and with song; with the tinkle of the guitar and the music of the voice. And in the house parties, among the guests that came, there were many kinds—the poet and the artist and the story teller; some of wealth, some without wealth; some whose people had won position—some who made their own position. It was not by rank, nor wealth, nor by reason of what others might have done that she chose her friends.

"And then, grown to womanhood, she left the stately home where love and luxury abided and went to one room to make a home for him she crowned with the glory of her love. And there she worked and studied and gave of herself. She read at night that she might write in the day; she thought at night that she might work in the day, and she wrote and worked for others, never for herself.

"Memory paints the picture of her who never asked a favor for herself in all her life, going up and down the streets to ask the gift of a half dollar or a dollar that it might be used to make play places for children who had no place to play. Timid, shrinking, reserved, she forgot herself, forgot bodily ills, physical handicap, when her heart and her brain told her there was an opportunity to give joy and render service to others.

"The first play grounds were started; others helped, and today there are men and women who as boys and girls got their only play on those grounds. From the play grounds there grew the little school in which the children could be taught to be clean, taught to be independent. Others helped—she always said did more than did she—and the Lincoln School became a reality.

"It was revealed to her that the school system was not good; nights were spent in study of the systems of other states; men who had devoted their lives to the law helped; a new school law was drafted and passed, and Kentucky took rank with the forward-looking states—the states that give opportunity to their children who seek education—the states that made their children who do not seek education go to school.

"Many of the children were underfed and some suffered from inherited weakness, some from tuberculosis. She who loved to play, she who loved the light, the gay, spent hours and days and weeks in study and in work. And a law was framed to create a commission to fight tuberculosis, and an institution was founded that the people of the city and the county she loved with a passionate love might be taught and cured. Others helped—there were always loving ones who helped, she always said did far more than did she, for she never counted what she did, and always counted what others did.

"She could not demand—she could only plead to fiscal court or city council, or legislature; she could go only as a supplicant, without the power to vote. And she and the consecrated women who worked with her, some whom she led, some of whom she followed, could only ask—not command. And she fought that suffrage be given to women, that women who suffer, who share equal burdens, who bear equal sorrows, who pay equal taxes, might have a voice in electing the men who decide what laws shall be passed and how their money be spent.

"With a vision not bounded by state lines, she recognized that suffrage must come to all women before it could come to the women of Kentucky to be the most effective instrument to accomplish purposes for which she wanted suffrage. And so she welcomed the opportunity to help in other states. No trip was too long for her to take, no task too onerous for her to undertake to help secure for women the instrument she believed would help humanity.

"These are only some of the pictures that memory paints to different hearts today. To some it will be a picture of never failing, ever thoughtful courtesy and helpful sympathy; of a boy helped to college; of a girl helped to health; of a woman helped over the rough places until hope and strength triumphed over weakness. And in all the years there will be no picture of selfish thought; no picture of a mean act; no picture of an unkind word. She knew sorrow, she knew weariness, she knew pain. She never knew fear, nor envy, nor malice."

MAJ. JOSEPH C. BRECKINRIDGE, the third son of Rev. Robert J. Breckinridge was born January 15, 1842; was educated at Centre College and the University of Virginia; entered the Union army in 1861 on the staff of Gen. George H. Thomas; was appointed lieutenant in the Second Regular Artillery, United States army. He was appointed second lieutenant in the Second Artillery in April, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant in August, 1863, was taken prisoner during the Atlanta campaign in July, 1864, and after the war remained in the Regular Army being promoted to captain June 17, 1874. He served as major general of volunteers during the Spanish-American war, and was promoted to major general U. S. A. April 11, 1903, and the following day retired at his own request after forty years of service. His home is at Washington.

A son of this distinguished American soldier is Henry Breckinridge, who was born in Chicago in 1886 and from 1910 to 1913 practiced law at Lexington. April 30, 1913, he became assistant secretary of war in President Wilson's administration, resigning February 10, 1916. He was commissioned a major of infantry and went to France with the Ninety-first Division, later was appointed a staff officer of the Fifth Army Corps and was promoted to lieutenant colonel on the General Staff H. S.

Still another notable member of the family that claims brief mention here is Clifton R. Breckinridge, a son of General and Vice President John C. Breckinridge. He was born at Lexington in 1846, was in service in the Confederate Army and Confederate Navy, and since 1870 has been a resident of Arkansas, a planter, banker, a representative in Congress from that state, and United States Minister to Russia from 1894 to 1897. His home is at Fort Smith, Arkansas.

GEN. LESLIE COMBS. This is one of the names indispensable to the index of every collection of Kentucky biography. Fortunately this publication can include a highly valuable character sketch and life study of this Kentuckian. Among the notable men included in Judge Kerr's sketches on "The Lexington Bar between 1820 and 1840," a prominent place is given to General Combs. The following paragraphs contain this notable biography with only slight change and abbreviation.

One of the most prominent law firms in Lexington of that period was that of Combs & Sayre, the senior member of which was Gen. Leslie Combs. Few men of wider and more varying experiences have lived in Lexington than General Combs. No history of Lexington would be complete that omitted from its pages a generous mention of the life and accomplishments of this truly wonderful man. This Western country offered the most inviting field for the young man of daring courage and self-determination of any of the early settlements in America. Here all questions of national origin and social distinctions were obliterated in the early days of the newly organized state, even if social distinctions did come with the development and growth of the state and the increased property in slaves.

Of the pioneer class was General Combs. His mother, Sarah Richardson, was in the paternal side of the Quaker family of that name in Maryland, connected by blood with the Thomases and Snowdens, while her mother was a daughter of the Marquis de Calmez, and his wife, Winifred, both of whom are buried at Berryville, Virginia. His father was by birth a Virginian, and served as an officer in the Revolutionary Army under Washington at the siege of Yorktown. He removed to Kentucky soon after the Revolution, and was one of the early pioneers of the state, frequently engaging in those early border encounters with the Indians which resulted in driving them from the country and preparing this favored section for the on-coming civilization. His father is buried near Boonesboro, and on his simple monument is carved the legend "Revolutionary Officer and a Hunter of Kentucky." Seven children survived him, and among them was divided his farm of only 100 acres, located in Clark County. Of these seven children the boy Leslie early showed the greatest inclination to outgrow the meager environment in which he had been reared, and fortunately for his ambitious desires there lived in this community a Presbyterian preacher of culture and refinement by the name of John Lyle, and through his assistance the aspiring youth was able to get a fairly good knowledge of Latin, English and mathematics. The removal of this friend from his neighborhood caused the young man great anxiety, because there had been created in him a thirst for knowledge that could not be quenched. Fortunately the father was able to place him with a French family that resided near Ashland, the home of Henry Clay, where he remained for a year, during which time he acquired a good practical knowledge of the French language.

This brief educational period brought the young Leslie to the exciting days of the War of 1812. Though a lad of only eighteen, he was caught in the great war fever that spread all over Kentucky. Though below the muster age, his determination to join the army was such that he set out alone from Georgetown, Kentucky, hoping to overtake the Kentucky troops before they reached Canada, the final injunction of his mother being "never disgrace your parents by running from danger." The career of this "Boy Captain," as he was affectionately called during his service in this war, reads like a romance. The whole war had been one disastrous failure after another. Young Combs had joined himself to the army between Fort Wayne and Fort Defiance. The situation of the troops under General Winchester, who had been expected to make a winter campaign against Detroit, was such that it was deemed advisable to get word to General Harrison with as much expedition as possible. This perilous commission was given to young Combs, whose determination to join the army had already given him a certain mark of distinction. It was a trip of 100 miles through the snows of the north. He and his scout had only four days' provisions at the start, and such was the rigor of the storm that at the end of six days they were alone in a wintry wilderness without food. Young Combs fell desperately ill, but such was his determination that he not only survived but kept alive the spirits of his companion, their only food being the bark of the slippery elm until they reached Fort McArthur, nine days after their departure, but such had been his sufferings from frozen feet and rheumatic pains that he never entirely recovered from the exposure of that trip. Following this expedition came the unfortunate battle of the Raisin, followed by one of the most diabolical massacres in our history. Young Combs returned to Kentucky to get a clean shirt, as he told his mother, but in reality to get a company of volunteers to return to the assistance of General Harrison. He overtook the army of Gen. Green Clay at Dayton, and being the only one in the party that knew the country, he was promoted at the age of nineteen to the rank of captain and allowed to select his company from the Dudley Regiment, and put at the head of the moving troops. As they neared the headquarters of General Harrison, young Combs was sent on another perilous expedition with dispatches, but was attacked by the Indians and most of his company killed. He finally got to General Harrison, however, and was complimented by him for his gallantry. In the unfortunate engagement that followed Colonel Dudley was killed. As a prisoner of war young Combs was marched with the others down to Fort Miami, where the bloody scenes enacted at the Raisin were repeated. From Miami they were taken to an old dilapidated place called Fort Maumee, built by General Wayne. As they neared this old fort young Combs saw his first gauntlet running. As the prisoners advanced they were made to run the gauntlet between two rows of painted warriors, and those that escaped the tomahawks of those demons were permitted to enter the fort. All around him he saw the bodies of his slain companions lying in the course over which he was to run. As he hesitated his companion stepped forward and was instantly killed. Leaping over his dead body he ran with the speed of a deer, reaching the Fort unhurt. Soon a conspicuous savage entered the prison and began to mercilessly tomahawk the defenseless prisoners. Horror froze the veins of all, when suddenly one of the Indians of commanding presence stepped forward and gave a command which was instantly followed by a cessation of these horrors. The Indian, as it was ascertained, was none other than the gallant Tecumseh. In the course of events Captain Combs was paroled, and reached his father's farm in Clark County in the spring of 1814.

Soon after his return he was placed at school in Bardstown, where he remained for a time, when he began the study of law as his life profession. He began the practice of law at the age of twenty-three. Although found in the forefront of every political campaign, he was a hard working, assiduous lawyer, and succeeded in soon acquiring a very lucrative practice. In the midst of his practice at the bar he became a member of the Legislature and became speaker of the House. He entered this body at a time when Kentucky was flooded with a depreciated paper currency, worth about 50 cents on the dollar, issued by the "Bank of the Commonwealth," an institution formed out of the "Relief Party" and which afterwards became the democratic or Loco-foco party in Kentucky. This era preceded the local improvement impulse, there being then not more than five miles of turnpike road in the state, while a railroad had not even been considered. As a member of the committee on finance, General Combs reported a bill which resulted, after it became a law, in winding up the whole paper currency scheme. He always stoutly favored internal improvements, and through his position as chairman of the committee on internal improvements gave to Kentucky that impetus which resulted in placing the state in the forefront. As advocate and later as president of the Cincinnati Southern Railway, as it later came to be known, he rendered the state a service that has been one of its greatest commercial assets, as that line of railway, finally completed, gave Kentucky direct intercourse with both the North and the South, and the old pillars which yet stand at High Bridge should long remain as a tribute to his efforts in securing that great artery of trade for his state.

General Combs delivered the address of welcome to General La Fayette when he made his notable journey through Kentucky in the early '20s of the last century, and in 1836 Governor Morehead appointed him to the command of the Kentucky troops, raised by the request of President Jackson for the Osceola Indian war.

If at times impulsive, a kindly heart always beat beneath the surface. When the great cholera epidemic of 1833 visited the city and community, General Combs gave himself over entirely to the assistance of the stricken families of the city, rich and poor, white and black, friend and foe.

"Babel," as General Combs' home was known, was located on West Main Street, adjoining the old Phoenix Hotel, and was destroyed by fire when the famous hostelry was burned. It was a favorite gathering place for men of every walk and station in life. He was a prime favorite at all gatherings, and never failed to entertain any audience or public gathering in which he participated. An admirer who knew him well refers with interest to the times when he used to be a visitor at the residence of the late Alexander Jeffrey, corner of Market and Second, especially emphasizing the brilliant sallies of wit that pervaded the gatherings in that old residence. There were Senator Beck, Mr. Frank Hunt, General Combs, Calvin Morgan, Major Johnson, Joseph Woolfolk, Charles Voorhies, Colonel Fleming, each a host in himself.

One of the most noted races that was ever run in the Ashland district in the pre-war period was between General Combs and General Breckinridge, in 1851, the latter winning by a small vote supplied by Owen County. He was elected clerk of the Court of Appeals in 1860, which position he held until 1866, declining a renomination.

His was a long and varied career. He was among the last of the elder-day Kentuckians, the last connecting link between the Lexington of infancy and maturity. In politics he was an ardent whig, a unionist and a republican. Thurlow Weed, at the time of his death, referred to the fact that if Mr. Clay had followed the advice of General Combs and refrained from sending a letter to a political friend in Alabama, in which he said it was a matter of indifference to him whether Texas was admitted as a free or a slave state, My Clay would have been elected president in 1844.

Leslie Combs was born in Clark County, Kentucky, November 29, 1793, and died August 22, 1881. His first wife was Miss Margaret Trotter of Fayette County, by whom he had eleven children. His second wife was Miss Mary Elizabeth Brownell, of Little Compton, Rhode Island, by whom he had three children.

A son is Hon. Leslie Combs, now residing at Belair. This son was born at Little Compton, Rhode Island, July 31, 1852. He remained in Transylvania University through the sophomore year and since early manhood has been engaged in the raising of fine stock and tobacco planting, his interests extending to ranches in Texas and the Southwest. He has also discharged a number of public responsibilities with credit. He was pension agent for Kentucky from 1898 to 1900, resigning to become chairman of the Republican Executive Committee of Kentucky in 1900. He was reappointed pension agent and served until 1902. From 1902 to 1906 he was United States minister to Guatemala and Honduras, and was minister to Peru from December 19, 1906, until March, 1911 when he resigned. He was presented with a gold vase by the Government of Guatemala as a souvenir of the Peace Conference of the Marblehead in 1906. He was organizer of the progressive party in Kentucky in 1912.

October 18, 1876, he married in Woodford County, Mary C. Swigert, daughter of Daniel Swigert, of Spring Station.

HARRY PRICE HONAKER, M. D. In faithfully devoting his life to so noble a profession as medicine a man exemplifies much that is highest and best in humanity, and a thoughtful person on the outside may be led to wonder why so hard and often so inadequately rewarded a vocation should attract. He does not realize, however, that a real, sincere physician and surgeon is born such, and that education, training and experience only add to his natural equipment. It is in time of great emergency that the real man of medical science comes to the front, and a recent example was shown during the World war. In every section of the country early in that great struggle the call came for medical help, and it was answered by real physicians and surgeons, real exponents of medical science, who generously and in many cases to their own material disadvantages accepted unknown responsibilities and bore them at home and abroad with valor and usefulness. In this connection attention may be called to Dr. Harry Price Honaker, physician and surgeon at Horse Cave, Kentucky.

Doctor Honaker was born September 17, 1878, in Warren County, near Riverside, Kentucky. His parents were James H. and Julia C. (Morgan) Honaker, both natives of Kentucky but of old Virginia parentage. The founder of the Honaker family in Kentucky was Doctor Honaker's great-grandfather, Isaac Honaker, who came from Virginia in pioneer days and settled in Butler County, where he engaged in farming. He also established and owned what is yet known at Honaker's Ferry, transporting passengers across the Green River. He spent the rest of his life here, leaving his farm and ferry to his only child, John Honaker. The latter operated the ferry and cultivated the farm during the remainder of his active life, and died on his farm at the age of forty years. He married Sophia Walker, who was also a native of Virginia.

James H. Honaker was born at Honaker's Ferry on the Green River, Butler County, Kentucky, March 22, 1827, and remained there until 1869, when he went to Missouri, where he remained until 1872. He then settled permanently in Warren County, Kentucky, purchasing a farm near Riverside, the operation of which occupied him throughout the rest of his life, his death occurring here in 1911. He was a man of sterling character, honest and upright in all his dealings, an intelligent and responsible citizen and a consistent member of the Christian Church. He married Julia C. Morgan, who was born in 1837, in Cumberland County, Kentucky, and died on the home farm in 1890. To them the following children were born: Viola B., who is the wife of William W. Hill, a farmer near Riverside, Kentucky; James T., who is a farmer near Round Hill, Butler County, Kentucky; Henry T., who is a farmer near Riverside; Sophia E., who is the wife of M. V. Rone, of Riverside, Kentucky; and Harry Price.

Harry Price Honaker spent his boyhood on the home farm and had educational privileges in the rural schools of Warren County, and in 1900 attended the Southern Normal School at Bowling Green for one term. In the fall of that year he began to teach in the country schools, and continued until January 13, 1903, when he entered the medical department of the Kentucky University at Louisville. He was well prepared for his classes before entering the university and was creditably graduated on July 31, 1906, with his degree of M. D., and still keeps in touch with old university days as an alumnus of the Pi Mu Greek letter fraternity.

Doctor Honaker began his medical practice at Liletown, Green County, Kentucky, where he remained for two years, when he removed to Rocky Hill in Barren County, and four years later, on April 1, 1913, came to Horse Cave, establishing his offices on Front Street and entering upon a general medical and surgical practice. He found here appreciation of his medical knowledge and surgical skill and in a short time won his way into the esteem and confidence of his fellow citizens, and to such an extent that he scarcely found time in April, 1917, to take a coveted post graduate course in the Chicago Post Graduate School.

In the meanwhile the great war was casting a heavy shadow over the United States and the urgent call went out for competent medical men. Doctor Honaker reported for active duty on December 13, 1917. He was commissioned a first lieutenant in the Medical Corps and was dispatched to Camp Greenleaf, Georgia, where he remained until March 27, 1918, and while there took advantage of the opportunity to take a month's course on special subjects coming under his immediate care, devoting two weeks to diseases affecting the lungs and two to those affecting the heart. During April, 1918, Doctor Honaker was employed in the Charity Hospital, New Orleans, Louisiana, doing special fracture work, on the last day of that month being transferred to Camp Hancock, Augusta, Georgia, where he operated in the base hospital as assistant cardiovascular specialist, in which work he engaged for nine weeks. For six weeks following he officiated as ward surgeon and then as receiving officer until September 26, 1918. He reported then to Evacuation Hospital No. 36, Camp Wheeler, Georgia, and on the above date was commissioned captain, in recognition of his thoroughness, skill, efficiency and loyalty.

On October 26, 1918, Doctor Honaker left Camp

Wheeler and on October 31, 1918, at Hoboken, New Jersey, embarked for France, landing at Brest on November 9, 1918, where he remained until November 27, when he went to Rennes, France, where the military forces had opened a hospital in the center of four units, Doctor Honaker being made commander of one of these units. These units were closed December 23, 1918, without ever having received patients. On January 3, 1919, Evacuation Hospital No. 36 relieved Base Hospital No. 34 at Nantes, France, and functioned as a base hospital, Doctor Honaker serving as chief of medical service until No. 36 was closed May 28, 1919. He was relieved from the unit on June 8, 1919, was made a casual and ordered home. He set sail from Saint Nazaire, France, on June 17, 1919, landed at Hoboken, New Jersey, June 26, 1919, and was discharged at Camp Dix Wrightstown, New Jersey, June 28, 1919, and on the following day reached his home at Horse Cave, after nearly two years of faithful service and such broadening experiences as can only come through such a calamity as war. Doctor Honaker immediately resumed private practice and today is numbered with the leading men of his profession in Hart County.

Doctor Honaker married November 27, 1906, Miss Verdine W. Slate, who is a daughter of W. C. and Mary (Jones) Slate, the latter of whom resides at Scottsville, Kentucky. The father of Mrs. Honaker was a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Scottsville at the time of his death. Doctor and Mrs. Honaker have three children: Ralph C., born January 1, 1909; Henry A., born September 5, 1912; and Mavis, born April 21, 1915. Doctor Honaker owns the comfortable family home, a modern residence on Main Street. With his family he belongs to the Christian Church, in which he is an elder.

In political life Doctor Honaker, like his father before him, has always been a republican. He was appointed designated examiner of the United States Public Health Service of Hart County March 12, 1920, and continues in this office. He is identified with various scientific bodies and is a member of the Hart County Medical Society, the Kentucky State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. In Masonic circles he is well and widely known. He belongs to Bear Hallow Lodge No. 231, F. and A. M., Horse Cave, Kentucky, of which he is worshipful master; Bostwick Chapter, R. A. M., of which he is high priest; Glasgow Commandery No. 36, K. T., at Glasgow, Kentucky; Horse Cave Council No. 46, R. and S. M.; Rizpah Temple A. A. O. N. M. S. of Madisonville, Kentucky; the Horse Cave Chapter of the Order of the Eastern Star.

GEN. SIMON BOLIVAR BUCKNER was the last surviving lieutenant general of the Confederate army and the only lieutenant general that Kentucky ever had on either side. He was one of the South's great military leaders, and was almost continuously in active service from his graduation from West Point in 1844 until after the war between the states, having won his early fame in the war with Mexico. Twenty years after the war between the states he was called from the quiet dignity of his country home to the office of governor and distinguished himself in civil administration as he had on many battlefields. The modern generation of Americans probably recalls him chiefly as candidate for vice president on the Gold Standard ticket of 1896.

In the following biography only brief reference is made to those impressive services which he rendered the state and which are properly in the province of the general historian. The article as here given largely follows the lines of a sketch written by Colonel Polk Johnson in a chapter entitled Three Representative Kentuckians, one of whom was Simon Bolivar Buckner.

Gen. Simon Bolivar Buckner was born April 21, 1823, in the house at Glen Lily, Hart County, Kentucky, the same house, it is interesting to note, at which he died January 8, 1914, at the venerable age of ninety-one. He was the son of Aylette Hartswell Buckner, who was born in Albemarle County, Virginia, January 13, 1793, and of Elizabeth Ann (Morehead) Buckner, born in Kentucky August 9, 1801, a daughter of Colonel Turner Morehead, who distinguished himself under General Anthony Wayne at the battle of Stony Point, New York, during the Revolutionary War. General Buckner's father was brought to Kentucky by his parents at an early age and spent his long and useful life in this State. The military ardor of the son was a direct inheritance from the father, who as a volunteer soldier joined the army under General Harrison and was with that officer at the battle of the Thames.

General Buckner received his primary education in academies at Hodgenville and Hopkinsville, and received his appointment to West Point in June, 1840. He graduated in 1844 and was breveted second lieutenant, Second United States Infantry, July 1st. From August, 1845, until May, 1846, he was assistant professor of ethics at West Point. May 9, 1846, he was assigned to duty with the Sixth Infantry as second lieutenant and during the following winter he was on the Rio Grande, first under General Taylor, and later was ordered to join General Scott's army, with which he remained all the way from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico, serving as regimental quartermaster from August 8th to December 17, 1847 and participated in every battle. He was breveted First Lieutenant, August 20, 1847, for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Churubusco, and for similar reasons, was breveted Captain September 8th, after the battle of Molino del Rey. He was painfully wounded at Churubusco.

After the war with Mexico he was assistant instructor of Infantry Tactics at West Point from 1848 to 1850, was promoted to First Lieutenant December 31, 1851, and was made Captain Commissary of Subsistence November 3, 1852. He resigned from the army March 26, 1855.

On leaving the army he was for a short time located at Chicago where he was superintendent of construction for the Chicago Custom House in 1855. He was also Colonel of the Volunteers raised in Illinois in that year for the Utah Expedition, but was not mustered into service.

Returning to Kentucky in 1860 the young officer was appointed Inspector General of the State Guard with the rank of Major General. By means of camps of instruction, he formed the State Guard into a compact body of young men fit for any service in the field. In the War between the States many of these young men as officers in the Federal or Confederate armies, won high distinction. In 1861 General Buckner was in Washington and by reason of his military education and experience in actual warfare, was tendered by Mr. Lincoln a commission as Brigadier General in the Federal army which he declined. In September, 1861, having cast his fortunes with the South he was appointed a Brigadier General and for a time was in command of all the Kentucky troops in the Confederate service. Subsequently he was ordered with his command to Fort Donelson to reinforce the commands of Generals Pillow and Floyd, then threatened by the army under General Grant. After the withdrawal of Pillow and Floyd with their men he surrendered the fort February 16, 1862, to General Grant. The following eight months he remained a prisoner of war in solitary confinement at Fort Warren in Boston Harbor. After his exchange he was promoted to Major General in recognition of his gallant service at Fort Donelson. Reporting to General Bragg at Chattanooga he was placed in command of a Division of General Hardee's Corps, and accompanied the army into Kentucky, and had the honor of receiving the surrender of a large force of Federals at Munfordville, within a few miles of his boyhood home. He was present with his Division at Perryville October 8, 1862. When General Bragg withdrew from Kentucky he was ordered to the command of the Department of Southern Alabama with headquarters at Mobile, where his skill as an engineer did much toward perfecting the defenses of that city. In May, 1863, he was in command of the Department of East Tennessee and Western Virginia with headquarters at Knoxville. He was a corps commander at the great battle of Chickamauga September 19-20, 1863. In the spring of 1864 he reported to Lieutenant General James Longstreet and was ordered to join the army of Northern Virginia. In September of that year he was promoted to Lieutenant General and assigned as corps commander in the Trans-Mississippi Department. At the close of the war he surrendered at New Orleans. Being refused permission to return to Kentucky he took up his residence in New Orleans and was connected with the press of that city as an editorial writer for three years. After General Grant was elected president, Colonel Buckner was permitted to return to his native state, and for a time was editor of the Louisville Courier before its consolidation with the Journal.

For a number of years his attention was given to business and the affairs of his extensive estate in Hart County, then in 1887 he surrendered this peaceful routine to become an active candidate for Governor and was elected to that office, serving four years until 1891. Of his character and actions while Governor, Colonel Johnson wrote: "There were those who, while his ardent friends, feared that a man trained as a soldier and more familiar with the camp than with civil affairs, might not be successful in the direction of the affairs of the state, but these were soon relieved of their fears for the able soldier at once demonstrated that the rights of the people were safe under his guiding hand. The legislature which was in session soon after he became Governor, poured bill upon bill upon his desk, many of which were destined never to find their way to the book of statutes. No bill was too small to escape his watchful eye; no cunningly devised scheme to enrich its promoters ever secured his approval. He was a veritable sentinel on the watch tower of the state. Veto after veto stopped the progress of bills which were for the benefit of the few and against the real interests of the many. The hand which so long had held a sword, now grasped a pen and the principles set forth in his messages as those which he would unswervingly maintain, were those of a civilian and those messages, as was frequently said at the time, might have been written by a lawyer who had had long service on the bench. Men who had doubted the wisdom of his election hastened to assure him of their admiration for his administration and the watchful care with which he scrutinized every subject demanding his attention. Political opponents as well as personal and political friends hastened to do him honor."

While he was Governor he was elected by his home county as a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1891. The last great public honor done this noted son of Kentucky was his nomination at the Indianapolis Convention of Gold Standard Democrats with Gen. John M. Palmer of Illinois as candidate for President and Vice President of the sound money wing of the democratic party.

His first wife was a daughter of Major Kingsbury. In 1886 he married Delia Claiborne of Richmond, Virginia. Mrs. Buckner survives him and is an honored resident of Louisville. Her son is now a Major and an instructor at West Point Military Academy, holding the same office which his honored father held in 1852.

AUGUSTUS E. WILLSON has been a member of the Kentucky bar for half a century. When he began practice at Louisville in the '70s it was in the office of the eminent John M. Harlan, afterwards associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and for several years he was a partner of that great Kentuckian and jurist. Mr. Willson's professional reputation has been one of secure prestige and success for many years. He has held only one important public office, that of governor of Kentucky from 1907 to 1911. He was a real governor and his administration will go down in history because it set new standards in the vigorous conduct of public affairs. Mr. Willson was qualified for the governorship by a long apprenticeship in practical politics. For years he has been one of the constructive leaders in the republican party of Kentucky. He believed and earnestly advocated years ago that the best way to secure good government and healthy political conditions in the South was by building up the republican party to parity in numerical strength and influence with the dominant party of the old South. The approximation of that situation in Kentucky is an important result that must be credited as the greatest political service of Mr. Willson and outranking in value perhaps his official term as governor.

Some of the fundamentals of his character can be traced to his ancestors, who were among the hardy, earnest pioneers and home makers in New England and Western New York. Early in the nineteenth century his grandparents left their homes in New England and traveling over the wilderness trails settled in the pine clad mountains of Allegany County, New York. Hiram Willson, father of Governor Willson, was born at Windsor, Vermont, in 1807, and was a child when his parents moved to Western New York. He married Ann Colvin Ennis, who was born at Westerly, Rhode Island, in 1817. The grandfathers Willson and Ennis were farmers and lumbermen, and in Allegany County Hiram Willson had a farm and water power sawmill. The mother of Hiram Willson was a Webster, and the mother of Ann Ennis was Lurana Prosser, who lived to be eighty-four years old and was one of the strongest characters and most loved women of her day. In the pioneer home in Western New York she did all the housework, cooking, washing and ironing, and to the last she was the ruling spirit of the family. Governor Willson has always admired his pioneer grandmother, in whose home he spent several years of his boyhood.

During the early '40s Hiram Willson moved to Maysville, Kentucky, making the journey on a raft of his own lumber. Taking the raft out of the water, he set up a lumber yard in Maysville, and his family lived in Maysville only a year or so, but it was during that period that Augustus E. Willson was born on October 13, 1846. Hiram Willson in 1847 moved to Covington, and in 1852 to New Albany, Indiana. In New York he had been a Jackson democrat, had served a term as postmaster of his village and also as county school superintendent of Allegany County. He was a very strong, earnest man, and while his experience with the people in Maysville and Covington was entirely kindly and neighborly, he soon came to realize that slavery was injurious to a white man starting out for himself. While his relationship and acquaintance with the lumbermen of Western New York and Pennsylvania tied him to the river, he effected a transfer from a slave to a free state by crossing the Ohio to New Albany, Indiana. Subsequently he started another and larger lumber yard in what is now Cincinnati, and exposure in getting the lumber out of the river brought on consumption, from which he died in February, 1859. His wife had died at New Albany in 1856.

Because of his anti-slavery views Hiram Willson broke away from the democratic party after the election of 1852 and was one of a mere handful of men in New Albany who espoused and supported the republican party in 1856. At New Albany he continued his interest in the public schools, and was a trustee at the time of his death and was frequently referred to as the father of the public school system of that city. Hiram Willson was a true and faithful man, fearless in maintaining his opinions and sentiments, strong in his business and among other men, trusted and respected by everybody who knew him.

Augustus Willson was thirteen years old when his father died. The oldest of the four children was Forceythe Willson, the poet, author of "Old Sergeant," "In State," "Boy Britton," and other poems written during the war and published in Prentice's paper, the Louisville Journal. The "Old Sergeant" was a favorite poem of President Lincoln, and it is said that his notice of the lines brought Forceythe Willson into touch with Oliver Wendell Holmes and the group of great literary lights at Boston. Forceythe Willson married Elizabeth Conwell Smith, of Laurel, Indiana, who had the same tastes and similar gifts to those of her talented husband.

Augustus Willson after the death of his father went to live with his grandmother in Western New York, and while there he attended Alfred Academy, a Baptist institution in Allegany County. In 1864 his brother Forceythe, who had been compelled to abandon his education at Harvard on account of ill health, took his sisters and brothers to Cambridge, Massachusetts, and for their home he bought the old Elbridge Gerry place, one of the most beautiful in Cambridge. At Cambridge Doctor Holmes, Mr. Longfellow, Mr. Lowell and Mr. Emerson were very kind to Forceythe Willson and were frequently visitors at the Willson home. Forceythe Willson, while attending to some business in New Albany, was stricken with his last illness and then went to Alfred, New York, where his sister, Mary Frances, and youngest brother, Hiram Willson, Jr., were in school. He died there in 1867, in his thirtieth year.

Augustus Willson, while at his brother's home in Cambridge, prepared for Harvard College, and entered that institution in 1865. He was in his sophomore year when his brother died, and he left school to be at the side of his brother in his last illness. At his brother's expressed wish he returned to Harvard, accompanied by his sister and brother, who lived with him at Cambridge, and he was graduated in June, 1869, standing thirty-third in a class of 108. After his graduation he became a law student in the office of Lothrop, Bishop & Lincoln, Mr. Lothrop being president of the Boston & Maine Railroad and Mr. Bishop was afterward a governor of Massachusetts. After a few months, having sold the Cambridge home and settled his brother's estate, but leaving his brother and sister in school at Cambridge, Mr. Willson returned west in 1870, and during part of the winter lived with the family of Hon. Michael C. Kerr at New Albany. Mr. Kerr, then speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress, had been his father's lawyer and personal friend. In the fall of 1870 Mr. Willson took a letter from Mr. Kerr to Hon. John M. Harlan, and with this introduction he entered the law office of Harlan & Newman the same year and was admitted to the bar at Louisville. With the dissolution of the partnership of Harlan & Newman in 1870, he accompanied Judge Harlan to his new offices, and in May, 1874, was taken as a junior partner, a relationship which continued until General Harlan was appointed to the United States Supreme Court in 1878.

Toward the close of the year 1875, with Judge Harlan's permission and without interrupting their partnership relation, Mr. Willson accepted a temporary appointment as chief clerk of the Treasury Department of the United States under Col. Benjamin H. Bristow, Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Willson has always looked back upon that experience as the severest six months' work of his life. As chief clerk he had to visé all the correspondence, contracts and official acts of the secretary and the department, had general charge of the office staff, the purchase of supplies and supervision of the advertising by the treasury department throughout the United States. Mr. Willson resigned in the summer of 1876 and then resumed his place in the law office of Harlan & Willson at Louisville. When General Harlan began his duties on the Supreme Bench his place in the firm of Harlan & Willson was taken by his brother, Hon. James Harlan.

Mr. Willson practiced law steadily and with growing reputation nearly ten years before he began an active participation in politics. In 1879 he accepted the nomination for the State Senate in the Thirty-fourth Senatorial District, embracing a portion of the City of Louisville, and had the satisfaction of cutting down the democratic majority several hundred votes. In the campaign of 1880 he was a speaker for the republican ticket in Indiana and Pennsylvania, and in 1884 was a Blaine delegate to the National Convention at Chicago, where Blaine and Logan were nominated.

After that convention he accepted the republican nomination for Congress from the Louisville District, and it was during his campaign in that year and during his addresses in Tennessee as well as in Kentucky that he made his strong and earnest plea to the progressive young voters of the South to reenforce the republican party as a direct means of giving the South its proper participation in National affairs. Acting on that principle, Mr. Willson again and again accepted nominations to lead a forlorn hope in his home state, and was the republican nominee for Congress from the Fifth Kentucky District in 1884, 1886, 1888 and 1892, but declining to run in 1892 and in 1894, when election was sure. Governor Willson has sat as a delegate in republican national conventions from 1884 to 1908 with the exception of 1896, and in 1916 was delegate at large. He was first a republican candidate for nomination for governor in 1903. In 1907 he received the nomination by acclamation, and he was elected by a majority of 18,053.

Though a staunch republican, Governor Willson has never been a bitter partisan, and one of his important tasks when he became governor was to effect some rapprochement between the two bitterly hostile parties in the Legislature that would permit of the orderly dispatch of the business of state. One of his acts as governor was the pardon of former Governor Taylor, Caleb Powers and others in the Goebel cases. During his term occurred the culmination of the troubles in the tobacco districts and the depredations of the night riders. Governor Willson adopted prompt and efficient means of suppressing night riding, using the militia where necessary, and more effectually through his proclamation to the people that they should defend their homes and that for their acts of defense they would need no lawyer, since the governor himself would protect them. While such measures were eagerly seized upon by his political opponents to discredit his administration, his acts even then were approved by the majority of good citizens without regard to party.

Governor Willson was made chairman of the first Governors' Conference called by President Roosevelt, and again the following year was elected chairman, the motion for his election being offered by Charles E. Hughes, then governor of New York. Governor Willson has been in touch with political leaders in Kentucky and over the nation for nearly half a century. He has had some part in every campaign since 1876, and he has spoken in every county of Kentucky and also in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois and Missouri. In 1914 he received the republican nomination at the primaries for United States senator. It was Governor Willson's suggestion that led to the highly fitting selection of James Breckenridge Speed to present to the commonwealth the noble statue of Abraham Lincoln in the state capitol.

Governor Willson received the Master of Arts degree from Harvard University in 1870. His alma mater bestowed upon him the honorary LL. D. degree in 1908, and he was similarly honored by the University of Kentucky and Berea College in 1908. He is a member of the Harvard Club of New York, Harvard Club of Chicago and Harvard Club of Kentucky, former president of the Associated Harvard Clubs and served eight years, from 1910 to 1918 as a member of the board of overseers of Harvard University. He is also a member of the Pendennis Club and the Louisville Country Club.

At Louisville, July 23, 1877, Governor Willson married Mary Elizabeth Ekin. Her father, General James A. Ekin, was deputy quartermaster general of the United States army. Mrs. Willson was born at Elizabeth, Pennsylvania, and has three direct ancestors who were officers in the War of the Revolution, Col. Stephen A. Bayard, Maj. John Walker and Maj. Aeneas Mackay. The only child, a son, born to Governor and Mrs. Willson died in infancy.

BULLITT FAMILY. The annals of the Bullitt family almost coincide in point of time with the history of Kentucky as the home of white men, and in every generation the family has given one or more men to leadership in the law and in public affairs. The following is a concise record of some of the outstanding names in this family, including a representative of the present generation, William Marshall Bullitt of the law firm Bruce & Bullitt at Louisville. Mr. Bullitt's residence is "Oxmoor" at St. Matthews, Kentucky, the home that has been continuously in the Bullitt family since 1785.

The Bullitt family is of Huguenot origin. The earliest ancestor in this country was Joseph Bullitt (died 1693) who was in Maryland as early as 1653; married, in 1685, Elizabeth Brandt (daughter of Capt. Randolph Brandt, one of the prominent men in early Maryland history) by whom he had only two children, the first, Joseph, dying unmarried in early life, while the second Benjamin Bullitt (born April 28, 1693, died 1766) married first Elizabeth Harrison (daughter of Thomas Harrison of Chappawampsic), of which marriage the only issue were (1) Joseph who died a bachelor, (2) Elizabeth who married a Mr. Combs, (3) Capt. Thomas Bullitt, noted below, (4) Benjamin killed in battle at the age of nineteen, unmarried, and (5) Judge Cuthbert Bullitt.

Capt. Thomas Bullitt (1730-1778) was an officer in General Washington's regiment in the French and Indian war of 1754; served under General Washington in building a line of frontier forts across the country, owned the present site of Hot Springs, Virginia, which he devised to his brother Cuthbert; commanded a company at Great Meadows; was at Braddock's defeat in 1755; at Grant's defeat in 1758, he saved a part of the army from destruction, and his conduct won special commendation from General Washington in his report to Governor Fauquier. He was in the expedition against Fort Duquesne; was one of the signers to the address of the officers of the Virginia Regiment to Col. George Washington on his retirement as commander of the Virginia troops, December 27, 1758. In 1763 he was a signer of the Articles of Association of the Mississippi Company which Washington organized; assisted Washington in 1771 in distributing the land gratuities to the soldiers of the 1754 campaign; in 1773 he headed a surveying expedition to Kentucky and made a celebrated trip alone to the Shawnees at Chillicothe, and in August 1773 he surveyed and laid out the present town of Louisville. He was one of the earliest to take part in the Revolution; commanded a company of Regulars at the battle of Great Bridge in Virginia in 1775; was Adjutant General of the Virginia forces; and was appointed by the Continental Congress as Deputy Adjutant General of the Southern Department of the Continental Army with rank of Lieutenant-Colonel and he served in South Carolina. He died in February, 1778, leaving most of his estate to his brother Judge Cuthbert Bullitt.

Judge Cuthbert Bullitt was born in 1740, and in 1760 he married Helen Scott (daughter of Rev. James Scott), and died in Prince William County, Virginia, on August 27, 1791. He held various offices under the official government and was Judge of the General Court of Virginia. His children consisted of four daughters and two sons, the younger of whom was Thomas James Bullitt, a distinguished lawyer of Maryland whose descendants still live there.

His eldest child, Alexander Scott Bullitt, was born at Dumfries, Virginia, in 1762. He was a member of the Virginia House of Delegates in 1783, moved to Kentucky during the same year, was commissioned by Patrick Henry as Major in the militia of Prince William County on May 16, 1785, and as County Lieutenant of Jefferson County on May 2, 1786; was appointed one of the trustees of Louisville by the Virginia Legislature; and was president of the Court Martial which on March 21, 1787, tried and convicted Col. Hugh McGary. He was a member of the Kentucky Convention at Danville in 1788; a delegate to the Constitutional Convention in 1792, and, with George Nicholas, drafted the first Constitution of Kentucky, which was then adopted; elected one of the forty electors on the first Tuesday in May, 1792, was then chosen as one of the eleven State Senators; and upon the assembling of the first Kentucky Legislature at Lexington on June 4, 1792, he was elected Speaker of the Senate and was re-elected for twelve years in succession (1792-1804), when he retired from public life. He was President of the Constitutional Convention which met at Frankfort, July 22, 1799, and which framed the second constitution of Kentucky that continued in force until 1850. In May 1800 he was elected the first Lieutenant Governor of the State. He was an Episcopalian. He died April 13, 1816.

In 1785 he married Priscilla Christian whose father Col. William Christian (1743-1786) a distinguished Colonial and Revolutionary soldier, was a captain in the French and Indian war before he was twenty years of age; married Patrick Henry's sister; was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, Colonel of the Fincastle Regiment in Dunmore's war; was a member of the General State Convention in 1775. In July, 1775, the Virginia Convention elected him Lieutenant-Colonel to resist Governor Dunmore. In 1776 the Continental Congress elected him Lieutenant Colonel under Patrick Henry as Colonel, of the First Virginia Regiment, and he subsequently succeeded Patrick Henry as Colonel; commanded several expeditions against the Cherokee Indians and in 1780 was appointed County Lieutenant of Jefferson County; in 1781 headed a commission to conclude a treaty with the Cherokee Indians; was a member of the Virginia Legislature for several years, held various positions in Kentucky, and brought his family there in August, 1785, settling upon his 2,000 acre survey on Beargrass Creek, which had been surveyed for him in June, 1774. He resided there until he was killed by the Indians on April 9, 1786.

William C. Bullitt (February 14, 1793-August 28, 1877), son of Alex Scott Bullitt and his wife Priscilla Christian, practiced law in Louisville for a few years, and then retired to the family farm, Oxmoor. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1849. On September 1, 1819, he married Mildred Ann Fry (July 9, 1798-July 12, 1879), the great-granddaughter of Colonel Joshua Fry, who at his death was Commander in Chief of the Virginia forces in the French and English War in 1754, under whom General Washington was then serving as Lieutenant Colonel. She was also the granddaughter of Dr. Thomas Walker. Of their children, Joshua F. Bullitt was Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky; John C. Bullitt moved to Philadelphia and became one of the most distinguished lawyers in the United States, and another was Thomas W. Bullitt.

James K Patterson

Thomas W. Bullitt was born at Oxmoor about eight miles from Louisville on May 17, 1838, graduated Centre College in 1858, studied law with his brother, John C. Bullitt in Philadelphia, joined the Confederate Army in 1862, served in Morgan's Cavalry until captured in July, 1863. He was confined in the penitentiary in Columbus, Ohio, and later at Fort Delaware until the close of the war.

He began the practice of law in Louisville in 1865 and remained in active practice until his death, on March 3, 1910. He had a large practice, chiefly along the lines of railroad and corporation law. He was counsel for the Southern branch of the Presbyterian Church in the litigation regarding the division of the church property after the Civil war. He was a director in, counsel for, and active in the organization of the Kentucky Title Company, Kentucky & Indiana Bridge Company, Louisville Southern Railroad, Union National Bank, Fidelity Trust Company, and Kentucky Title Savings Bank & Trust Company. He was a democrat until after the nomination of Mr. Bryan in 1896, when he became one of the organizers of the Palmer and Buckner ticket, and thereafter he voted independently.

On February 21, 1871, he married Annie Priscilla Logan, daughter of Judge Caleb W. Logan (Judge of the Louisville Chancery Court) and Agatha Marshall (daughter of Dr. Louis Marshall) the niece of Chief Justice John Marshall.

William Marshall Bullitt, their eldest son, of Louisville, was born March 4, 1873; received his preparatory education in Louisville and at Lawrenceville, New Jersey, graduated at Princeton University in the class of 1894, graduated from the University of Louisville Law School on April 26, 1895, and immediately began the practice of law in his father's office, subsequently becoming a partner, and so continued until his father's death.

William Marshall Bullitt is a director and member of the Executive Committee of the Fidelity and Columbia Trust Company, a director of the Kentucky Title Company, and a director in and counsel for the Citizens Union National Bank and the Citizens Union Fourth Street Bank; and before the Clayton Act prohibited interlocking directorates he was a director in and counsel for the First National Bank and the Kentucky Title Savings Bank & Trust Company. At one time he was a director representing the minority interests in the Louisville, Henderson & St. Louis Railroad. In 1899 and 1902 he edited editions of Bullitt's Civil and Criminal Codes of Kentucky.

He has always been a republican; was counsel for the Republican contestants in the fraudulent election of 1905 which resulted in the Court setting aside the election of City and County officers in Louisville and Jefferson County, and ordered a new election. He was chairman of the Board of Public Safety of Louisville from November 14, 1907, until May, 1909. He was a Delegate from the State at large to the Republican National Convention of 1908 and 1916. He was Solicitor General of the United States under the Taft administration during the years 1912-13. In 1914 he was the republican nominee for the United States Senate and was defeated. In 1918-1919 he was a Major and Deputy Commissioner for France of the American Red Cross. In 1921 he was employed as Special Counsel for the United States Shipping Board in some of its especially important litigation and controversies in New York and Boston, spending a large part of his time during the winter of 1921-22 in Washington, New York and Boston.

He is a member of the Metropolitan, City Midway and National Republican Clubs of New York; the Metropolitan and Chevy Chase Clubs of Washington, the Pendennis, Louisville Country and River Valley Clubs of Louisville. He is a member of the Bar Association of the City of New York, American Bar Association, Kentucky Bar Association and Louisville Bar Association. He is a member of the Sons of the American Revolution and of the Society of Colonial Wars.

On May 31, 1913, he married at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, Miss Nora Iasigi of Boston. They have three children, Thomas W., Nora Iasigi and Barbara.

He has been actively engaged in the practice of law all his life. His practice has been principally along corporate lines. He has argued many cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, some of the more important being those which involved the constitutionality of various State and Federal laws, particularly the Newspaper Publicity Act, Federal Farm Loan Act, Income Tax Act as applied to salaries of Federal Judges, War Time Prohibition Act and Eighteenth Amendment; as well as the Anti-removal Statutes of Kentucky and Arkansas, Insurance Tax Premium Act, and the "Vance Act" (being the fifty cent a gallon whiskey Tax Act).

In 1915 he was active in the First Plattsburg Military Training Camp, and thereafter has continued very active in the organization and continuance of the Plattsburg Military Camp for Civilians.

PATTERSON. A home on the campus of the University of Kentucky shelters two men, both now in advanced years, whose lives, character, energy and enthusiasm have represented a singular devotion to the cause of education in Kentucky. The elder is James Kennedy Patterson, for forty-one years head of the Agricultural and Mechanical College, now the University of Kentucky, and the younger is Walter Kennedy Patterson, who for over thirty years was the active administrative head and principal of the State College Academy. Walter K. Patterson never married, and the children of his brother are dead. It is appropriate to repeat what was said some years ago. "To the Kentuckian who knows and appreciates the Pattersons of Lexington, the thought comes with keen regret that when the two fine men who now represent the family go hence the name and lineage will be extinct."

Their parents were Andrew and Janet (Kennedy) Patterson. Andrew Patterson, who was born in Scotland, March 27, 1801, had a common school education and was a calico printer, his father, James Patterson, having followed the trade of block cutter or engraver of patterns on wood for calico printing. The Pattersons were of Covenant stock, and a flag is still preserved which was carried by a Patterson at the battle of Bothwell Brig, the scene of Monmouth's bloody defeat of the Covenanters in 1679. Andrew Patterson brought his family to America in 1842 and died in Indiana, December 24, 1862. Janet Kennedy was born in Scotland, November 18, 1806, daughter of William Kennedy, also a block cutter by trade. One of his brothers was a graduate of the University of Glasgow and became a Presbyterian minister.

James Kennedy Patterson was the oldest of five sons, upon all of whom were impressed the clean, honest, honorable nature of the father, and the decidedly strong and admirable character of the mother. Three of the sons, William, Andrew and Alexander, died during the decade of the '60s, before their attainments had made them widely known.

James Kennedy Patterson was born at Glasgow, Scotland, March 26, 1833, and from the age of nine lived with his parents on a farm in Bartholomew County, Indiana. While there were no schools in the community, he had the benefit of association with persons of intelligence and made good use of their small libraries containing such works as Plutarch's Lives, Hume's History of England, and the works of Byron, Pope and Shakespeare. He first regularly attended school in February, 1849, at Madison, Indiana, and in 1856 was graduated with the honors of his class from Hanover College. He had begun teaching in 1850 and continued teaching at intervals during his college career. He was awarded the Master of Arts degree by Hanover in 1859 and the honorary Ph. D. degree by the same college in 1875. In 1866 Lafayette College conferred upon him the degree of LL. D., and he was similarly honored by the University of Vermont in 1910 and the University of Kentucky in 1916.

Doctor Patterson came to Kentucky after graduating, and from 1856 to 1859 was principal of the Greenville Presbyterian Academy. During 1860-61 he was professor of Latin and Greek at Stewart College in Clarks-ville, Tennessee, until the college suspended operations on account of the war. He then removed to Kentucky and was employed as principal of the Transylvania High School until 1865. On the consolidation of Kentucky University with Transylvania he was appointed professor of Latin and Civil History under the new organization, and held the chair of professor of History and Metaphysics from 1865 to 1910. In 1869 he was elected president of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Kentucky, which had become one of the colleges of Kentucky University. In 1879 this college was put on an independent footing by the Legislature, and at the reorganization he was unanimously elected president. His service as president was practically continuous from 1869 to 1910, the longest period of service as college president in America. In 1908 the Legislature changed the State College into the State University, which later became the University of Kentucky. After a service of forty-one years Doctor Patterson resigned in 1910 and was then made President Emeritus.

It need not be said that nothing except the most consecrated service, the most careful management, the most scrupulous economy could have accomplished these things. Every building on the campus at the present time (1921) with one exception was erected during Doctor Patterson's administration. In the case of three or four buildings the expense of building and equipment was provided for from the carefully hoarded remnant of an all too meager annual income. In 1882, when the college was just entering upon its independent career, when its opponents were striking at its very existence in the Legislature, the first three buildings on the campus were in the process of erection. It was discovered by President Patterson and the executive committee that the architects either through careless management or by gross misrepresentation had miscalculated the cost of completing the buildings. The banks refused to lend to the institution which had such a precarious existence except on personal security. President Patterson took to the banks securities representing the diligent savings of his entire life and pledged his private resources to borrow the money required to continue the building, although he well knew that should the Legislature repeal the one-half cent tax, as was feared it would do, his all would be lost. Such personal devotion as this has rarely been manifested in a public institution, and it was by belief in the product of his life and heart that the college weathered the storm. The struggling effort of this man to preserve the institution has proven a brilliant success. The institution which could then be assured of nothing seems destined to receive from Kentucky whatever is needed to make it most useful to the youth of the state.

One can form some conception of what Doctor Patterson did for the cause of higher education during the years of his presidency by the enumeration of the following facts: In 1878, the last year of the alliance of the Agricultural and Mechanical College with the old Kentucky University, the total enrollment was 78, the year before his retirement in 1910 the student body numbered 1,064. In 1880 there were four graduates, in 1910, eighty-five. In 1880 the income was $9,900, in 1910 it was $140,000. Grounds, buildings and equipment that had grown from nothing to an estimated value of $930,000 were turned over to his successor in 1910.

A distinctive service rendered to the college was his memorable and successful fight during 1881-82 to sustain the constitutionality of the act levying a tax for the support of the State College, and he carried on this contest before the Legislature and in the courts almost single handed and alone and to a successful issue. This $\frac{1}{2}$ -cent tax, as it was called, had been levied by an act passed by the General Assembly of 1880. It had been passed by small majorities amid strong opposition from the denominational colleges. The provisions of the act gave to the Agricultural and Mechanical College annually the proceeds of a tax of one-half of 1 cent on each \$100 of taxable property in the commonwealth. This was the first tax levied by any Legislature to assist in the maintenance of the State College. Its annual income through all the years was, as has been stated, \$9,900, the revenue from the sum of money which had been realized from the sale of the land scrip voted to each state by the National Congress at the time of the establishment of Agricultural and Mechanical colleges. The $\frac{1}{2}$ -cent tax brought to the institution an income of twice this amount, making the net income for the year 1881, \$27,500. Great hopes were entertained by President Patterson in spite of the fact the opposition was in the air and had manifestly not subsided. It was a time of bitter denominational rancor and men felt that should the Legislature be lavish with this college it meant the extermination of the denominational college and its opponents resolved to bring about a repeal in the following session of the Legislature. The constitutionality of the tax was assailed, and with the ablest legal talent in Kentucky against the tax it seemed a hopeless task to attempt to defend it. John G. Carlisle was asked by the college to maintain the case, but declined because he thought it could not be defended. In this emergency Doctor Patterson prepared and delivered before a crowded house a reply to Judge Lindsay's argument attacking the tax. He won on every point, and this tax, with all subsequent state levies, was saved for the state institution. This reply is one of the most brilliant and lucid arguments ever presented in the General Assembly of Kentucky.

In 1887 he was also an effective advocate of the Hatch Bill in Congress to provide for the creation and endowment of experiment stations, and also assisted in the passage of the Morrill Act of 1890 for the further endowment of agricultural and mechanical colleges. The higher educational facilities of the State of Kentucky up to 1910 are of themselves the chief monument to Doctor Patterson's life and activities.

Doctor Patterson was president of the Association of Land Grant Colleges in 1903. He was a delegate to the International Geographical Congress at Paris in 1875, to the British Association at Bristol in 1875, and at Leeds, England, in 1890. During 1871-74, at the invitation of Col. Henry Watterson, he wrote all the editorials on foreign politics for the Louisville Courier-Journal. He became widely known as a writer and lecturer. He is a Fellow of the Royal Historical Society of Great Britain, the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, has been vice president of the American Civic Alliance, a member of the American Geographic Society, the American Historical Association, American Academy of Political and Social Science, National Association of State Universities, International Tax Association. He is a member of the Filson Club of Louisville, the Beta Theta Pi Club of New York and Authors Club of London. He has served as a trustee of Hanover College, Indiana, and of the University of Walter K. Patterson.

Kentucky. To be named a life member of the board of trustees of two institutions is a recognition which comes to few men. In 1919 the board of trustees of Hanover College honored him thus and in 1920 the Legislature of this commonwealth passed an act naming him by virtue of his office of President Emeritus a member of the board of trustees of the University of Kentucky during his life. The act further provides that at his death the office and trusteeship shall be automatically abolished.

December 29, 1859, James K. Patterson married Lucelia W. Wing, daughter of Capt. Charles F. and Nancy (Campbell) Wing. Her grandfather was a rich whaler of New Bedford, who lost a large part of his fortune during the War of the Revolution and moved to Kentucky about 1800. Her maternal grandfather, Col. William Campbell, was a first cousin of the Revolutionary leader, Campbell, at the battle of King's Mountain. Mrs. Patterson's oldest sister became the wife of Honorable Edward Rumsey, a member of Congress and nephew of James Rumsey, inventor of the steamboat which made its trial run on the Potomac in 1786 in the presence of George Washington and whose models after his death came into the possession of Robert Fulton. Doctor and Mrs. Patterson had two children, William Andrew and Jeanie Rumsey. The latter died at the age of seven months. The son was born in Lexington, April 12, 1868, and died June 3, 1895, when his brilliant intellectual attainments were just beginning to bear fruit.

The loss of this only son was a blow from which Doctor Patterson imperfectly recovered and from which his wife never did. The mainspring and motive in their life was gone and thenceforth Doctor Patterson found his greatest solace and comfort in building up the institution, animated as were Governor Leland Stanford and his wife, with the hope and purpose that the children of all Kentucky should receive the benefits of an education. He has given his life to the sons of many men—he whose only son was removed from him by an all wise Providence.

The loss of their son bound the husband and wife all the more closely. They were entirely devoted to each other, their inclinations and enjoyments being singularly related. Mrs. Patterson was a writer of ability. She had a passionate love for the beauties of the English language, and was a good French scholar and linguist. She was an accomplished musician and portrait painter. On the 10th of September, 1915, after a union of almost fifty-six years, Mrs. Patterson passed away. She had been a great help and inspiration to her husband. Her family was a distinguished one in the early pioneer days, and she lent dignity and grace to the president's home on the campus no less than the charm of a devoted wife. She was a member of the Daughters of the American Revolution and entitled to membership in the Colonial Dames of America.

Doctor Patterson has had almost a genius for making friends. It is likewise true that he, in common with all men in public life, possessed of courageous belief, has had at various times and periods keen enemies, but, as he once remarked to the writer with the characteristic Scotch twinkle in his eye, he never turned his back upon a friend nor a foe. At home and abroad his friends have been his great joy. Many of the most distinguished men of the last century were personally known to him. It was also to him that a group of eminent scholars in this nation owed their earlier training. These include James Lane Allen, the late Champ Clark, William B. Smith, by some considered the greatest scholar in America, Professor Thomas H. Morgan of Columbia University, Dr. Benjamin Warfield of Princeton and Ethelbert Dudley Warfield of Wilson College.

For a number of years among his correspondents were Sir John Lubbock, John Tyndall, Edward Freeman, M. Ferdinand Maury, librarian of the Tuileries, Dr. Charles Rogers, Professor Mansel and Professor Williams of Oxford. In later years there have been three men, two of them Scotchmen by birth, who have been very close friends—James Wilson, the secretary of agriculture in the cabinets of four presidents, Andrew Carnegie, the great philanthropist, and Henry Clews, one of the most distinguished financiers of his time.

To few men during their lifetime is it given to enjoy such love and esteem as has President Emeritus Patterson. His birthdays are observed in practically all of the Alumni clubs, and the townspeople of Lexington and the citizens of the state generally delight in his appearance. His race is almost run, but like St. Paul, he has fought a good fight, he has kept the faith for Kentucky and for her University.

PATTERSON. Walter Kennedy Patterson, brother of James Kennedy Patterson, was born in Bartholomew County, Indiana, August 18, 1844. He was educated in the public schools and under the tutelage of his brother. In 1866 the honorary degree, Master of Arts, was conferred on him by the University of Kentucky.

He began teaching in 1863, being assistant in the Transylvania High School at Lexington, Kentucky. This position he held for two years. From 1869 to 1872 he was principal of Bethel Academy at Nicholasville, Kentucky. This was one of the good preparatory schools of the state. The next three years, from 1873 to 1876, he was principal of McAfee Institute in Mercer County, Kentucky. It was attended by both boys and girls, and at that time was one of the best secondary schools in the state. It was in an old Presbyterian settlement and among people who wanted the best education to be had. Many of the students from this school went to Central University at Richmond, Kentucky, and to Centre College at Danville, Kentucky. From 1876 to 1879 he was principal of Central Academy in Fayette County, Kentucky.

With his nearly twenty years experience in teaching and in managing preparatory schools he was now ready to enter upon his great work. In 1880 he became principal of the Academy of the University of Kentucky, and held this position until 1911, when the school ceased to exist by an act of the Legislature, which excluded all secondary instruction in connection with the University. Public education in the state in 1880 did not extend beyond the graded school, with but few exceptions. A few of the larger cities had public high schools, but in general it was the private school that prepared students for college and for life. During the early years of its existence the Academy had more students than the University proper. In these years the college departments reached down and taught sub-freshman students and thus helped the Academy in its work.

The Academy of the University of Kentucky served as a sort of model school for the other preparatory schools of the state. Its course of study and its high standard of scholarship was an elevating influence of incalculable value. The University of Kentucky is noted for the general success of its graduates, and much of the credit for this is due to the substantial training that large numbers of them received in the Academy, though a majority of the Academy students did not enter college at all but went away to begin their life work at once.

In this position Professor Patterson showed his great ability as teacher and organizer. Throughout his long tenure as principal it was generally conceded that the Academy was one of the best organized departments of the University. He chose his teachers with great care. They were from the best schools of the country and were men of good scholarship and of high character. A more earnest and capable corps of teachers was not to be found anywhere else. When a boy came to enter this school he was first given a thorough examination and was then assigned to classes for which he was fitted. Throughout the course the principal kept a close watch upon his record and advanced him as fast as he could go, but no faster. No student was held back nor was anyone pushed into water beyond his depth. It often happened that the principal, seeing the ability of some boy or group of boys, would provide an extra class for them and thus allow them to advance beyond their expectation. No principal ever gave more personal attention to his students, and none ever treated them with more absolute fairness. Both teachers and students were happy in their work under him. He seemed to direct the school without effort. The secret of his management was that he ruled with a steady, even pressure. He not only directed the school but he also taught as a regular teacher in it. While most of his teaching was done before the time of the so-called trained teacher, still if one of the trained teachers had visited the classroom of Prof. Walter K. Patterson he would have found all the best methods employed there. To begin with, there was no student in the class who did not belong there. They were able to do the work and they did it. Such explanation was made as was necessary. They were not lectured overmuch. They had respect for the authority and personality of the teacher. Everything that went on in his room was orderly and natural and inspiring. There was no over stimulation and no repression. The students were at their best in his classroom. Those who had the good fortune to study under him personally will always consider him one of the greatest teachers they have known.

He ably assisted his brother in all his work as president of the University, each supplementing the work of the other. The president was the brilliant, versatile, scholarly, eloquent man; Professor Patterson was the determined, persistent, tenacious worker. The University owes him an especial debt for his services in connection with Patterson Hall. Almost single handed he secured the appropriation to build the Hall. This was from the Legislature of the year 1900. The bill to appropriate the money was introduced early in January. In the latter part of the month Governor Goebel was assassinated. During the remainder of the session conditions were much disturbed, and ten days before the adjournment of the Legislature all the other workers for the University appropriation gave up in despair and left the Capital. He remained steadfast, and two days before adjournment the Legislature passed the bill appropriating $60,000. One-half of this was used to build the gymnasium. The remaining half was not enough to build the girl's dormitory, and he went before the Legislature of 1902 and secured an additional $30,000 to complete the building. These were the first appropriations made to the University for buildings and paved the way for future grants. He was also very active in getting the Hall located on its present site, which would probably now be preferred by all to the other locations which were proposed for it. However, at that time there was a determined minority that wanted it built on another lot. The site had been selected by the Board of Trustees at their June meeting in 1902. The minority now began to make trouble. The parties who owned the lot selected now said that all taxes due on the property (county, state, municipal and street) must be assumed by the University. The Executive Committee would not accept these terms. Prof. Walter K. Patterson stepped in and guaranteed the taxes, and in the end paid over $400 of the amount, the county and state taxes having been remitted. Next, the title to the property was questioned, and again the Executive Committee balked. Professor Patterson then proposed to buy the property himself and to transfer it by a general warranty deed to the University. This offer was accepted, and with the president supporting him the transfer was made in this way. Not content with his service to Patterson Hall, he gave up active teaching during the year 1903-04 and superintended the construction of the building.

Another great service he rendered the University was in representing it before the Constitutional Convention which met in 1890. At each meeting of the Legislature from 1880 to 1890 an effort was made to repeal the half-cent tax bill, which had been passed for the support of the University. The opponents of the University made their final effort before the Constitutional Convention. They wanted the tax in favor of the University omitted from the new constitution. President Patterson was in Europe with his son, who was ill, and could not return. The members of the convention from Lexington and Fayette County asked Prof. Walter K. Patterson to represent the interests of the University. This he did very ably. He went to Frankfort whenever his presence was thought necessary and by his patient, systematic and adroit work he won over many delegates who were at first against the University. When the Convention reached the educational section in February 1891, the opposition made long and clever arguments against the tax, alleging that this was only the entering wedge and that later large sums would be asked for by the University. It should be emphasized, however, that they were not so much against the half-cent tax in itself as they were opposed to the principle of the State giving aid to higher education, claiming that the State had done its whole duty to the cause of education by establishing and maintaining the common schools. To meet this argument a concise statement had been prepared showing what some of the other states had done for higher education and which by comparison made a poor showing for Kentucky. Before the time for voting came a copy of this statement was put on the desk of every member, and when the vote was counted the University had won. About this same time the Court of Appeals decided in favor of the constitutionality of the half-cent tax and the cause of the University was completely won. These are only a few instances of his service to the University. He constantly rendered such service, working quietly, never speaking in public, and but few people knew the value of his assistance to the president of the University.

The words of the ancient dramatist, Terence, will apply to Professor Walter K. Patterson—"I am a man; I consider nothing human foreign to me." He is quite a human character. Reared on a farm, he learned to love nature. He is no bookworm or recluse, but is fond of people, a lover of animals, and a capital story teller. He is never without one or more fine Scotch collies; he raises fine chickens, has a fancy for fine Jersey cattle, and all his life has taken an active and keen interest in politics. Scotchman, Presbyterian, democrat, bachelor—these four words will make any further sketch of him unnecessary.

He is a man of affairs, and since 1896 he has been a director of the Second National Bank of Lexington, Kentucky, and vice president of the same bank since 1915. Since giving up teaching in 1911 he has given much of his time to the bank. The Second National is conceded to be one of the most conservative and best managed banks in Lexington, and much credit for this is due to him. The same methods he used in building and managing schools he employed in the management of the bank. He has good judgment and is a tenacious worker.

But it is as a teacher and school administrator that he has made the largest impress. While a good business man, yet he has in this way influenced comparatively few people. As a teacher he has influenced thousands. And somehow he not only taught the students lessons from books, but he moulded them into a better form. They came out from under his instruction with orderly, regular habits of procedure, with some idea of organization, with their powers marshalled for use. This is certainly true of those who came in closer contact with him. He made use of the relationship between teacher and student for a larger purpose than instruction in books. He not only made scholars but he made men as well.

HON. EDWIN P. MORROW. While for many years an acknowledged leader of the republican party in Kentucky, the election of Edwin P. Morrow to the office of governor in 1919 was to a large degree an unpartisan tribute to his exalted character, his courage and honesty, and the administrative efficiency which the majority of the people demanded at that time in the administration of state affairs.

Governor Morrow is descended from a noted Scotchman, Dwight Morrow. His great-grandparents emigrated from Scotland and settled in Pennsylvania in the Colonial era, near what is now Harrisburg. Governor Morrow's father was Judge T. Z. Morrow, a native of Fleming County, Kentucky, and whose career was dignified by success as a lawyer and by honorable service on the bench. He was a graduate of Center College at Danville. He served as a colonel of infantry in the Union Army, was also in the Kentucky Senate during the war, and was one of the twenty-eight men who organized the republican party in Kentucky.

Edwin P. Morrow was born at Somerset, Pulaski County, Kentucky, November 28, 1878, son of Judge T. Z. and Jennie Crosson (Bradley) Morrow. Governor Morrow is a nephew of the late governor and United States senator, William O. Bradley, who died May 23, 1914, while still serving out his term in the United States Senate. The Bradleys were originally an Irish family, coming from County Mayo to Virginia. Governor Morrow's great-grandfather Bradley crossed the mountains from Virginia into Kentucky, and settled in what is now Madison County, where he was a pioneer blacksmith. Governor Morrow's maternal grandfather, Robert McAfee Bradley was born in Garrard County, Kentucky, March 27, 1808, and history gives him the distinction of being the ablest land lawyer the state ever knew.

Edwin P. Morrow had a public school education, and at the age of fourteen entered old St. Mary's College, a general preparatory school, near Lebanon, Kentucky. He was a student there during 1891-92, and for two years continued his higher education in Cumberland College. He took a prominent part in student activities, playing on the football and baseball teams and developing his abilities as a public speaker in the debating societies. For many years Governor Morrow has had a national reputation as a political and after-dinner speaker. He was only seventeen when in 1895 he took part in the campaign when his uncle, William O. Bradley was elected governor of Kentucky. At that time he was on the stump, speaking over a large district in school houses and court houses.

June 24, 1898, he volunteered as a private during the Spanish-American war, was trained at Lexington, and then at Anniston, Alabama, and was mustered out February 12, 1899, with rank as second lieutenant. Governor Morrow also attended the Williamsburg Institute in Kentucky, and studied law in the Cincinnati Law School, where he graduated with the LL.B. degree in 1900. He began his professional career at Lexington, where his work in the famous Mosby trial attracted much attention. A year and a half later he returned to his native Town of Somerset, and that town is still the legal residence of the governor. He served as city attorney four years and acquired a large commercial law practice, being attorney for one of the largest land companies in Kentucky, the Bauer Cooperage Company of Lawrenceburg, Indiana.

In 1910 President Taft appointed him United States district attorney for the eastern district of Kentucky, and he served until the early part of 1915. In 1912 he was the republican caucus nominee for United States senator, and received the votes of his party in the Kentucky General Assembly, but was defeated by Kentucky's eminent son, Ollie James. In 1911 he was prominently mentioned as the republican candidate for governor, but declined to make the race. In 1915 he was given the nomination of his party to the office of governor, practically without opposition, and made the race for that office against Augustus Owsley Stanley, and after one of the most spectacular campaigns ever witnessed in Kentucky, he was defeated by the narrow vote of 417. It was said by many that this was not a correct tabulation of the vote and did not express the vote as it had actually been given. In 1919 the Republican State Convention nominated Mr. Morrow for governor by acclamation, and in the election which followed, he was elected by more than 40,000 majority, though the state was normally 30,000 to 40,000 democratic. In this election he defeated Gov. James D. Black, who had succeeded Governor Stanley upon the latter's resignation. Governor Morrow was inaugurated December 9, 1919.

He is a Presbyterian, a member of the Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias and Elks, and is a member of the Lexington City Club and the Pendennis Club of Louisville.

In July, 1905, Governor Morrow married Katherine Hale Waddell, daughter of O. H. Waddell, a life-long friend of Judge T. Z. Morrow. Governor and Mrs. Morrow have two children: Edwina and Charles Robert.

JOSEPH IRA FARLEY. Three successive generations of the Farley family have been identified with Henderson County, its affairs, business and industry. Joseph I. Farley represents the third generation, and for a number of years has been one of the leading business men and citizens of Spottsville.

His grandfather, James Wesley Farley, Sr., was a native of Virginia and brought his family to Kentucky in 1858, settling near Zion in Henderson County. He was a resident of that county thirty-eight years and passed away when about the age of eighty. He was three times married and was the father of fourteen children, eleven sons and three daughters.

James Wesley Farley, Jr., was born in Virginia in 1852, and was a small boy when brought to Kentucky. He became a Henderson County farmer and was widely and favorably known in the Spottsville community, where he died in 1913. His wife was Margaret Haynes, a native of Hancock County, Kentucky, who was brought to Henderson County at the age of ten by her father, William E. Haynes, also a native of Hancock County. Mrs. Farley is still living, at the age of sixty-three. She was married in 1873 and has a family of five sons and five daughters.

Of these the oldest is Joseph Ira Farley, who was born in Henderson County on November 26, 1874. He made good use of his educational opportunities as a youth, grew up on a farm and followed the vocation of agriculture until he was about twenty-nine years of age. After that he was in the coal business at Spottsville until 1916, and since then has been building and operating barges, making that one of the considerable industries of Spottsville. Mr. Farley has also served as magistrate for his district three years. He is a democrat, a member of the Baptist Church and a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner and Odd Fellow.

In 1895 he married Miss Cora Cheaney, who died in 1913, leaving two children. On January 12, 1916, Mr. Farley married Mrs. Fannie (Long) Hall. Mrs. Farley is a daughter of Thomas R. and Eliza Jane (Murphy) Long. Her father, who was born in Hickman County, Kentucky, in 1824, died at Spottsville in 1878, having settled in that community in 1861. He was a merchant, dealer in tobacco, hotel proprietor and magistrate. His first wife, Tabitha McDonald, bore him a son and a daughter. His second wife was Eliza Jane Murphy, who was born in Kentucky in 1839, and after his death for some years conducted the hotel at Spottsville and was held in high esteem not only for the service she thus rendered the public but for her consistent Christian life and high character. She was an active member of the Baptist Church. Her death occurred in 1918. Of her seven children six are still living.

ROBERT LEE MCFERRON is offering a valuable contribution to the industrial and commercial activities of his native county through his well ordered operations as a farmer and dealer in and manufacturer of lumber at Mount Vernon, the county seat. He was born on a farm near Pine Hill, Rockcastle County, February 22, 1872. His grandfather, John McFerron, was born in Tennessee, near Knoxville, in the year 1813, and his entire active career was marked by close and effective association with farm industry. John McFerron became a pioneer farmer in Pulaski County, Kentucky, and there remained until about ten years prior to his death, this closing decade of his life having been spent in Rockcastle County, where he died in the year 1889. His widow here continued to maintain her home until she too was summoned to the life eternal, her death having occurred in 1903. Her maiden name was Lovina Cotton, and she was born near Knoxville, Tennessee, in 1815, so that she was nearly ninety years of age at the time of her death.

Robert L. McFerron is a son of Alfred H. and Susan (Thompson) McFerron, who now reside at Mount Vernon, where the father has lived since retiring from his farm in 1915. Alfred H. McFerron was born in Pulaski County, Kentucky, in 1844, and was there reared and educated. As a young man he removed to Rockcastle County and became one of the first operators of coal mines in the vicinity of Pine Hill. He developed one of the fine farm properties of that section of the county, and continued his residence upon this well improved homestead until his removal to Mount Vernon in 1915. He has given unqualified allegiance to the republican party, and though he served a short time as justice of the peace he has had no desire for public office or special political activity. He served as a soldier of the Union during eighteen months of the Civil war. Both he and his wife have long been earnest members of the Presbyterian Church. Mrs. McFerron was born August 24, 1853, in the State of North Carolina, was six years old at the time of her parents' removal to Whitley County, Kentucky, and about three years later removal was made to the Pine Hill district of Rockcastle County, where she was reared to adult age and where her marriage occurred. Of the children Robert L., of this sketch, is the eldest; Fannie is the wife of W. J. Childress, M. D., and they reside at Hustonville, Lincoln County; Georgia, who remains at the parental home, has been for a quarter of a century a successful and popular teacher in the schools of Rockcastle County; Nell became the wife of J. C. Coleman, who is a locomotive engineer, residing at Louisville, in which city her death occurred in April, 1920; Mattie is the wife of E. B. Cox, a merchant at Mount Vernon; Jesse maintains his home at Ehren, Florida, and is a mechanic by vocation; John D. is, in 1921, superintendent of schools at Fort Myers, Florida; Henry is employed as a railroad switchman and resides in the City of Louisville; Fred is a skilled electrician and resides in the City of Cleveland, Ohio; Rose is the widow of John Carne and resides at Berea, Kentucky; Ray is an electrician by vocation and is a resident of Rochester, Pennsylvania; Christine is a successful teacher in the public schools at Fort Myers, Florida.

The public-school discipline of Robert L. McFerron was effectively supplemented by a course in an academy at Williamsburg, Kentucky, in which institution he continued his studies until he was twenty-two years of age. Thereafter he was engaged in the general merchandise business at Mount Vernon, besides owning and operating a saw mill, and managing a farm. In 1902 he was appointed deputy sheriff of his native county, in which capacity he served until he became sheriff, on the first Monday in January, 1906, his election to this office having occurred in November of the preceding year. He sold his mercantile business in 1901, but has continued his successful operating of the saw mill and farm. His four years' administration as sheriff was most vigorous and effective, and since his retirement from office he has given his attention to his substantial business interests, which now include the operation of a saw mill, planing mill and grist mill and the general dealing in lumber and building materials of all kinds. His mill property is situated on Main Street at Mount Vernon, and he has secure place as one of the representative business men and most loyal and progressive citizens of the vital county seat of Rockcastle County.

Mr. McFerron is found aligned as a staunch advocate of the principles and policies of the republican party, and has been influential in its councils and campaign activities in Rockcastle County. In November, 1919, he was given further evidence of the high estimate placed upon him in his election as representative of his native county and of Laurel County in the Lower House of the State Legislature. In the legislative assembly of 1920 he proved an effective working member and was a champion of progressive legislature. He was made chairman of the committee on normal schools, served as a member of the road committee and was assigned to other important committees. He was specially active in the furthering of legislation in favor of the good-roads movement in the state, and to this service he gave much attention.

Mr. McFerron is affiliated with Ashland Lodge No. 640, Free and Accepted Masons; Mount Vernon Chapter No. 140, Royal Arch Masons; Mount Vernon Lodge No. 320, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and Mount Vernon Council of the Junior Order United American Mechanics. Both he and his wife hold membership in the Presbyterian Church in their home city. He was a liberal supporter of the various local war activities in Rockcastle County during the period of the nation's participation in the World war, and his influence was potent in the furtherance of the drives in support of the Government war loans, Red Cross work, etc., the while his individual subscriptions were in consonance with his financial means.

At Mount Vernon, on the 25th of January, 1906, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. McFerron to Miss Vinnie R. Adams, daughter of the late J. T. and Fannie (Miller) Adams, both of whom died at Mount Vernon, where the father had been a leading merchant. Mr. and Mrs. McFerron have six children: Fannie, William T., Ruth, John, Augustus and Susie. All except the two youngest children are attending the public schools of Mount Vernon.

RITCHIE GEORGE BAYNHAM. The druggist has come to be recognized as one of the most responsible men of his community, for upon his knowledge and skill depend the lives of those who come to him for service. It is of little use for the physician to prescribe unless his prescriptions are carefully and accurately compounded, and the public is indebted to these conscientious members of a hard-worked profession for much advice and kindly attention. Ritchie George Baynham, of Providence, is one of the most successful druggists of Webster County, and is a man who has won and holds the full confidence of all with whom he is associated.

He was born at Cadiz, Trigg County, Kentucky, September 1, 1869, a son of Gregory Eggleston and Mary C. (Jefferson) Baynham. The Baynham family is of Scotch extraction, two brothers of that name having come to the United States and established themselves in business at South Boston, Virginia. The paternal grandparents, John and Rebecca (Tilletson) Baynham, were born in Virginia, and their son, Gregory E. Baynham, was born in Halifax County of that state. They left Virginia for Montgomery County, Tennessee, and there the grandparents lived and died. Mary C. Jefferson was born at Cadiz, Kentucky, a daughter of Dr. T. B. Jefferson, and he married a Miss Graves at Cadiz, from whence they later moved to Lafayette, Kentucky, and there resided. Gregory E. Baynham was a tobacco merchant at Lafayette and Louisville, Kentucky, but later moved to Graves County. Finally he returned to Cadiz and bought a farm in its vicinity, and moved on it when Ritchie George Baynham was one year old. There he was reared and attended the common schools.

When he was twenty years old he went to Gracey, Kentucky, and entered a drug store, and later clerked at Cadiz and at Providence, being in the employ of Wynn & Hicks. In 1899 he bought the interest of Mr. Hicks, and for thirteen years the business was conducted as Wynn & Baynham, since which time Mr. Baynham has been the sole proprietor. He carries a full and varied line of drugs and druggist sundries, and has built up a large and valuable trade. Mr. Baynham has other interests and is a man of influence in his community. In politics he is a Democrat; fraternally he is a Knight of Pythias, and he finds in the faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church an expression for his religious belief.

In 1899 Mr. Baynham was married to Miss Varie Ford, of Cadiz. They had four children born to them, two of whom are living.

ROBERT LEE JACKSON, banker and merchant of Dixon, grew up on a farm in Webster County, early determined that his achievements should not be limited by the farm, and for many years has been not only one of the leading business men but one of the most public spirited leaders in civic and community progress at Dixon and the county.

Mr. Jackson was born on a farm in Webster County, four miles east of Dixon, April 17, 1868, son of Thomas J. and Emily (Morrow) Jackson, the father a native of Virginia and the mother of North Carolina. His paternal grandfather, Beckly Jackson, moved from Virginia to Kentucky in early days, settled in Hopkins County, and on his farm there lived until his death in advanced years. The maternal grandfather, John Morrow, on coming from North Carolina settled at Nebo in Hopkins County, and also lived out his life there as a farmer. Thomas J. Jackson gave most of his energies to farming, but he also conducted a country store at Carlo in Webster County, and died there as one of the highly respected citizens of the community on July 9, 1894, at the age of sixty-four. The widowed mother is still living at the age of ninety. Of their ten children six reached mature years and five are still living.

Robert Lee Jackson grew up on a farm, and the farm was his environment and the scene of much of his labor until he was thirty-one. He acquired a good education partly by attending school and partly by study and observation on his own account. When he left the farm he moved to Dixon and opened a store for hardware and groceries, and for over twenty years has been one of the leading merchants of the county seat. He has had several partners, and the business is now conducted as the Jackson Hardware & Grocery Company. He has kept in touch with country interests, owns one or two farms, and is thoroughly alive to the practical problems and questions affecting the farming element.

Mr. Jackson was one of the organizers of the Dixon Bank & Trust Company, and for over ten years has been president of that sound and conservatively managed institution. He is a democrat, as was his father before him; is a Methodist in religious faith, a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner, and a member of the Knights of Pythias. In 1898 he married Miss Carrie Smith, of Russellville, Kentucky. They have one son, Horace Allen, now a student in the University of Virginia.

CHARLES C. BROWN, cashier of the First State Bank of Livingston in Rockcastle County, has gained a position of no slight influence in connection with the business and civic activities of his native county and is a young man whose sterling character and executive ability need no further voucher than his incumbency of his present responsible office. He was born at Quail, Rockcastle County, August 1, 1894, and is a scion of the fourth generation of the family in this county, where his great-grandfather Brown settled in the pioneer days, upon migrating to Kentucky from his native state of Virginia. He instituted the development of a farm estate near the present village of Quail, and there he and his wife passed the remainder of their lives. Their son Logan, grandfather of him whose name initiates this sketch, was born on the old homestead farm near Quail, in 1831, and in that locality he passed his entire life, the while he became one of the prosperous farmers and influential citizens of his native community. His death occurred in the year 1904, and his widow, whose maiden name was Cynthia Cummins and who was born and reared in the district near Quail, this county, still resides on the old Brown homestead farm. She was born in 1834, and thus is one of the venerable and revered native daughters of Rockcastle County at the time of this writing. Mack H. Brown, son of Logan and Cynthia (Cummins) Brown, was born on the old homestead farm near Quail, in 1869, and that immediate section of the county has ever represented his home, even as it has been the stage of his extensive and successful activities as an agriculturist and stock-grower. He is a democrat in politics, takes deep interest in all that concerns the welfare of his native county and its people, and both he and his wife have long been active members of the Christian Church. Mrs. Brown, whose maiden name was Martha Carson, was born near Quail in the year 1869, a representative of another of the sterling old families of that section of the county. Of the three children of Mack H. and Martha (Carson) Brown the eldest is Samuel, who is a progressive exponent of farm enterprise in the vicinity of Quail; Charles C., of this review, was the second in order of birth; and Henry remains at the parental home and is, in 1921, still attending school.

The rural school near the old home farm afforded Charles C. Brown his youthful educational advantages, which were supplemented by his attending the high school at Mount Vernon, the county seat, where he completed the work of the sophomore year. At the age of twenty-two years he engaged in the general merchandise business at Quail, and about two years later he retired from this line of business and, in 1919, became assistant cashier of the Citizens Bank at Brodhead, where he so effectively proved his ability that in the following year he was advanced to his present executive position, that of cashier of the First State Bank at Livingston, in which he has made a record that fully justifies his selection for the office. This bank was organized and incorporated in 1917, with a capital stock of $15,000, its surplus fund being now $3,000 and its deposits fully $100,000. The personnel of the official corps of the bank is as here noted: President, L. H. Davis; vice president, W. T. Amyx; cashier, Charles C. Brown; assistant cashier, Miss Lyda Cook. The bank offers facilities and service of great benefit to the community in which it is established, and its solidity and effective management have caused its business to show a substantial and healthy expansion each successive year.

Mr. Brown is aligned in the ranks of the democratic party, and the two local offices of which he is the efficient incumbent indicate the confidence placed in him in his home village, where he is treasurer of the municipal Board of Trustees and treasurer also of the Board of Education. He and his wife hold membership in the Christian Church, and he is affiliated with Jackson Lodge No. 731, Free and Accepted Masons, at Livingston, and with Livingston Council No. 167, Junior Order United American Mechanics.

The year 1916 recorded the marriage, at Jellico, Tennessee, of Mr. Brown to Miss Minnie Hiatt, daughter of Allen Hiatt, a representative farmer near Quail, Rockcastle County, Kentucky, where Mrs. Brown was born and reared, her mother being now deceased. Mr. and Mrs. Brown have three children, whose names and respective dates of birth are as here recorded: Charles Edward, March 17, 1917; Pauline, June 28, 1918; and Austin, January 14, 1920.

LONIE VERNON STONE, former county clerk of Webster County, is now successfully engaged in the practice of law and in general insurance at Clay. He began his career as a teacher, and his entire life has been one of increasingly important service and capabilities.

He was born in Webster County, Kentucky, April 18, 1882, a son of Alexander Barrett and Sarah J. (Jenkins) Stone, both natives of Webster County. His father followed the vocation of farming and provided thereby for home and family, but was also widely known as a minister of the General Baptist Church. He died at Dixon at the age of sixty-two from heart trouble, and had continued his work on the farm and in the ministry almost to the time of his death. His widow is still living at Dixon. They reared four children: Louis Alvin, an ordained Baptist minister connected with the Baptist College at Oakland City, Indiana; Lonie Vernon; Willis Edwin, of Clay; and Norma, wife of Robert Lee Overly.

Lonie Vernon Stone lived on a farm to the age of eighteen. After the common schools he attended the Bowling Green Normal School, and, equipped for his work as a teacher, he taught twelve terms in district schools. His work as a teacher made him well known among the citizens of the county, and in 1912 he was chosen on the democratic ticket to the office of county clerk. He filled that post to the satisfaction of all concerned for four years, and all his leisure time was devoted to the study of law. He was admitted to the bar in 1917, and has since been one of the busy attorneys at Clay and is also handling a general fire insurance business.

Mr. Stone is a member of the General Baptist Church, is a Master Mason and Odd Fellow. In 1901 he married Miss Lou Venie Waggener, of Webster County. Their three children are Rubie Vernon, Prentice Alvin and Lessie Vivian Stone.

HON. GEO. HON. In business circles of Clark County, and particularly at Winchester, the name of Hon. Geo. Hon has been identified with leading and successful lumber enterprises, while in the public life of the community and county he has also evidenced the possession of qualities which have made him a valuable and constructive citizen. He belongs to a well-known and highly honored family, and was born in Powell County, Kentucky, April 2, 1874, a son of Lycortus and Nancy (Hoskins) Hon.

The father of Mr. Hon was born in the same county, where he became one of the largest land holders and most extensive farmers and stock feeders in the county. He died in 1891, at the age of sixty-two years. His father was also born in that county, and the latter's parents were among the original pioneer settlers of Powell County. Nancy Hoskins, who was also born in that county, died before her husband. Of their seven children four are now living: W. F., a contractor at Lexington; Laura, the widow of Benjamin Williams, of that place; Mina, the widow of James P. Goff, of Indian Fields, Clark County; and Geo. Those deceased were: Alvin, Louretta and Mary, all of whom passed away as young people. The Hon family (in some cases spelled Honn) has always been noted for its deeply religious feeling, and many of the name have accomplished great and lasting work in the church. In a brief article in the "Christian Standard" some of these pioneers in religious work were mentioned, and the following is quoted therefrom: The Revolutionary war had just started when Peter Daniel Hon was born in a little Pennsylvania village. A short time before some of the neighbors had followed Daniel Boone into the wilds of Kentucky, where they were the first settlers. When Peter was but a little fellow his parents and their kinspeople made the perilous journey into that Indian-infested frontier land. In this setting of rugged surroundings Peter grew to manhood. His one book was the Bible, and this he knew from cover to cover. Even before the Campbells had begun their work he had declared that the Bible was his rule of faith and practice. For more than fifty years this sturdy pioneer served the same congregation in Kentucky without salary.

Geo. Hon passed his boyhood on the home farm and acquired his early education in the public schools. Later he attended a private school at Kirksville, Kentucky, subsequently entering the State University. His father's death cut short his college career at one year, and when he was twenty years of age he embarked in the sawmill business on the home farm and also kept a general store in connection therewith.

While his business interests have been extensive and important, demanding a large share of his time and attention, Mr. Hon has found the opportunity to devote a part of his abilities to matters of public concern and import, and in several official positions has rendered valuable service. For two years he was a member of the City Council of Winchester, occupying a position in that body at the time the sewers were installed and the street improvements were made. In 1918 he was elected to the State Senate, and was a member of the Agricultural and State Fair Committee, the Bank and Trust Companies Committee, the Municipalities Committee, and the Public Utilities Committee, of which last named he was chairman. He was the father of a bill to give colleges and higher educational institutions the right to educate teachers and grant normal diplomas on the same footing as normal schools. In the 1919 session, while his party was in the minority, Mr. Hon was able to accomplish effective work as chairman of the Municipalities Committee and as a member of the committee on Insurance and others, being at all times active in all legislation. Mr. Hon is a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the United Commercial Travelers. He belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

In 1895 Mr. Hon was united in marriage with Miss Fanny B. Burton, who was born at Mount Sterling, Kentucky, and to this union there has been born one son, Alvin B., a graduate of the Kentucky Military Institute at Louisville and now a member of the freshman class at Cornell University.

SQUIRE F. BOWMAN. True appreciation comes to those who have conscientiously striven to win approval honorably from the individuals who understand and can properly express their confidence. The career of Squire F. Bowman, of Mount Vernon, mirrors on its surface much that is conducive to a high standard of public service and little that can be criticized. As County Court clerk of Rockcastle County since 1910, he has demonstrated and is still proving his efficiency and high capability, and his record in office is one that reflects credit upon him and upon his community.

Mr. Bowman was born at Island City, Owsley County, Kentucky, May 16, 1877, a son of Isaac A. and Mary (Hensley) Bowman. He belongs to a family which originated in England and immigrated to America during Colonial times, its early members making their new home in Virginia. In that state was born the great-grandfather of Squire F. Bowman, Thomas Bowman, who became a pioneer farmer and slaveholder of Owsley County, Kentucky, where he spent the remainder of his life. He married Peggy Moore, who was born in Virginia and died in Jackson County, Kentucky. One of the sons of this couple was Squire F. Bowman, the grandfather of the present County Court clerk. He was born in 1822 in Owsley County, Kentucky, where he passed his entire life as a farmer and died in 1857. He married Rhoda Morris, who was born in 1821, in Owsley County, and died in 1905, in Rockcastle County.

Geo. Hon.

Isaac A. Bowman was born June 11, 1852, in Owsley County, Kentucky, and was but a child when his father died. He was reared and educated in his native community and early in life adopted farming as his life work. He was married in Owsley County, but in 1889 removed to Jackson County, where he was engaged in farming until his death, June 11, 1917, with the exception of ten years passed in Rockcastle County. From small beginnings through industry and good management he built up a substantial property, and at his death was considered one of the well-to-do men of his locality. He was a leading stock dealer, and had various other interests, but found time likewise to engage in political matters and was a prominent Republican. For one term he served as sheriff of Jackson County. Mr. Bowman was a member of the Masonic fraternity and his religious connection was with the Christian Church. He married Mary Hensley, who was born in 1851, in Buncombe County, North Carolina, and she survives him and is a resident of Mount Vernon, making her home with her son, Squire F. Nine children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Bowman: W. M., who died in Jackson County at the age of twenty-three years; Squire F., of this review; J. Henry, who is a teacher in the public schools and a farmer in Rockcastle County; Charles, who was engaged in farming in Rockcastle County until his death, at the age of twenty-eight years; J. S., the proprietor of a pharmacy at Mount Vernon; Robert, who is engaged in farming in Rockcastle County; H. C., also engaged in agricultural operations in this county; Rhoda, the wife of John Shivel, a farmer of this county; and Skidd, a farmer of Jackson County, who is serving as a deputy sheriff of Rockcastle County.

Squire F. Bowman after attending the rural schools of Jackson County pursued a course at the normal school at Annville, in the same county, which he left at the age of twenty-two years. In the meantime, when twenty-one years old, he had commenced teaching in the country districts, and for three years was thus employed in Jackson County and for ten years in Rockcastle County. From early manhood Mr. Bowman had taken an interest in public affairs, and in November, 1909, was elected County Court clerk of Rockcastle County. He took office in January, 1910, and so capably did he discharge his duties that he was re-elected in 1913. His second term was a repetition of his devoted service, and in 1917 he was again chosen for this office, while in 1921 he was elected without opposition for county judge. His offices are situated at the Court House. As before noted, his record is an admirable one, and he is accounted as among the best county officials this section has known.

Mr. Bowman is a republican in politics, and his religious connection is with the Christian Church, in which he is serving as an elder. Fraternally he is affiliated with Ashland Lodge No. 640, Free and Accepted Masons of Mount Vernon; Mount Vernon Chapter No. 140, Royal Arch Masons; Mount Vernon Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics; Mount Vernon Lodge No. 320, Independent Order Odd Fellows, of which he is a past grand; and Mount Vernon Tent No. 21, Knights of the Maccabees. He is a stockholder in the Peoples Bank of Mount Vernon, and owns a modern residence on West Main Street. He took a helpful part in all local war activities, and served on committees during the Liberty Loan and Red Cross drives, in addition to being a liberal and willing contributor to all causes.

In 1899, in Rockcastle County, Mr. Bowman was united in marriage with Miss Ida Farmer, a daughter of John and Clara (Sandlin) Farmer, residents of Mc-Kee, Jackson County, where Mr. Farmer is a master commissioner and farm owner. Mr. and Mrs. Bowman have one son, Dwight M., born March 31, 1900, now residing with his parents and serving as deputy County Court clerk. He enlisted April 22, 1917, and was sent for training to Hattiesburg, Mississippi, but was given his discharge from the service January 28, 1918, having been under age at the time of his enlistment.

JOHN THOMAS BRADEN is one of the most popular county officials of Webster County, and as deputy and chief he has been identified with the office of county clerk for fourteen years.

He was born on a farm in Webster County April 19, 1887, a son of William H. and Caroline (Willhite) Braden, both natives of Webster County. Grandfather Jackson J. Braden was a native of Ireland and an early settler in Webster County. William H. Braden gave his life to the vocation of farming, and died in 1902, at the age of forty-six. Willhite is one of the old names in Kentucky genealogy, and Mr. Braden's maternal grandfather, Calvin Willhite, was born and reared in Webster County. Caroline Willhite Braden is still living, and is the mother of seven children, one daughter and six sons, the daughter and two of the sons dying in childhood.

The oldest of the family, John Thomas Braden, grew up on the home farm with his brothers, acquired a common school education and shared in the labors of the fields for several years. He entered the county clerk's office in 1907 as a deputy, and during the next twelve years he acquired a complete familiarity with the entire office routine and discharged most of its duties, consequently was admirably equipped for his promotion by election in 1917 as county clerk.

Mr. Braden is a Democrat, is a Master Mason and Methodist. In 1910 he married Miss Waggener, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. T. Waggener, of Dixon.

WILLIAM E. GRAVELY, M. D., who by his character and ability has honored the profession of his choice and who has vantage-place as one of the leading physicians and surgeons of Rockcastle County, is established in the successful practice of his profession in the village of Brodhead. He has large and varied capitalistic interests in his home county and is one of its most substantial and progressive citizens.

Doctor Gravelly was born in Franklin County, Virginia, June 19, 1866, and he is a representative of a family, of English lineage, that was founded in the Old Dominion state in the Colonial period of our national history. The doctor's paternal grandfather passed his entire life in Henry County, Virginia, and his death occurred long before the birth of the subject of this review, his grandson.

Green Gravelly, father of the doctor, was born in Henry County, Virginia, in 1825, and his death occurred in Franklin County, that state, in 1909. He was reared on the old homestead in Henry County, and was a young man when he removed to Franklin County. He gave loyal and valiant service as a soldier of the Confederacy during virtually the entire period of the Civil war, and after the close of that conflict he played well his part in rehabilitating the prostrate industrialism of his native state. He continued for many years as one of the extensive and influential exponents of farm industry in Franklin County, and was one of its venerable and honored citizens at the time of his death. He had long been influential in public affairs in his community, was a staunch advocate of the principles of the Democratic party, and both he and his wife were devoted members of the Christian Church. Mrs. Gravelly, whose maiden name was Mary Cooper, passed her entire life in Franklin County, Virginia, where she was born in 1840 and where her death occurred in the year 1902. Of the children the eldest is George C., who is a representative farmer in Franklin County, Virginia, and who has been also a successful teacher in the public schools of that section of the Old Dominion state; James M., a carpenter by trade and vocation, died at the age of thirty years, in his native county; Dr. William E., of this review, was the third son; Mary S. is the wife of B. A. Davis, a leading lawyer at Rocky Mount, Franklin County, Virginia; I. N. is a coal mine operator in the State of West Virginia; Ida C. is the wife of George Young, of Roanoke City, Virginia, Mr. Young being a mail clerk.

The public schools of his native county were the medium through which Dr. Gravely acquired his early education, and there he continued his association with the work of his father's farm until he was twenty-five years of age. He eventually devised ways and means for following the course of his ambition and preparing himself for the medical profession. He came to Kentucky and entered the Louisville Medical College, which is now the medical department of the University of Louisville. In this institution he was graduated as a member of the class of 1895, and after thus receiving his degree of Doctor of Medicine he completed in the following year a special post-graduate course in obstetrics and gynecology in the same institution. In the spring of 1895, however, Doctor Gravely had initiated the active practice of his profession in Franklin County, Virginia, and there he remained thus engaged for three years, at the expiration of which, in 1898, he established his residence at Brodhead, Rockcastle County, Kentucky, where he has since continued in the active general practice of his profession, with unequivocal success and with that high sense of professional stewardship that makes for the best of service in the alleviation of human suffering and distress. He has long controlled a large and representative practice throughout the district tributary to Brodhead, and none has more secure place in popular confidence and esteem. The doctor owns the business building in which his offices are maintained, on Main Street, as well as his pleasant home, representing a modern house and attractive grounds on River Street, and in addition to these properties he is the owner of two well improved farms in Rockcastle County—one of 156 acres near Hiatt and the other, just south of Brodhead, comprising 125 acres.

Doctor Gravely has entered with characteristic loyalty into community affairs in general, and his influence has always been cast in support of measures and undertakings that have conserved the best interests of his home village and county. He is aligned in the ranks of the Democratic party, has been for nearly a decade past a member of the Board of Education at Brodhead, of which body he is now chairman, and he gave twelve years of effective service as a member of the village Board of Trustees. He is vice president of the Citizens Bank of Brodhead, president of the Brodhead Lighting Company, president of the Rockcastle County Fair Association, and vice president of the Brodhead Garage Company. He and his wife are zealous members of the Christian Church in their home village, and he is serving as an elder in the same. The doctor is a past master of Brodhead Lodge No. 566, Free and Accepted Masons; is, in 1921, high priest of Brodhead Chapter No. 157, Royal Arch Masons, and is affiliated also with the local organizations of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Modern Woodmen of America. In a professional way he is actively identified with the Rockcastle County Medical Society, the Kentucky State Medical Society and the American Medical Association.

As may readily be presupposed, Doctor Gravely was an active and influential worker in furthering the various Governmental war activities in Rockcastle County within the period of the great World war, and his contributions to the Federal war bonds, to Red Cross service, etc., were marked by a liberality consonant with his financial resources.

In Franklin County, Virginia, in 1897, was solemnized the marriage of Doctor Gravely to Miss Mary S. Parker, who, like himself, was born and reared in that county, where her father was a representative farmer. Mrs.

Gravely is a daughter of David and Mary (Walker) Parker, both of whom continued their residence in that county until their deaths. In conclusion are given brief data concerning the children of Doctor and Mrs. Gravely: Mary Elizabeth was graduated in the Brodhead High School, as a member of the class of 1920, and in 1921 she is a student in the Kentucky State Normal School at Richmond; William Gervis was graduated in the Brodhead High School, class of 1921; Etheline Parker is a member of the class of 1922 in the high school; and Paul and David are respectively in the eighth and third grades of the public schools of Brodhead.

THOMAS PARKER GRAY, M. D. Through a period of twenty years with unflagging devotion to the ideals of his profession and enjoying a rising degree of success, Doctor Gray has practiced medicine at Waverly in Union County.

Doctor Gray is a native of Indiana and was born on a farm in Clark County, that state, November 11, 1872, a son of William and Sena (Staples) Gray. His early life was that of an Indiana farm boy, and he was the youngest in a large household containing nine children, seven sons and two daughters. He made the best possible use of his advantages in the rural schools, and also attended high school at Lexington, Indiana.

When Doctor Gray left the farm at the age of sixteen he took up a rather strenuous occupation, working in the timber business with a brother. From the proceeds of his early years of toil and management he entered in 1897 the University of Louisville Medical School, and was graduated in 1901. He at once located at Waverly, and has found the substance and honors of professional success in that community, where he is one of the most highly esteemed citizens.

Doctor Gray married in Waverly in 1902 Miss Mary Head, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. R. L. Head. They are the parents of two children, Richard Aubra and Flora Ellen.

ADEN G. LOVELL, M. D. Rockcastle County has its due quota of able and successful representatives of the medical profession, and he whose name initiates this paragraph has long held prestige as one of the leading physicians and surgeons of this county. Save for an interval of eighteen months passed in the City of Louisville, in 1896-97, he has been continuously engaged in successful general practice at Mount Vernon, the county seat since the year 1883.

Doctor Lovell claims the fine old Hoosier state as the place of his nativity, his birth having occurred at Springville, Lawrence County, Indiana, on the 3d of December, 1853. His father, James Lovell, was born in Virginia, in 1812, and the period of his boyhood and youth was passed partly in the State of Tennessee and thereafter near Point Burnside, Pulaski County, Kentucky. His marriage was solemnized at Bloomfield, Greene County, Indiana, and he and his young wife thereupon established their home on a farm near Springville, Lawrence County, that state, where in addition to his farm enterprise he was for some time a successful teacher in the rural schools of the locality. There his wife died in 1858, and he remained on his farm during the ensuing three years, at the expiration of which, at the inception of the Civil war, he enlisted in a regiment of Indiana volunteer infantry and went forth in defense of the Union. He had been at the front only a few months when he was captured by the enemy and incarcerated in one of the Confederate prisons of the South, where he was held a prisoner of war at the time of his death, in 1862. His wife, whose maiden name was Mary Cole, was born near Bloomfield, Indiana, in 1815, a member of one of the early pioneer families of that section, and her death occurred at Springville, Indiana, October 12, 1858. Of the children the eldest was William, who became a successful teacher in the schools of Indiana and whose death occurred near the City of Vincennes, that state; James is a railroad man and resides in Greene County, Indiana; George R. was engaged in the retail mercantile business at Louisville, Kentucky, at the time of his death; Isaac Jackson is a farmer in the vicinity of Winterset, Iowa; Margaret became the wife of George W. Allen, a lumber dealer at Vincennes, Indiana, and there the death of both occurred; Dr. Aden G., of this review, was the next in order of birth; and John was a farmer near Winterset, Iowa, at the time of his death.

Zachariah Lovell, grandfather of Doctor Lovell, was born in Virginia, in 1778, and died in Martin County, Indiana, in 1861. He became a pioneer settler first in Tennessee, next near Point Burnside, on the Cumberland River, Pulaski County, Kentucky, where he built a flour and grist mill, operated by water power, and after maintaining charge of the mill several years he continued his pioneer course by settling on a farm near Springville, Indiana, where he remained until he retired from active labors and removed to Martin County, that state, which was his place of residence at the time of his death.

Rev. William I. Cole, maternal grandfather of Doctor Lovell, was born in England in 1785, and his death occurred near Bloomfield, Indiana, in 1871. He was a young man when he settled in Lincoln County, Kentucky, and from this state he volunteered for service in the War of 1812, in which he took part with his Kentucky regiment in the battle of New Orleans, under Gen. Andrew Jackson. He later was in service in various Indian wars on the frontier, including the conflict with the forces under the historic chieftain, Tecumseh, and finally he settled in Greene County, Indiana, where he became an influential pioneer. He had received a liberal education, became a clergyman of the Baptist Church, and for many years he followed the work of the ministry in the pioneer districts of Indiana. He originally held the faith of the Democratic party, as an ardent admirer of its great leader, Gen. Andrew Jackson, but he transferred his allegiance to the Republican party at the time of its organization. He was influential in public affairs in the Hoosier state, and served as county judge of Greene County, Indiana, from 1833 to 1837.

Doctor Lovell was about five years old at the time of his mother's death, and the death of his father occurred about three years later. He was reared to adult age on a farm in Lawrence County, Indiana, and his early educational advantages were those of the public schools of the locality and period. His higher literary education was obtained in what is now Valparaiso University, at Valparaiso, Indiana. In preparation for his chosen profession he entered the Louisville Medical College, now the medical department of the University of Louisville, and in this excellent Kentucky institution he was graduated as a member of the class of 1883. After receiving his degree of Doctor of Medicine he established himself in general practice at Mount Vernon, judicial center of Rockcastle County, Kentucky, and this has been the stage of his earnest and successful professional endeavors during the long intervening years, save for eighteen months passed in practice in the City of Louisville, as previously noted in this context. For the past twelve years he has attended the Health Officers' Training School held annually at Louisville, and thus has received most effective post-graduate work annually since the establishing of this school for health officers of the various counties in the state. The practice of Doctor Lovell is of broad and representative order, indicative alike of his professional ability and his unqualified personal popularity. He owns the building in which his office is situated, on Main Street, and also his modern residence at the corner of Langdon Avenue and Lovell's Lane, this home being represented not only in an attractive and commodious house but also in beautiful surrounding grounds, six acres in area, with the finest of shade trees, shrubbery and lawns. The doctor owns also what is known as the "Town Hill" of Mount Vernon, this comprising forty acres, with an elevation of 1,535 feet above sea level. This property has been the subject of no little geological observation and investigation, and it has coal deposits, as well as exceptionally fine deposits of clay and limestone.

Doctor Lovell is inflexible in his allegiance to the republican party, and has been active and influential in public affairs in his home city and county. He had the distinction of being the first to serve as county superintendent of schools for Rockcastle County, 1884-1888, and after twenty-two years of faithful and specially efficient service as county health officer he resigned this position in 1921. The doctor was one of the commissioners appointed to represent Kentucky at the national exposition held in the City of Nashville, Tennessee, and in 1904 similar appointment came to him in connection with the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, held in the City of St. Louis. In 1907 he represented the Eighth Congressional District of Kentucky as a member of the executive committee of the Kentucky State Development Association, in which he was made chairman of the Mineral Development Committee. He is a leading member of the Christian Church at Mount Vernon and is serving as an elder of the same, his wife likewise being a zealous member.

The year 1921 finds Doctor Lovell in service as president of the Rockcastle County Medical Society, and he is an active member also of the Kentucky State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. During American participation in the late World War Doctor Lovell was examining surgeon for the Draft Board of Rockcastle County, and he devoted much time and energy to this work, as well as to other service in furthering the war activities of the Government. He aided loyally in the various drives in support of the Liberty Loans and the sale of War Savings Stamps, and his personal contributions and subscriptions were generous to the full limit of his financial powers.

August 2, 1882, recorded the marriage of Doctor Lovell to Miss Mollie L. Whittaker, daughter of the late Nathan and Sarah (Moore) Whittaker, both of whom died in Mount Vernon, where the father was successfully engaged in the mercantile business at the time of his death, in 1863. Doctor and Mrs. Lovell have two children: Leila May is the wife of T. C. O'Marra, who is associated with the automobile business at Mount Vernon; and Marguerite is the wife of R. H. Miller, of this place.

TONY JACKSON MELTON. A life-long resident of Webster County, through his wide experience in business Tony Jackson Melton has an acquaintance extending practically over the entire county. He was formerly a banker, but is now a member of the firm Blackwell & Melton, general insurance agents at Dixon. This firm is made up of progressive men, experts in insurance lines, have the general agency for this section of Kentucky of the Reliance Life Insurance Company of Pittsburgh, and also do a large business in fire insurance.

Mr. Melton was born on a farm in Webster County, February 14, 1877, son of Daniel Francis and Mary L. (Karnes) Melton, the former a native of North Carolina and the latter of Kansas. She is still living, at the age of sixty-six, and is an active member of the Methodist Church. Of their seven children six are still living. Daniel F. Melton was born in North Carolina February 22, 1849, and died October 4, 1913, after a long and successful career as a merchant at Poole in Webster County for a quarter of a century or more. He was a democrat in politics and a devout Methodist.

Tony Jackson Melton was reared at Poole, acquired a high school education, and for one year was a student in Bethel College at Russellville. He became associated with his father's business as a merchant at Poole, and is still interested in the leading mercantile establishment of that village. From 1905 to 1911 he was also cashier of the Poole Deposit Bank. Mr. Melton moved to Dixon, the county seat, in 1914, and for two years was a dealer in buggies. He has been a member of the firm of Blackwell & Melton, general insurance agents, since August, 1917. In that year he also entered local politics and was second in the race for County Court clerk. He is a democrat, a member of the Methodist Church, and fraternally is affiliated with the Masonic Order, Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias. Mr. Melton married Miss Erma Viola Thornberry, of Poole, in 1900, and they are the parents of six children.

MCCORMICK BROTHERS, of Winchester, are a firm of five brothers, inheriting the mechanical and inventive gifts of their ancestors, who have brought to perfection and in a plant near their old home at Winchester manufacture the "Blue Grass Seed Harvester," a machine that has done for the Blue Grass country what the self binder did for the great wheat regions. For many years there has existed a steady demand for Blue Grass seed, and that demand was never greater than at present, yet strangely enough American genius permitted the harvesting of this seed to be done by the slow and toilsome manual process of "stripping." It remained for McCormick Brothers of Winchester to solve the complicated problems involved in gathering this seed by machinery.

The McCormicks have been a notable family of eastern Kentucky for several generations. Thomas Jefferson McCormick was born in Virginia and was a small boy when brought to Maysville, Kentucky, where he was bound out, but soon ran away and served an apprenticeship at the blacksmith's trade. He set up his first shop at Irish Station in Nicholas County, on the old Maysville-Lexington Pike, then a much traveled thoroughfare. In his shop was made the first iron axle ever used on a vehicle traveling over that Pike. He also invented and perfected a steel plow, long known as the Diamond plow, one of the original types of steel plows. Subsequently leaving his shop, he moved to a farm in Mason County. In 1841 Cyrus McCormick, who was also a native of Virginia and is said to have been related to the McCormicks of Kentucky, paid a visit to Thomas J. McCormick and tried to prevail upon the latter to join him in the manufacture of the McCormick reapers. There is a striking resemblance evidenced in photographs between the two men. The incident of the visit of the great McCormick Harvester family head to his relative in Kentucky was recalled by the late George McCormick, a son of Thomas J. George McCormick died a few years ago at the age of eighty-two, and was eight years old at the time of the visit mentioned. In 1854 Thomas J. McCormick bought the Governor Metcalfe farm in Nicholas County, on the Maysville-Lexington Pike, located two miles from Carlisle. He remained there in comfort and esteem until his death in 1887, at the age of eighty-six, and was laid to rest at Carlisle. His wife, Sarah Hall who died in 1863, was born near Georgetown, Kentucky, the old Hall homestead being near Cardone College. Thomas J. McCormick, besides being a first rate mechanic, also owned and operated extensive farm properties in Mason County. The old house in which he lived for so many years was built by ex-Governor Metcalfe and was an historic mansion of Kentucky, known as Forest Retreat. It was the scene of many notable social occasions in the time of the McCormicks, Mrs. McCormick presiding over these functions.

The children of Thomas J. McCormick and wife were: Nancy Jane, who became the wife of Jerry Martin, who for many years was proprietor of the Blue Lick Springs Hotel; James, who moved out to Cooper county, Missouri; Martha, who married Harvey Orr and also went to Cooper county; George W., mentioned above, who lived in Clark county, where he died in 1915, at the age of eighty-two; Robert Har-ison, who lived and died in Nicholas county; Sarah, whose first husband was a Mr. Robinson, and she afterward became the wife of Henry Stewart and lived and died at Carlisle; Samuel T.; Mary who married John Harvey but died young; and Thomas J. Jr., who died in boyhood.

The second generation of the family was represented by Samuel T. McCormick, who was born in Mason county, Kentucky, in October, 1842, and died January 21, 1885, at the age of forty-three. He particularly inherited his father's mechanical genius, and as a mechanic with his brother Robert Harrison carried on a partnership for some years in Fairview, Fleming county, on the Maysville-Lexington Pike, and lived there until his death, conducting a farm as well as a shop. In Nicholas county Samuel T. McCormick married Mary Elizabeth Morgan, daughter of John J. and Elizabeth Morgan. She was four years old when her mother died, and after that she was reared by her father's sister, Maria Trigg. At the death of her husband she was left with seven children and five years later, in 1890, she moved to Clark county, on the Boonesboro Pike, five miles from Winchester, and remained at the head of the home and farm the rest of her life. In 1906 she sold the first farm and bought the Captain J. A. Nash home on the Van Meter Pike, two and a half miles northeast of Winchester, near Strode Station. This property contains fifty-two acres. Here she lived in the esteem and love of her children until her death on July 14, 1916. She was then seventy years of age, having been born March 6, 1846. While her life was taken up with the duties of home and the care of her children, she was a great reader and kept well informed on all public questions.

The names of her seven children were: John T., who was sixteen years of age when his father died; Harry Trigg; Luella, who became the wife of Samuel W. Pursley and died at the age of forty years, before her mother; William Homer; Samuel E.; Clifford; and Mary, wife of J. H. Mooney, a fruit grower at Orlando, Florida.

The five sons have all shown mechanical abilities and in 1894 several of them started a general repair shop at the edge of the farm on the Boonesboro Pike. In 1903 they took out patents on their first type of Blue Grass Seed Stripper, and after that the manufacture of this machine was the chief work of their shop. The old machine required two operators, but on June 3, 1913, they patented the self rake Blue Grass seed stripper, now everywhere recognized as the standard machine for the harvesting of Blue Grass seed, and one that practically eliminates the heavy labor demanded in former years in harvesting Blue Grass seed. The present plant of McCormick Brothers was erected in 1906 on the Lexington Pike, two miles west of Winchester. It is a complete manufacturing enterprise. It includes a saw mill and planing mill for the cutting and working of hard wood timber used in manufacturing the machine. About fifteen men are regularly employed in the industry and the annual output is about 150 machines. The business is a harmonious family corporation, all the brothers working together, each in his special line. The brothers are all Democrats, and J. T. McCormick is a director in the Winchester Bank.

FLOYD EVERETT MILLER, the efficient and popular cashier of the Peoples Bank of Mount Vernon, judicial center of Rockcastle County, where he is serving also as a member of the municipal Board of Trustees of the village, was born in this fine little Kentucky town, on the 13th of December, 1893, and is one of the representative young business men of his native place. He is a son of M. J. Miller, a sterling citizen of whom more specific mention is made in the personal sketch of another son, Robert H. Miller, on the following pages of this publication, so that repetition of the family record is not required in the present connection.

In the public schools of Mount Vernon Floyd E. Miller continued his studies until he had attained to the age of sixteen years, and upon leaving the high school he learned the trade of telegraphy and entered the service of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad, for which he served as telegraph operator at various stations between Denver and Pueblo, Colorado, for a period of one and one-half years. He then returned to his native town and assumed a clerical position in the drug store of his uncle, C. C. Davis. One year later he and his brother Robert H. established themselves in the drug business at Miami, Oklahoma, where they remained thus engaged for a period of one year. After returning to Kentucky Floyd E. Miller became, in 1915, assistant cashier of the Peoples Bank at Mount Vernon, and in March, 1917, he was advanced to the responsible executive office of cashier of this institution, the position of which he has since continued the valued incumbent. The bank was organized in December, 1909, and was incorporated under the banking laws of Kentucky. U. G. Baker is president of the institution, W. J. Sparks is its vice president, and W. H. Davis is assistant cashier. The bank bases its operations upon a capital stock of $20,000, its surplus fund is $15,000, and its deposits aggregate fully $200,000. Mr. Miller has done excellent service in connection with the upbuilding of the substantial business of this excellent institution and takes loyal interest also in all other matters that concern the progress and prosperity of his native town and county. He is aligned in the ranks of the republican party, is a member of the Board of Trustees of Mount Vernon, is a trustee of the jury fund of Rockcastle County, and he and his wife are active members of the Christian Church in their home village. Mr. Miller is, in 1921, senior warden of Ashland Lodge No. 640, Free and Accepted Masons; and is affiliated also with Mount Vernon Chapter No. 140, Royal Arch Masons; and with Lebanon Commandery No. 24, Knights Templar at Lebanon. He is past counsel of Mount Vernon Camp No. 12,444, Modern Woodmen of America, and holds membership also in Mount Vernon Tent No. 21, Knights of the Maccabees.

During the nation's participation in the World war Mr. Miller was specially influential in the furthering of the local drives in support of the various Governmental loans in Rockcastle County, gave much time to the selling of the Liberty and Victory Bonds, besides subscribing personally for the same to the limit of his powers and contributing liberally to other war causes, especially that of the Red Cross, in connection with the work of which he served as secretary of the Rockcastle County Chapter of the Red Cross.

In August, 1913, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Miller to Miss Daisy Fish, daughter of Jones and Ella (Merritt) Fish, of Rockcastle County. Mr. Fish is a prosperous merchant at Mount Vernon, and is also actively identified with farm industry in the county. Mr. and Mrs. Miller have two children: Suella, born in January, 1915, and Julia Floyd, born in September, 1917.

ROBERT HARRY MILLER. One of the leading republican newspapers of Southeastern Kentucky, and one which has been in existence for nearly thirty-five years, is the Mount Vernon Signal, published at Mount Vernon, Rockcastle County. This live and interesting publication is now under the enterprising management and ownership of Robert Harry Miller, who, while still a young man, has had experiences which has given him the broad view and outlook necessary as a possession of the successful newspaper publisher, and who is applying his knowledge to the issuing of a news sheet that is daily gaining friends and supporters.

Mr. Miller was born at Mount Vernon, Kentucky, November 23, 1891, a son of M. J. and Susie (Brown) Miller. His grandfather, M. J. Miller, Sr., was born in 1828, in Kentucky, of Virginian ancestors, and became a pioneer merchant of Mount Vernon, where he continued to conduct a leading store until his death, April 27, 1907. During the Mexican war he saw service in the United States army under Gen. Zachary Taylor, and in civil life was always justly known as a public-spirited and loyal citizen, his support being at all times given to movements of a progressive and constructive character. Mr. Miller married Miss Mary M. Smith, who was born in 1836, in Rockcastle County, and died at Mount Vernon June 15, 1913.

M. J. Miller, the younger, father of Robert H. Miller, was born in 1868, at Mount Vernon, where he has spent his entire life and is well known in business circles. He received his education in the public schools and his introduction to business methods was acquired in the store of his father. At the time of the elder man's retirement he succeeded to the interests of the establishment, of which he became sole proprietor at his father's death. He continued to conduct this establishment with success until his recent retirement, in March, 1921. Mr. Miller bears an excellent name in business circles, his reputation having been built up through many years of fair and honorable dealing. In politics a republican, he served at one time as town trustee of Mount Vernon. His religious connection is with the Christian Church, of which he is a generous supporter. Mr. Miller married Miss Susie Brown, who was born in 1870, at Mount Vernon, and they are the parents of two children: Robert Harry; and Floyd E., cashier of the Peoples Bank of Mount Vernon, a sketch of whose career will be found in preceding sketch.

Robert H. Miller received his early education in the public schools of Mount Vernon, where he was graduated from the high school with the class of 1909, and at that time went to Colorado, where he spent two years in the employ of the Santa Fe Railroad Company. Returning home, he entered the College of Pharmacy at Louisville, from which he was graduated with the class of 1912, receiving the degree of Registered Pharmacist. For the next three years he was identified with the drug business at Morristown and Knoxville, Tennessee, and then returned to Mount Vernon, where he was married. He took his bride to Miami, Oklahoma, where he was engaged in the drug business for one year, and in 1916 returned again to Mount Vernon and for two years was the proprietor of a pharmacy at this place.

Mr. Miller disposed of his business to enter the United States service September 5, 1918, at which time he was sent to Camp Zachary Taylor, Louisville, whence he was transferred to Camp Henry Knox, West Point, Kentucky, October 1, 1918. At the time the armistice was signed he was ready for overseas service, and his honorable discharge was received December 18, 1918. Upon his return he entered the state auditor's office at Frankfort, Kentucky, and served six months under John J. Craig. He then came back to Mount Vernon, where October 1, 1920, he purchased the Mount Vernon Signal, of which he is now sole proprietor and publisher. This paper was established in 1887, and is one of the leading organs of the republican party in the southeastern part of the state. It circulates freely in Rockcastle and in the surrounding counties, and has readers in practically every state in the Union, as well as in several foreign countries. Its news matter is accurate and reliable, its editorials pithy and its special features interesting. The modern plant and offices are situated on Church Street. Mr. Miller is a staunch republican in politics and his religious connection is with the Christian Church, while as a fraternalist he affiliates with Ashland Lodge No. 640, Free and Accepted Masons, of Mount Vernon, of which he is a past master; Mount Vernon Chapter No. 140, Royal Arch Masons, and Lebanon Commandery No. 24, Knights Templar.

Mr. Miller was married May 17, 1914, at Mount Vernon, to Miss Marguerite Lovell, daughter of Dr. A. G. and Mollie (Whittaker) Lovell, residents of Mount Vernon, where Doctor Lovell has been a distinguished physician for forty years. A review of his life will be found elsewhere in this work. Mr. and Mrs. Miller have no children.

CLORE HUMPHREY BLACKWELL is senior member of the firm Blackwell & Melton at Dixon, and largely through his personal energies he has built up one of the largest general insurance agencies in this section of Kentucky. The firm are general agents for the Reliance Life Insurance Company of Pittsburgh, and Mr. Blackwell has been that company's representative in Kentucky since 1911 and has developed a splendid volume of business every year. The firm also represents several of the standard fire insurance companies, and have a business represented by a premium income of about $22,000 a year.

Mr. Blackwell is a native of Webster County, born on a farm February 8, 1885, a son of James Daniels and Lucinda E. (Summers) Blackwell. Great-grandfather Blackwell was a native of Ireland and settled in North Carolina. The paternal grandfather, Jesse Blackwell, came from North Carolina to Kentucky when his son James D. was a child, settled in Webster County, and he lived there the rest of his life. James Daniels Blackwell was born in North Carolina August 27, 1854, and in 1888 was elected sheriff of Webster County. He filled that office for six years, and after leaving office continued farming until his death on January 21, 1911, at the age of fifty-six. He and his wife were married in Kentucky, and she is still living, at the age of sixty-five. Of their eight children five grew to mature years and are still living. The father was one of the highly esteemed citizens of Webster County, was a member of the Missionary Baptist Church and was affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias.

Clore Humphrey Blackwell grew up on his father's farm, living there until he was seventeen. He acquired a good education, completing the work of the Dixon public schools. For two years he was a teacher and then after a business course he took up the work for which his talents and inclinations have shown that he is best fitted. On October 8, 1905, he began handling general insurance at Dixon, and the firm of Blackwell & Melton has been in existence since August, 1917.

Mr. Blackwell is a democrat. is a member of the Knights of Pythias fraternity and of the Presbyterian Church. In 1904 he married Miss Ida Lou Lisman, of a prominent family of Webster County. They are the parents of five children.

DANIEL MOSELY GRIFFITH. The career of the well-remembered gentleman whose name forms the caption to this biographical memoir was a strenuous and varied one, the distinction which he attained entitling him to honorable mention among the leading men and representative citizens of his day and generation in the county with which his life was so closely identified. To him is due credit for giving additional prestige to the family name, an old and honored one, and adding to the brightness of an escutcheon which shines with peculiar luster in communities long noted for the high standing and sterling character of its business and public men. Although his life record has been brought to a close by the inevitable fate which awaits all mankind, his influence still pervades the lives of those who knew him and revere his memory.

The Griffith family in America is numerous and well scattered over the United States. All have descended from four brothers of Welsh origin. One of these brothers was William Griffith, the great-great-grandfather of Daniel Mosely Griffith, the immediate subject of this memoir. William Griffith arrived in America in June, 1675, coming direct from Wales, and settled on the Severn River in Anne Arundel County, Maryland, where he lived until his death, which occurred in 1699. He married Sarah Maccubbin, daughter of John and Elinor Maccubbin, who bore him the following children: Orlando, Sophia, Charles and William. His widow married Thomas Reynolds for a second husband, and her death occurred in 1716. Orlando Griffith, born in 1688, married Katherine Howard at Annapolis, Maryland, in 1717, and they had the following children: Sarah, Nicholas (died in infancy), Henry, Greenberry, Joshua, Benjamin, Lucretia, Orlando, Jr., and Charles Greenberry. The father of these children died in 1757, and he was survived many years by his widow, who died in 1783. Henry Griffith, born in 1720, married for his second wife Ruth Hammond, daughter of John and Ann Hammond, and they had the following children: Samuel, John H., Philemon, Charles, Ann, Joshua, Eleanor, Elizabeth and Ruth. Henry Griffith died in 1794, his wife preceding him in death in 1782. Joshua Griffith, the grandfather of Daniel Mosely Griffith, was born in Maryland on March 25, 1764, and in 1798 he married for his second wife Elizabeth Ridgely. They had but one child, William R. Griffith, the subject's father. Joshua Griffith had by his first wife, who bore the same maiden name as did his second wife, three children, namely: Lydia, who was married in 1808 to Warner Crow; Remus, who was married in 1809 to Sallie Handley; and Ruth, who became the wife of Moses Cummins.

Joshua Griffith was indeed a pioneer settler of Daviess County, Kentucky. He came to this state when his son, William R., was eleven years of age and settled at Utica. He had some knowledge of medicine and, though he was not a graduate physician, his neighbors of the pioneer days sought his medical advice and he cheerfully rendered what service he could to ameliorate the sufferings of others, though he never charged one cent for such service. He was characterized by his generous and charitable spirit and was beloved by all who knew him. His useful life spread over a long span of years, he being eighty-two years of age at the time of his death. His excellent name was kept in remembrance by his son, William R. Griffith, whose noble deeds of charity and generous consideration of others, together with his public spirited enthusiasm and enterprise, won for him a place among the revered founders and builders of Daviess County, which he honorably represented in the State Legislature several terms. He was educated in the schools at Hartford and Saint Joseph's College, and upon the official records of Daviess County is found the name of William R. Griffith as the first clerk of the court after the county was organized. He was afterwards admitted to the bar and practiced law several years, but, becoming interested in real estate, his later years were spent in looking after his vast landed interests. He owned many thousands of acres, and with the exception of his son, Daniel M. Griffith, titles to larger landed possessions went through his hands than any one individual who ever lived in Daviess County.

In 1822 William R. Griffith married Aria Mosely, the daughter of Capt. Thomas Mosely, an early settler of Kentucky, who came from Virginia. She bore him the following children: Ridgely, who died young; William Henry, who married Margaret Calhoun and died when twenty-three years of age; Daniel Mosely Griffith, whose name introduces this sketch; and Clinton Griffith. The mother of these children died in 1828, and in 1841 the father married Martha Hopkins, daughter of Gen. Edmund Hopkins, of Henderson County, and one child, Carey, who died in infancy, was born to this marriage.

Daniel Mosely Griffith was born in Daviess County, Kentucky, on February 28, 1826, and died at his home in Owensboro on November, 3, 1893, in the sixty-eighth year of his life. He received a collegiate education at Center College and Old Transylvania College, graduating from the latter institution in 1847. He studied law and was duly admitted to the bar, but abandoned the practice of his profession in order to attend to the large landed estate of his father. He himself became the owner of extensive farm lands and other real estate in Daviess County, as well as in adjacent counties, but at last business reverses, such as are liable to all men of large enterprise, came to him and he virtually had to begin at the bottom again to rebuild his fortune. That he succeeded in doing so is witnessed by the fact that at the time of his death he left a larger estate than he had owned before reverses overtook him.

Daniel M. Griffith was a man of unimpeachable character, his honesty and integrity never being questioned. He was fair and just with all men alike and, always calm and self-possessed, he never deviated from the courtesy which he held was due to every man, whether prince or pauper. There was no harshness in his nature and he was always easy of approach. There was nothing austere about him and he won friends among all classes. He was counted a friend to the poor man, and many not so fortunate as he were beneficiaries of his generous and kindly aid. For many years he was a prominent figure in county and state affairs, but though he was prominent in the councils of the democratic party he never sought political honors. However, in 1847 he did yield to the solicitations of friends, who elected him to the Legislature, where he served one term with marked ability.

In October, 1857, Mr. Griffith was married to Virginia Shelby Todd, who was born in 1836 at Todd's Point, near Shelbyville, Kentucky. She was a daughter of Charles S. Todd, who was a soldier of the War of 1812, was aide-de-camp on the staff of Gen. William Harrison and minister plenipotentiary to Russia under appointment from President Tyler. Mrs. Griffith's mother, Letitia by given name, was a daughter of Governor Isaac Shelby, the first governor of Kentucky. Mrs. Griffith, who died in 1883, bore her husband the following children: Letitia, who married H. C. Watkins and died in 1894; Virginia, who died at the age of seventeen years; Josh T., who is mentioned in the following sketch; Florence, who became the wife of H. A. Miller, now living in Asheville, North Carolina; Rose, the wife of Dr. S. S. Watkins, of Owensboro; Daniel M., M. D.; Ruth, who died at the age of fourteen years; Todd, who died at the age of nine years; Clinton; and Mary Ridgely, who became the wife of Lee D. Ray, of Owensboro, and died without issue.

JOSH T. GRIFFITH. One of the most conspicuous figures in the recent history of northwestern Kentucky is Josh T. Griffith, too well known to the readers of this work to need any formal introduction here, a man actively identified with the industrial and business interests of Owensboro and vicinity, and widely known as one of the leading citizens of his section of the state. Strong mental powers, invincible courage and a determined purpose that hesitates at no opposition have so entered into his make-up as to render him a dominant factor in the business world and a leader of men in important enterprises. He is essentially a man of affairs, of sound judgment, keen discernment, far-seeing in what he undertakes, and every enterprise to which he has addressed himself has resulted in liberal financial returns, his success being but the legitimate fruitage of good judgment and consecutive effort.

Josh T. Griffith was born in the city of Owensboro on April 1, 1861, and is a son of Daniel Mosely Griffith, of whom specific mention is made in preceding sketch. Mr. Griffith received his educational training in the public schools of his native city and has spent his entire life here. During President Cleveland's first administration he served as deputy collector of internal revenue, under Hunter Wood, collector of the Second District. He was then elected clerk of the Daviess County Court, which office he held for four consecutive terms, rendering efficient service. From 1913 to 1919, or until the office of internal revenue collector at Owensboro was consolidated with the office at Louisville, Mr. Griffith held that office, under appointment by President Wilson. For many years he has been a member of the Board of Directors of the Owensboro Wagon Company and for the past fifteen years has been president of that company, one of the successful and important industrial concerns of that city. He is also vice president of the United States National Bank of Owensboro. In addition to these interests he is also extensively interested in farming, having large holdings of excellent and productive land.

For many years Mr. Griffith has been active and prominent in local, state and national politics. He served for eight years as a member of the Democratic State Central Committee, and was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention at Denver and also at San Francisco. Years ago he was defeated as a candidate for state treasurer, that being his only "Waterloo" in politics.

On June 11, 1891, Mr. Griffith was married to Jettie Rothchild, and they are the parents of three children, Virginia, Josh T. Jr., and Ruth R. Mr. Griffith is probably as well and widely known as any citizen of his community, where his long residence has won for him a very high place in the confidence and esteem of the people generally. He has always been deeply interested in whatever tended to promote the prosperity of his city and county, and to him as much as to any other one man is the community indebted for its splendid material development in recent years.

EDWARD BRAXTON OWENS, who holds the position of freight agent for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company in the village of Livingston, Rockcastle County, claims this Kentucky county as the place of his nativity, his birth having occurred on his father's farm four miles west of Brodhead on the 24th of July, 1887. His father, James Ashley Owens, who now lives at Mount Vernon, the county seat, is a representative member of the bar of his native county, his birth having occurred on a farm three miles south of Mount Vernon in the year 1869. He was here reared to manhood and in earlier years was actively identified with farm industry. In addition to receiving the advantages of the common schools of Rockcastle county he attended and was graduated from McKinley University. He remained on his farm until 1913, when he removed to Mount Vernon, where he has since been successfully engaged in the practice of law. His wife, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Dowell, was born in the state of Indiana, in 1871, and their marriage was solemnized in Rockcastle county, Kentucky. Both are active members of the Christian Church in their home city. Of their children Edward B., of this review, is the eldest; Lula first married John Niceley, who was a farmer near Mount Vernon, and after his death she became the wife of Frederick Owens, their home being at Somerset, Pulaski County, where Mr. Owens owns and conducts a garage, his name being the same as that of his wife before her marriage, but no kinship existing between the two families; Walter Martin is identified with the taxicab business at Mount Vernon; William Bryan, who resides in Letcher County, is employed as a brakeman on the Eastern Kentucky division of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad; Roy Beckham remains at the parental home, as does also Naomi Frances, who is a student in the public schools of Mount Vernon.

The preliminary education of Edward B. Owens was gained in the rural schools near his birthplace, and later he attended the village schools at Brodhead, where after completing a course of one year in the high school his ambition to continue his educational work was such that he entered the Eastern Kentucky State Normal School at Richmond, where he continued his studies one year. Upon leaving this institution, in 1911, he became bookkeeper for the W. J. Sparks Company at Mullins, Rockcastle County, and with this quarry contracting concern he continued his association eight years. In the autumn of 1918 he was appointed to his present position, that of freight agent at Livingston for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and his service has been most efficient and satisfactory. Mr. Owens is a staunch supporter of the principles of the democratic party, and he and his wife are members of the Christian Church. He is affiliated with Livingston Council No. 167, Junior Order United American Mechanics, is a director of the First State Bank of Livingston, and in addition to owning his modern residence property at Livingston he has other real estate in this village and owns a farm of sixty-two acres three miles south of Mount Vernon.

During the period of American participation in the World war Mr. Owens was vitally concerned with the local war activities. He served on committees in charge of Liberty and Victory Loan drives in his home community, was similarly influential in furthering the Saving-Stamp drive and in the campaigns in behalf of Red Cross and Young Men's Christian Association service. He delivered numerous patriotic speeches in his native county, and his personal contributions to the diversified financial mediums in support of war work were as liberal as his means justified.

October 30, 1910, recorded the marriage of Mr. Owens to Miss Minnie L. Thomason, daughter of W. C. and Mary M. (Cain) Thomason, who reside two miles west of Mount Vernon, the father being an extensive farmer and substantial citizen of Rockcastle County. Mr. and Mrs. Owens have three children: Bernard Wendell, born May 1, 1912; Gilbert Ronald, born July 12, 1916; and Katherine Lucile, born January 14, 1919.

Allen Owens, grandfather of him to whom this sketch is dedicated, was born in North Carolina and became a pioneer farmer in the Pine Hill district of Rockcastle County, where his marriage was solemnized and where he and his wife passed the remainder of their lives. He married Miss Louisa Stokes, who was born in the Skaggs Creek district of Rockcastle County, and who, like her husband, was a resident of the Pine Hill district at the time of her death. The founders of the American branch of the Owens family came from Ireland and settled in Virginia prior to the War of the Revolution.

CLAY F. HAGGARD, is a native son of Clark county, Kentucky, a scion of one of the old and influential families of this section of the state, and in his individual activities and achievements has brought to a high standard the Brookwood Farm, three miles west of Winchester, which he has made the stage of vigorous and progressive agricultural and live-stock enterprise, with special attention given to the raising of high-grade live stock. Of the family of which he is a member adequate record is given in connection with diver. other personal sketches appearing in this publication, and thus it is not necessary to repeat the data in the present article.

Mr. Haggard was born in Clark county on the 11th of August, 1870, and is a son of James H. Haggard, who likewise was born and reared in this county, a son of John Haggard, who was a pioneer settler on Howard Creek, this county, but who later established his residence on a farm near Mount Olive Church, this county, where he remained until well advanced in years, as did also his wife, whose family name was Quinsberry. John Haggard was numbered among the founders of Mount Olive Baptist Church and was a citizen of prominence and influence in the community. After the death of his wife he accompanied his son, Clifton T., to Texas when in advanced age, and he passed the remainder of his life in the Lone Star state. John, Jr., another of his sons, passed some time both in Missouri and Texas, but eventually returned to Clark county, Kentucky, where he remained until his death. Clifton T., the son whom the father accompanied to Texas, likewise returned to the old home in Kentucky, and was here the owner of a part of the family homestead at the time of his death. James H., father of the subject of this review, did not, like his brothers, experience the wanderlust, and he continued his residence in Clark county until the close of his long and useful life. Of the brothers the only survivor is Clinton S., a resident of Texas. The sister, Rhoda M., became the wife of George Fox and was a resident of the Pilot View district of Clark county at the time of her death.

James H. Haggard was signally prospered in his progressive activities as one of the representative agriculturists and stock-growers of Clark county. He purchased the C. F. Lefevre farm, three miles west of Winchester, on the Colby Turnpike, and made many improvements on the place, including the erection of the present house soon after the close of the Civil war. He added largely to the area of his landed estate and gave to each of his children a valuable farm property. Prior to the war he had owned slaves, and in his industrial activities he became one of the extensive cattle growers of his native county. He was one of the venerable and honored citizens of Clark county at the time of his death, June 5, 1910, his birth having occurred at Mount Olive, this county, on the 5th of May, 1823.

April 5, 1840, recorded the marriage of James H. Haggard to Miss Mary E. Hunt, who likewise was born and reared in Clark county, a daughter of Jephtha Hunt, of whom record is given in other personal sketches in this work. Mrs. Haggard preceded her husband to eternal rest by about five months, her death having occurred January 28, 1910. She was born January 18, 1831. Mr. and Mrs. Haggard were earnest members of the Baptist Church. They became the parents of four sons and one daughter: Sidney A., a retired farmer, resides at Winchester, judicial center of Clark county; Jephtha J. is a prosperous farmer in Bourbon county; James D. is a furniture dealer at Winchester; Clay F. is the immediate subject of this sketch; and Nannie, the only daughter, died on the 3d of June, 1920, she having been the wife of William H. Tucker, of Clark county.

Clay F. Haggard was reared to the sturdy discipline of the home farm and gained his early education in the schools of his native county. He has had no desire to sever his allegiance to the great basic industries under the influences of which he was reared, and in his independent activities he has gained secure place as one of the successful exponents of agricultural and live-stock enterprise in his native county.

In September, 1896, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Haggard to Miss Anna Strode, who likewise was born and reared in Clark county, and whose family name has been one of distinctive prominence in the annals of this county since the early pioneer period. She is a daughter of James R. and Nancy (Flynn) Strode. Her father, whose death occurred in 1910, was born on the old family homestead on Strode's Creek and on the Lexington Turnpike, in Clark county, his paternal grandfather having there settled in the early pioneer days. He was a son of Nelson Strode, of whom more specific record may be found on other pages of this work, in the personal sketch of William D. Strode. James R. Strode was born November 15, 1842, and his death occurred May 15, 1910, the last ten years of his life having been passed in the home of his only daughter, wife of the subject of this sketch. Mrs. Strode was born September 26, 1850, and she survived her husband by five years, her death having occurred in the home of her only daughter, Mrs. Haggard, on the 29th of October, 1915. The married life of Mr. and Mrs. Strode was mainly passed on their fine old farmstead near Pilot View, eight miles west of Winchester. Mrs. Strode was a daughter of Dudley and Martha (Wills) Flynn, whose old homestead was situated on what is now the Eaton Turnpike and near the famous old Blue Ball Tavern, which was conducted by Mr. Wills, father of Mrs. Flynn, as a stage station on the old time stage route through this section. Mrs.

Clay F. Haggard

Haggard, wife of the subject of this sketch, now owns this old tavern farm and also the old homestead of her parents near Pilot View, the home in which she was born and reared. She takes satisfaction in the ownership of the historic old Blue Ball Tavern, which is one of the landmarks of Clark county and which is situated two miles east of Winchester. She inherited this property through being a descendant, in the fifth generation, of the Wills family, who originally owned the place.

Mr. Haggard gives his attention largely to the raising of high-grade cattle, and has made of the old homestead inherited by him one of the model stock farms of the county. Under his regime the house on the place has been remodeled, as have other buildings, and on every side are evidences of thrift and prosperity. He and his wife hold membership in the First Baptist Church at Winchester, in which he is serving as a deacon, as had his father before him. Mr. and Mrs. Haggard have two children: Nelson Strode Haggard was born March 8, 1898, and Nancy Clay Haggard was born October 31, 1906. The attractive family home, with its beautiful surroundings, is a center of gracious and generous hospitality, with Mrs. Haggard as its popular chatelaine.

WILLIAM D. STRODE, was a member of one of the honored pioneer families whose name has been closely and prominently linked with the history of Clark county since the early days, and in his character and achievement he well upheld the honors of the name which he bore.

William Dillard Strode was born near what is now known as Strode Station, on the Lexington Turnpike, and the date of his nativity was July 23, 1837. He was a son of Nelson and Elvina H. (Rash) Strode, his mother having been a daughter of Rev. William Rash, who was one of the distinguished pioneer clergymen of the Baptist Church in this section of Kentucky. Nelson Strode was a son of John Strode, Jr., whose father, John, Sr., was one of the first settlers in the vicinity of the present Strode Station, where both continued to reside until their deaths, the while both contributed in generous measure to the civic and industrial development and progress of the county. Though John Strode, Jr., was comparatively a young man at the time of his death, he had become the father of seventeen children, of which Nelson was the youngest. Nearly all of the children attained to years of maturity, and concerning the sons the following data available: William continued to reside in Kentucky until his death, at an advanced age; Stephen removed to the state of Missouri; John likewise became a pioneer in the west; James passed his entire life in the vicinity of Strode Station and left no children.

The marriage of Nelson Strode to Miss Elvina H. Rash was solemnized when he was twenty-five years of age, the father of the bride having been pastor of the old Friendship Baptist Church, which was situated on the site of the present beautiful cemetery at Winchester. Nelson Strode inherited a portion of the old family landed estate, but he sold the property shortly after the death of his wife, who was survived by four children, the youngest of whom was but little more than an infant. After leaving the farm Mr. Strode married Mrs. Susan B. (Rash) Weldon, a sister of his first wife and the widow of Welkin Weldon. The death of the second wife occurred about twenty years later, and the one child of this marriage was Edward Rush Nelson Strode, who died in early youth. After the death of his second wife Nelson Strode lived for a time in the home of his youngest son by the first marriage, and eventually he contracted a third marriage, when Mrs. Fanning Howard became his wife, this having been her fourth marriage. After this marriage Mr. Strode and his wife lived about sixteen years in her home at Winchester, and after her death he passed the closing period of his life in the home of his son William D., where he died at the venerable age of eighty-two years. Of the four children of the first marriage William D. was the first. John T. Strode, M. D., the second son, died at Maysville, Kentucky, in 1919, at the age of eighty years, he having been successfully established in the practice of his profession in the city of Lexington for a number of years, and having also become one of the leading physicians at Maysville. His son Hall still resides at Maysville and his son Gay is a resident of Lexington. His daughter, Elizabeth Ann, is the widow of Miner Hisle and resides at Indian Fields, Clark county. James R. Strode, the third son, became one of the representative farmers of Clark county, and his death occurred on the fine old homestead of his daughter on Colby Turnpike in 1910; his wife, whose maiden name was Nancy Flynn, likewise being deceased, and their only child, Anna, being the wife of Clay F. Haggard, of whom individual mention is made on preceding pages of this work.

William D. Strode continued his active alliance with farm industry throughout his entire independent career, but he finally left his fine farm estate near the post-office of Dodge, on the Boonesboro Turnpike and removed to Winchester, where he lived virtually retired until his death. He was a Democrat in political allegiance and he and his wife were devout members of the Baptist Church, in which connection he gave earnest service as clerk of the Boone's Creek Baptist Association for a long term of years. He was one of the organizers of the Winchester Bank and continued as a member of its directorate until his death, besides which he was a stockholder in other banking institutions.

In 1858, at the age of twenty-one years, Mr. Strode was united in marriage to Miss Martha B. Hunt, and their devoted companionship continued fifty-seven years, at the expiration of which the gracious ties were severed by the death of the devoted wife and mother, who passed away in March, 1915. Concerning their children the following brief record is consistently given: John William became one of the extensive farmers of Fayette county, where he had a fine landed estate of nearly 500 acres, besides being the owner of valuable property in the city of Lexington. He died in September, 1915, and his widow now resides in Lexington. He is not survived by children. Ella S. is the widow of William Preston and resides at Winchester, her children being three in number: Virgil is ticket agent at the union railway station at Winchester, the maiden name of his wife having been Minnie Lisle and no children were born of this union; Willie C. is the wife of Frank A. Rogers, who resides on the old Rogers homestead farm at Wade's Mill, Clark county, their one child being a son, Frank Allen, Jr.; and Floyd, who is a merchant in West Virginia, married Miss Mary Siler, their one child being Josephine Eleanor. Kate became the wife of Vernon Clark, and her death occurred in 1899. Clayton continues a resident of Clark county.

In conclusion it may be stated that the subject of this review, William Dillard Strode, received his second personal name in honor of Riland T. Dillard, a family friend who served with distinction as a soldier in the War of the Revolution.

ROBERT G. WEBB, M. D. The Village of Livingston, Rockcastle County, claims Dr. Robert Gladstone Webb as one of its representative physicians and surgeons and loyal and progressive citizens. He controls a substantial practice that extends throughout the prosperous farming territory tributary to Livingston, and he is a successful exponent of the best modern ideas and service in both branches of his exacting profession. The Doctor was born at Burning Springs, Clay County, Kentucky, August 20, 1879, and is a son of Rev. Mar-and P. J. and R. C. continued the business for ten or twelve years, when Philmore J. Miller acquired sole ownership of the business, continuing it under his own name until his death, July 31, 1920. He had been engaged in buying and rehandling tobacco, preparing it for manufacture and exporting it, and met with eminent success in this line, the chief secrets of his success being his constant and indefatigable application and the exercise of sound common sense in all his dealings. In addition to his interests as a tobacconist Mr. Miller had also been extensively interested in farm lands, which he operated on shares.

Politically he always supported the democratic party, but was too busy to take an active part in public affairs. In church membership he and his wife were Baptists. On May 2, 1888, Mr. Miller was married to Purdie Martin, a native of Daviess County and the daughter of Fay Martin. He always took a commendable interest in the general welfare of his community and was deservedly held in the highest esteem throughout the locality.

ARETUS ALLEN WESTERFIELD, M. D. The most enlightened tenets of medical and surgical science find expression in the career of Dr. Aretus Allen Westerfield, a general practitioner of Utica since 1896, a prominent and progressive factor in several leading medical associations and a potent influence in the promotion of civic measures making for progress and advancement. Doctor Westerfield's professional ambitions unfolded on the farm in Ohio County, Kentucky, where he was born February 15, 1871, a son of John C. and Martha (McGan) Westerfield, the former also a native of Ohio County and the latter of the State of Virginia. His paternal grandfather, William Westerfield, was a Kentuckian by birth and a farmer by occupation, and this vocation was likewise followed by John C. Westerfield. The members of this family have always been highly respected in the various communities in which they have resided, and have for the most part been agriculturists, although well represented in business circles and professional life as well.

Aretus Allen Westerfield spent his boyhood amid the agricultural surroundings of the home farm and received his preliminary educational training in the country schools and in the public schools of Hartford, Kentucky. While his early training at home had been along agricultural lines, he did not fancy the life of a farmer, and when he showed a marked predilection for the medical profession his parents wisely allowed him to pursue his inclinations and he eventually entered Barnes Medical College, which is now merged with the University of Louisville. After completing a course of three years he graduated in medicine from that institution in 1896, receiving his degree of Doctor of Medicine, and in the same year located at Utica, where he has since been engaged in a general practice. He has built up a large and lucrative practice and is accounted one of the highly skilled medical and surgical practitioners of Daviess County. Professionally he belongs to the emancipated class whose mind is open to light and who sanction the beliefs of the past only so far as they are in harmony with the greater progress and enlightenment of the present. He takes time to investigate the new order of things and has the breadth of mind to judge wisely yet conservatively. A great capacity for painstaking accomplishment constitutes one of his chief mental assets, as well as a genuine liking for the great amount of work entailed by his supreme allegiance to a fascinating and inexhaustible science. Dr. Westerfield is a valued and popular member of the Daviess County Medical Society, the Kentucky State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. He is social in his tendencies, and out of his busy life finds time for relaxations and diversions, being a member of the Masons, the Modern Woodmen and the Odd Fellows. His political support is given to the democratic party, and his religious faith is that of the Baptist Church.

In 1897 Doctor Westerfield married Miss Hettie Howard, daughter of A. G. Howard, of Daviess County.

CASPER C. WILLIAMS. At Mount Vernon, judicial center of Rockcastle County, Mr. Williams has inviolable standing as one of the representative members of the bar of his native city and county, and he has the further distinction of being a scion of a sterling pioneer family of this county. His paternal grandfather, Richard G. Williams, was born in Culpeper County, Virginia, in 1786, the original representatives of the Williams family in America having come from Wales and settled in the Old Dominion commonwealth in the early Colonial period of Virginia history. Richard G. Williams was numbered among the early settlers of Rockcastle County, Kentucky, where he established his residence when he was a young man and where he followed for some time the trade of saddler at Mount Vernon. He was one of the venerable and honored pioneer citizens of Mount Vernon at the time of his death, in 1876, and his wife, whose family name was Holder, passed her entire life in Kentucky, she having been ninety years of age at the time of her death, which occurred at Mount Vernon.

Casper C. Williams was born at Mount Vernon, Kentucky, May 17, 1861, and is a son of D. N. and Mary E. (Haley) Williams, the former of whom was born at Richmond, Madison County, this state, in 1839, and the latter was born in Rockcastle County, in 1844. The father died at Mount Vernon in the year 1915, and the widowed mother still maintains her home here. D. N. Williams was reared and educated at Mount Vernon, and for many years was one of the leading merchants of this place, besides which he was influential in public affairs in the county and served thirteen years as clerk of the County Court. He commanded the unqualified confidence and respect of all who knew him and played a large part in the community life of Mount Vernon. He was a democrat, and was a Mason, a member of Ashland Lodge No. 640, Free and Accepted Masons, and Mount Vernon Chapter No. 140, Royal Arch Masons.

Of their children the eldest is Casper C., the immediate subject of this review. M. C. is engaged in the retail drug business at Somerset, Pulaski County. Cleo W., a resident of Mount Vernon, is the widow of James H. Brown, who was an able lawyer and for eight years was county attorney of Garrard County. Mrs. Brown served eleven years as postmistress at Mount Vernon. John H. is engaged in the lumber business at Los Angeles, California. Judge R. G. is a leading member of the bar of Covington, Kentucky, where he served nine years as commonwealth attorney, besides which he had previously served as county judge of Rockcastle County.

After completing the curriculum of the public schools of Mount Vernon Casper C. Williams entered Carthage College at Carthage, Illinois, where he finished his literary education. Thus excellently fortified along academic lines, he entered the Louisville Law School, which is now the law department of the University of Louisville, and in 1884 he was there graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Laws. He forthwith gained admission to the bar of his native state and began the active practice of his profession at Mount Vernon, where he has since continued his effective labors as a lawyer. He has long controlled a large and representative law practice, has won many distinctive victories in the presentation of causes in both the criminal and civil courts, and has maintained exceptionally high reputation as a resourceful trial lawyer and well fortified counselor. On Church Street he owns the building in which his law offices are established, and he is the owner also of much other valuable real estate in his native city and county, including his attractive and modern home place on Main Street. Mr. Williams is a director of the Bank of Mount Vernon, and has been its official legal representative since it began business in 1900. He maintains active membership in the Kentucky State Bar Association. He has never sought or held office, but has devoted his time and talents to his chosen profession. Mr. Williams naturally takes deep interest in all things touching the welfare of his home town and native county, and he is essentially a broad-gauged and progressive citizen of liberal civic motives and actions. In politics he is a democrat. He and his wife hold membership in the Christian Church, and he is affiliated with the following named Masonic bodies: Ashland Lodge No. 640; Mount Vernon Chapter No. 140, Royal Arch Masons; and London Commandery No. 33, Knights Templars, at London, Laurel County. During the nation's period of participation in the World war Mr. Williams was indefatigable in promoting the various war activities in his home county, where he made speeches at virtually every crossroad point in support of the different Government bond subscriptions. He was a valued member of the committees in charge of the Liberty and Victory Loan drives and Red Cross campaign in Rockcastle County, and his individual subscriptions were limited only by his power to render such financial aid.

W. J. Anderson

In the City of Louisville in 1886 Mr. Williams was united in marriage with Miss Sallie J. Whitehead, daughter of Rev. Alexander and Elizabeth Whitehead, both now deceased. Rev. Alexander Whitehead was a clergyman of the Christian Church, and for many years held pastoral charges in Rockcastle County, where both he and his wife are held in reverent memory.

Mr. and Mrs. Williams have but one child, Miss Risse, who remains at the parental home and is a leading and popular figure in the representative social and cultural activities of the community in which she was born and reared. She is a graduate of the Mount Vernon High School and also of the famed Boston Conservatory of Music in the Massachusetts metropolis.

JAMES LEE CARTER, M. D. In professional circles of Daviess County a recognized position and high standing are maintained by Dr. James Lee Carter, of Whitesville. Engaged in practice at this place since 1907, he has been esteemed not only for his commendable professional conduct but for the public-spirited and constructive stand he has taken in matters which have interested citizens of progressive tendencies. Doctor Carter was born on a farm near Whitesville in Daviess County September 4, 1870, and is a son of John S. and Delia (Chapman) Carter.

John S. Carter was born in Hancock County, Kentucky, a son of Alfred Carter, a native of Culpeper County, Virginia, and a soldier of the Revolutionary war, who came to Kentucky about 1800 and settled in Hancock County. He married a Miss Phillips. The maternal grandfather of Dr. James L. Carter was Rev. Jesse Chapman, a Baptist preacher, whose wife was a Miss Ellis, and he spent a large part of his life in Ohio County, Kentucky, where his daughter Delia was born. Soon after their marriage John S. Carter and his wife settled on a farm in Daviess County, subsequently removing to Grayson County when James L. Carter was four months old.

James L. Carter was reared on the home farm in Grayson County and attended the public schools, following which he took a short course at Lynnville Academy, White Mills. He then entered the Memphis (Tennessee) Hospital Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1898, and began the practice of his profession at Maxwell, where he remained until 1907. In that year he changed the scene of his activities to Whitesville, where during a period of fourteen years he has risen to a recognized position of prestige in his calling and has won the confidence of a large and representative practice and the esteem and respect of his fellow-practitioners in the county, who elected him president of the Daviess County Medical Society for the year 1918-19. He continues to hold membership in that body, as he does also in the Kentucky State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. In connection with his large and constantly-growing practice he owns and conducts a modern pharmacy at Whitesville, a well-patronized establishment where the doctor compiles his own prescriptions. Doctor Carter is a Master Mason and a member of the Modern Woodmen of America. In church faith he is a Baptist. His political allegiance is given to the democratic party, and he has taken an active part in political campaigns. A progressive and patriotic citizen, during the World war he tendered his services to the United States Army Medical Corps, but was rejected because of slightly defective eyesight, being, however, placed on the reserve list.

In 1899 Doctor Carter was united in marriage with Emma Field, a daughter of Clinton M. Field, an agriculturist of Daviess County, and to this union there have been born four children: Stuart, Ellis, Clinton and James Lee, Jr., all living with their parents in the comfortable family home at Whitesville.

HON. WILLIAM C. TAYLOR. No one can review the life of Hon. William C. Taylor, ex-judge, ex-legislator, prominent business man, leading agriculturist and constructive citizen of the Winchester community of Clark County without being impressed with the dignity of his actions and the magnitude of his accomplishments. His was a career of progress. From small beginnings he pushed steadily forward, carrying with him those with whom he was associated, and as a result he rose far above many who started out in life with more material advantages. During his career his efforts were felt in the lumber industry, in oil production and in merchandising, while likewise his activities had a beneficial identification with the progress of civic movements and the cause of education.

Judge Taylor was born on a farm in Owsley County, Kentucky, December 5, 1859, a son of Calvin and Julia Ann (Shackleford) Taylor. His grandfather was Rev. Pendleton Taylor, who for forty years was a minister of the Methodist Episcopal faith in Kentucky, his maternal grandfather being Abner Shackleford, who was born near the mouth of Red River in Clark County, and passed his life in Breathitt County, where he served as a Methodist minister among the mountaineers and attained old age. Calvin Taylor was born and reared in Tennessee, but in 1858 accompanied his parents to Kentucky. He was married here, and at the age of thirty-one years enlisted for service in the Union army during the war between the states. Not long after volunteering he was stricken with typhoid fever and died when thirty-two years of age. He left his young widow with two children: William C. and Mary Jane, the latter of whom is now Mrs. John W. Taulbee, of near Winchester.

To the loving devotion and careful training of his mother Judge Taylor gives full credit for what he has been able to accomplish in life. After the death of her husband she found that it was necessary to sell the home farm in order to pay off an indebtedness, and in order to support her children she did spinning and weaving and accepted such other honorable employment as chance threw in her way. She had only a common school education herself, but was determined that her children should receive a training that would fit them for their battles with the world. Her devotion to their welfare and her beautiful character enshrined her memory forever in the hearts of her children, who have since reached stations in life which are a reflection of the value and true worth of her teaching. In later years she married Captain Cope, a former Confederate army officer. Her death occurred when she was fifty-nine years of age.

Like his sister, William C. Taylor entered upon his career as a teacher in the public schools, and during his teaching period saved every dollar which he earned.

After five years as an educator he decided that commercial life offered a broader field for the expression of his abilities, and he accordingly went to Cornwell, Menifee County, where he obtained a position in a general store owned by Alfred Combs and Company, now of Lexington, at a salary of ten dollars per month. At the end of two years his salary had not been advanced, but he had continued his economical habits, and by this time had $400. This modest capital he invested in a small country store, which he conducted for ten years. Shortly thereafter he established a household of his own by his marriage to Frances Mariba Osborn, and named the new postoffice, of which he was postmaster, Mariba, in honor of his bride. When he was elected the first county superintendent of schools of Menifee County he removed to the county seat, Frenchburg, where he invested his capital, now grown to $8,000, in a general store. He served two terms as county superintendent of schools, and in that capacity demanded a higher standard among the educators, making it necessary that they be fully qualified for the important duties of teaching. He also agitated in behalf of the securing of better schoolhouses, and as a result of his efforts teaching standards were appreciably elevated, while all matters pertaining to the school system were advanced. Judge Taylor's interest never waning until nearly all teachers had first-class certificates and the schools of Manifee County compared favorably with those of others of the state.

Not long after arriving at Frenchburg Mr. Taylor began the manufacture of staves, and subsequently started the manufacture of lumber, under the firm style of Taylor & Wells. They became large manufacturers of the former product for the foreign trade, especially in furnishing staves for the wine industry of France, a trade that was particularly profitable. In producing their lumber and sawing their staves the firm operated two or three mills, with from fifty to sixty employees, and the business continued as a partnership until Mr. Wells' death. In 1905 Mr. Taylor sold his store with his fifth $10,000 stock, having in 1904 become a partner with J. Will Clay and M. C. Clay of Mount Sterling, in the Miller's Creek Lumber Company. This firm made a practice of buying land in fee, cutting off the lumber and then selling the surface but retaining the minerals. Some three years ago they began to develop the oil on this land, of which they had 3,000 acres under control, and at present have three wells which are in operation under leases, it being the pioneer oil operation in this part of Kentucky and one of the richest fields to be found anywhere. Until recently Mr. Taylor made a specialty of this work. Judge Taylor moved to his present home, two and one-half miles west of Winchester, in 1905, and has 400 acres of as fine land as can be found in the state, located on College Pike. He has a beautiful modern home and other substantial buildings, as well as up-to-date equipment and improvements, and operates this land more familiarly known as the Martin Farm, and the rest of his 1,700 acres in holdings in company with his sons.

In 1894 Judge Taylor was sent to the State Legislature as representative for Manifee and Montgomery counties, and made an excellent record, being active in all discussions in that body. Later he was elected county judge of Manifee County for one term, during which he not only put the county on a paying basis but also cleared off a large indebtedness. In 1915 he was a candidate for county judge of Clark County, but was defeated for the nomination by his party. Judge Taylor is vice president of the Flesher Oil and Petroleum Company of Lexington, and one of the main stockholders in this concern, which is operating in Oklahoma. He is also a director in the Kentucky Rock and Asphalt Company of Louisville and has other important interests. Throughout his life he has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to which his family has furnished a number of ministers, one of whom, the Rev. Clinton Taylor, preached for seventy consecutive years, from his eighteenth year until he was eighty-eight.

Judge Taylor was married October 5, 1882, to Frances Mariba Osborn, who was of great assistance to her husband in the early years of the little country store, in the management of which she took part, and in subsequent years she has shown herself devoted to his interests, oftentimes aiding him with wise counsel and advice. Three sons have been born to Judge and Mrs. Taylor: Bruce C., who married Anna Greewade; Claude Thurman, who married Jessie Hampton; and William C., Jr., residing with his parents. Each of the sons has a farm of his own, and each keeps in close touch with the father, through whose experienced advice and keen foresight they have benefited greatly in working their way to success.

LINEAGE

We are told the CONNELLEY family is descended from Milesius, King of Spain, through his son Heremom. The family, according to Irish genealogists, was founded by Eogan, ancestor of the Northern Hy Nials, and son of Nial of the Nine Hostages, King of Ireland, A. D. 379. The ancient name was Conally and signifies "A Light." The possessions of the Clan were located in the present counties of Galway, Meath, and Donegal. The CONNELLYS were also Chiefs in Fermanagh. The names CONNELLY, CONNELLEY, CONALLY, CONNEALLY, CONNOLLY, CONNELLAN, O'CONNELL, and other Irish names of families are derived from the ancient Milesian name—"O'CONGHALAIGH."

The CONNELLY family comprising Thomas, Edmund, John, and Henry, sons of HENRY CONNELLY, came from County Armagh, Ireland, and settled at Old Albemarle Point, circa 1689. This settlement was later removed and became Charlestown, and today is Charleston, the metropolis of South Carolina. From the Lords Proprietors these brothers obtained large grants of land in South Carolina, and also extensive tracts of land in North Carolina and Virginia, which they colonized.

EDMUND CONNELLY, son of that Henry Connelly, who settled at Albermarle Point in 1689 and later became one of the founders of Charlestown, now Charleston, South Carolina; married in South Carolina, Mary EDGEFIELD, daughter of (not certainly known; said by family tradition to have been Colonel Arthur EDGEFIELD). ISSUE: I. Harmon, born (date not known); moved to North Carolina, where he had a large family—sons and daughters. II. Thomas, of whom later.

THOMAS CONNELLY of Guilford County, North Carolina; died, probably in 1783. His business dealings in land caused him to temporarily live in Pennsylvania, but he returned to North Carolina from that colony. Is said to have served in General BRADDOCK's army in its disastrous march on Fort Du Quesne; served during the winter of 1779-1780 in the First South Carolina Regiment, commanded by Col. Charles Cotesworth PINCKNEY, in defense of Charleston, where he had gone to consult Colonel PINCKNEY, who was his attorney. It is a tradition (well defined) of the family that in the following October he was wounded at the battle of King's Mountain; married in Pennsylvania Mary VAN HURLINGEN, daughter of (not certainly known; the name is traditional). ISSUE: I. Henry, born 2nd May, 1752, in Chester County, Pennsylvania, of whom later. There were other sons and there were daughters, but the record has not been completed.

CAPTAIN HENRY CONNELLY, born Chester County, Pennsylvania, 2nd May, 1752, died in Johnson County, Kentucky, 7th May, 1840. He came with his father from Chester County, Pennsylvania, to Guilford County, North Carolina, and later went to what is now Johnson County, Kentucky, stopping first in Letcher County, Kentucky; was captain, 7th July, 1777, and for five years thereafter of a company of cavalry of North Carolina Militia. His company served under the following commanders: Col. John WILLIAMS, Colonel PAISLEY, Col. John TAYLOR, and lastly Col. William WASHINGTON. His company was engaged in keeping down a daring Tory named FANNING, who after the Revolution was excluded from every amnesty feature and who in 1799 removed to Nova Scotia, where he was appointed a Colonel of Militia. Captain CONNELLY removed from Johnson to Rowan County, Kentucky, in 1825, but later returned to Johnson County; married (firstly) circa 1774, Ann MACGREGOR, born 14th February, 1756, daughter of Archibald MACGREGOR, a member of the Clan MacGregor, one of the oldest and most historic, as well as the most persecuted, of the Scottish Clans. This Clan claims descent from Gregor, third son of King Alpin, who ruled Scotland, A. D. 787. The proud motto of the Clan is "Srioghail mo dhream"—"Royal is my race." Archibald MACGREGOR was severely wounded at the battle of Culloden, and left on the field as dead, but revived and escaped to North Carolina; married there Edith MACALPINE, daughter of ——— MACALPINE, who also escaped from the fatal field of Culloden to America. The MACALPINES are descended from a Clan or family which for twenty-five generations were Kings of Scotland. The war-cry of the Clan is "Cuimhnich bas Ailpein"—"Remember the death of Alpin," alluding to the murder of King Alpin by BRUDUS after the Picts defeated the Scots near Dundee in 838. The seat of this ancient Clan are Argyshire; married (second) 8th March, 1832, Temperance HITCHCOCK, widow of John HITCHCOCK, who had been a soldier in his company and had also moved to Johnson County, who was a Quaker, but went into the Revolution; the HITCHCOCK, CAUDILL, PELPHEV, and other Eastern Kentucky families are descended from him.

REV. HUGH O'SULLIVAN, the zealous, earnest and much-beloved pastor of St. Mary's of the Woods Church, Whitesville, Kentucky, was born at Syracuse, New York, November 4, 1858, a son of Michael and Anne (O'Dwyer) O'Sullivan. The parents, natives of Ireland, removed to Louisville, Kentucky, in 1869, when Father O'Sullivan was about eleven years of age, and in that city he was reared and educated, subsequently learning and following the vocation of shoe-fitter.

Being attracted to the priesthood of the Catholic Church, Father O'Sullivan after much preparatory work entered St. Joseph's College, Bardstown, Kentucky, from which he was duly graduated in 1889, and three years later was graduated from St. Mary's Seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio. On December 18, 1892, he was ordained to the priesthood at the Cathedral of Louisville, and for a few months his pastoral work was at Hardinsburg, Kentucky. In 1893 he became resident pastor of the Catholic Church at Whitesville and has continued to serve this church to the present time. St. Mary's of the Woods was constituted an independent mission and a resident pastor was assigned in the person of Rev. Cyran King in 1878. St. Mary's however, dates back to 1846, when the first church house was built of hewed logs on ground given by an early resident, Richard Barret. This served the little congregation during the early days of Fathers Coomes and Aud, but about the time of the completion of the first house of worship Father Michael Coghlan began his long ministrations of twenty-five years, serving the congregation from St. Lawrence.

About the year 1863 a frame church of larger proportions was erected, and this was afterward removed to Whitesville. Under Reverend King the congregation grew and prospered, and plans were laid for the present brick edifice, in which mass was first said in 1883, although the building was not completed until later, under the pastorate of Rev. L. B. Ford. Reverend King was pastor from 1878 to 1885, Rev. John Sheridan from 1885 to 1888, and Rev. L. B. Ford from 1888 to 1893, in which year Father O'Sullivan took up his duties. Since then the congregation has made gratifying progress, building a splendid brick parsonage and maintaining a parochial school which was first opened in 1882 by the Franciscan Sisters of Shelbyville. This school has had a splendid growth, and in 1917 the erection of a $25,000 school building and residence for the Sisters was begun.

Father O'Sullivan is not only a spiritual advisor to his people, but also their clear-sighted aid in matters of business importance and their friend in all matters of life. As a citizen of his community he has won the respect and esteem of the people of all creeds, and during the long period of his ministry at Whitesville he has accomplished much that has been of benefit to the town and its people.

MONROE PENNINGTON, M. D., who is numbered among the representative physicians and surgeons of Rockcastle County, is successfully established in practice at Mount Vernon, the county seat, and special interest attaches to his career by reason of his being a native son of Kentucky and a scion of a family that was established in this commonwealth in the pioneer days. His paternal grandfather, Levi Pennington, was born and reared in Perry County, Kentucky, a son of Abel Pennington, who was born and reared in Virginia and who was a young man when he came to Kentucky and numbered himself among the pioneer farmers of Perry County, whence he later removed to Jackson County, where he continued his alliance with farm industry until his death. The marriage of Levi Pennington to Miss Rachel Combs was solemnized in Perry County, and thereafter he engaged in farm enterprise in Jackson County, where he remained until he entered service as a soldier of the Union in the Civil war. He sacrificed his life in the cause, as he was killed in an engagement in which his command was participating near Vicksburg, Mississippi, in 1863, while still comparatively a young man. His widow survived him many years and continued her residence in Jackson County until her death, at the age of eighty years.

Doctor Pennington was born in Jackson County, Kentucky, on the 10th of September, 1872, and in his home resides his father, Preston Pennington, who was born in Perry County, May 22, 1846, but who was reared and educated in Jackson County, where for many years he was successfully engaged in farming upon an extensive scale. In 1913 he retired from the farm, and he and his wife have since resided in the home of their eldest son, Doctor Pennington of this review. Preston Pennington is a staunch republican in politics, is affiliated with the Masonic fraternity and the Grand Army of the Republic, and he and his wife have long been earnest members of the Baptist Church. He served as a gallant young soldier of the Union in the Civil war, and as a citizen has since exemplified the same spirit of loyalty that prompted him to go forth in defense of the nation's integrity. His wife, whose maiden name was Susan Ball, was born in Clay County, in 1845, and of their children Doctor Pennington of this sketch is the eldest. Rachel is the wife of Henry Shepard, a farmer in Laurel County. John D. is a representative farmer in Jackson County. Dr. James F. is a physician and is successfully engaged in general practice at Ford, Clark County. A. Lincoln, the next younger son, is in the service of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad at Corbin, Whitley County. Dr. James F. Pennington, the youngest of the children, was graduated from Jefferson Medical College in the City of Philadelphia, and aside from his private distinction in his professional work he was a member of the Medical Corps of the United States Army during the nation's participation in the World war.

The public schools of his native county afforded Dr. Monroe Pennington his early educational discipline, and in preparing himself for the profession of his choice he entered the medical department of the University of Louisville, in which he continued his studies with characteristic zest until he had completed the prescribed curriculum and was graduated as a member of the class of 1898. After thus receiving his well earned degree of Doctor of Medicine he established himself in practice at Mount Vernon, judicial center of Rockcastle County, where he continued in control of a substantial general practice until 1905. He then removed to Bertha, Knox County, where he held for the ensuing ten years the official position of surgeon for the North Jellico Coal Company. In 1915 he resumed practice at Mount Vernon, and here he has definite prestige as one of the leading physicians and surgeons of this section of the state. In addition to his large and representative private practice he is retained as local surgeon for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. The doctor has kept insistently in line with advances made in medical and surgical science, and in this connection has completed effective post-graduate courses in the Philadelphia Polyclinic and the Chicago Polyclinic, two of the greatest institutions of the kind in the United States. The office of Doctor Pennington is maintained in a building owned by him on Main Street, and he owns also his attractive residence property on West Main Street.

He is an active member of the Rockcastle County Medical Society, the Kentucky State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. He has served as health officer of Rockcastle County and as a member of the Board of Education of Mount Vernon. His political allegiance is given to the republican party, and he and his wife are zealous members of the Baptist Church at Mount Vernon, of which he is a trustee. The doctor is affiliated with Cooper Lodge No. 668, Free and Accepted Masons, at Corbin, Whitley County; Mount Vernon Chapter No. 140, Royal Arch Masons, of which he is past high priest; Marion Commandery No. 24, Knights Templar, at Lebanon; and Mount Vernon Tent No. 21, Knights of the Maccabees. He is a member of the directorate of the Bank of Mount Vernon and is one of the loyal and progressive citizens of his home city and county, with a circle of friends that is limited only by that of his acquaintances.

Doctor Pennington was one of the most influential figures in local war activities during the period of American participation in the World war. He was chairman of the Rockcastle county chapter of the Red Cross, was chairman of the committee which directed the Salvation Army drive in the county, as was he also in the local campaign in support of the war work of the Young Men's Christian Association. He organized the Rockcastle County Council of Defense, and was chairman of the same after its work was taken under the jurisdiction and direction of the state. He contributed liberally in personal subscriptions to the various war-bond issues of the Government, and was active in the bond and savings-stamp campaigns in his home county.

In Clay County, in 1890, was solemnized the marriage of Doctor Pennington to Miss Martha Porter, daughter of the late James H. and Alice (Long) Porter, both of whom died in Clay County, where the father was for many years a representative farmer. Doctor and Mrs. Pennington have no children.

ALLEN LINDSEY KINCHELOE, M. D. Belonging to that class of individuals whose practical education, quick perceptions, trained abilities and infinite capacity for painstaking accomplishment have advanced them to positions of professional prominence formerly occupied by men many years their seniors Dr. Allen Lindsey Kincheloe, while representing the vigorous and resourceful present of his state, gives promise of participating in its more enlightened future, more especially of Stanley, Daviess County, where he is established in a remunerative medical practice.

Doctor Kincheloe was born October 8, 1888, at Hardinsburg, Breckinridge County, Kentucky, where his father, Dr. Allen M. Kincheloe, has practiced medicine successfully for a half a century. The elder Doctor Kincheloe was also born in Breckinridge County, where he married Nancy Stith, a native of the same county, who also survives as a resident of Hardinsburg. Dr. Allen M. Kincheloe has long been numbered among the highly proficient practitioners of his county and occupies a strong place in the confidence and esteem of his fellow-citizens, to whose health and interests he has devoted the best years of his long and honorable career.

Allen Lindsey Kincheloe attended the public schools of Hardinsburg, and after his graduation from high school began the study of medicine at the University of Louisville, from which he was duly graduated with the class of 1911, receiving the degree of Doctor of Medicine. Following his graduation he spent one year as an interne in the Hazelwood Sanitarium at Louisville, and then located at McQuady, Kentucky, where he practiced until February, 1915. He then came to Stanley, where he has since built up a large and remunerative practice. Doctor Kincheloe's business and social success has been materially aided by that spirit of kindness which makes the whole world kin, which appreciates merit in others and which recognizes the value of tact and consideration when dealing with all the problems of life. He has won the esteem and respect of his fellow-practitioners and is a valued and popular member of the Daviess County Medical Society, the Kentucky State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. His practice has been built up on merit, and there are many families at Stanley and in the surrounding country who depend absolutely upon his skill. As a fraternalist he holds membership in the Masons, in which he is a past master, while his religious affiliation is with the Methodist Church, to which Mrs. Kincheloe also belongs. In politics Doctor Kincheloe is a republican, but has not sought public office, the duties of his profession keeping him from actively entering politics thus far in his career. He is, however, a good citizen, and has always been a staunch supporter of worthy civic movements.

Doctor Kincheloe was united in marriage in 1917 with Miss Antha Hill, of Stanley, a member of a well-known and highly respected family of Daviess County, and to this union there has been born one daughter, Margaret Hill.

THOMAS JEFFERSON NICELEY. There are, unquestionable, individuals of natural force found in every prosperous community who by reason of their inherent ability and the use of their intellect and the soundness of judgment attain distinction and acquire authority. They are men who industriously work for an end, and in helping themselves add to the sum of comfort and prosperity of their locality. They may be men of versatile gifts and talents of a high order in many directions, but it is in their soundness, their vitality and their steadiness that they are such important factors in the community's life. A man of this class is found in Thomas Jefferson Niceley, president of the Bank of Mount Vernon and Circuit Court clerk of Rockcastle County.

Mr. Niceley was born near the present site of the Village of Bond in Jackson County, Kentucky, November 30, 1875, a son of Benjamin Franklin and Phoebe (Nichols) Niceley. He belongs to a family which came from England to America in Colonial times, and is a grandson of William Niceley, who was born in 1799 in Tennessee. William Niceley came to Rockcastle County, Kentucky, as a pioneer of the year 1815, and followed farming all his life. He married in this county a Miss Dermon, who passed away during the period of the war between the states.

Benjamin Franklin Niceley was born in Rockcastle County, Kentucky, where he was reared and educated and as a young man engaged in farming, to which he devoted himself until the outbreak of hostilities between the forces of the North and the South. Espousing the cause of the Union, in 1861 he enlisted in the Third Regiment, Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, with which organization he fought for three years and eight months, during which time he participated in numerous hard-fought and important battles, including Shiloh, Chickamauga, Stone River, Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge, and the engagements during General Sherman's famous March to the Sea, during which he suffered a gun-shot wound in the shoulder. With a splendid record for bravery and faithful performance of duty he returned to farming in Rockcastle County, but in 1868 removed to Jackson County, where he carried on very successful agricultural operations until 1890. At that time he came back to Rockcastle County, where he tilled the soil until 1904, in which year he retired from active pursuits and removed to Indianapolis, Indiana, where he now makes his home. He is a republican in politics and a strong member of the Christian Church, and in each of the communities in which he has made his home has been held in the highest esteem because of his personal integrity, probity of character and good citizenship. Mr. Niceley married Miss Phoebe Nichols, who was born in 1841, in Rockcastle County, and they became the parents of the following children: William G., who is a farmer and hotel proprietor at Livingston, Kentucky; Martha, of near Hansford, Rockcastle County, the widow of G. W. Owens, formerly a farmer of that locality; Bettie, the wife of Mr. McDermott, of St. Louis, formerly in the harness business for the United States Government, and now a business man; Robert, residing with his parents at Indianapolis, where for the past seventeen years he has been connected with the Atkins Saw Factory; Thomas Jefferson; J. L., a farmer of the vicinity of Julesburg, Colorado; and Lillian, the wife of John Slifer, a merchant of Indianapolis.

Thomas Jefferson Niceley received his education in the rural schools of Rockcastle County and, leaving school at the age of eighteen years, became his father's associate on the home farm. About the time of the elder man's retirement he left the home place, and in 1906 was appointed deputy sheriff of the county, a position which he held for four years. He was then elected sheriff, and occupied that office for four years, from January, 1910, and in 1914 was appointed Circuit Court clerk to complete an unexpired term of two years. Mr. Niceley was elected to that office in November, 1915, and took office in January, 1916, for a term of six years. His record in office has been an excellent one, and those whose business calls them to the Circuit Court clerk's office in the Court House are assured of courteous treatment and the closest of attention to their communications. Mr. Niceley is a republican in his political views, and a member of the Christian Church. As a fraternalist he holds membership in Ashland Lodge No. 640, Free and Accepted Masons; Mount Vernon Chapter No. 140, Royal Arch Masons; Mount Vernon Council, Royal and Select Masters; Mount Vernon Lodge No. 320, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Mount Vernon Tent No. 21, Knights of the Maccabees, and Mount Vernon Camp No. 12,444, Modern Woodmen of America, in all of which he is very popular.

Mr. Niceley is prominent in business circles and in financial life holds prominence as president of the Mount Vernon Bank, a position which he assumed in 1918. This bank was established in 1900, as a state institution, and the present officers are: President, T. J. Niceley; vice president, G. S. Griffin; cashier, W. L. Richards; and assistant cashier, V. C. Tate. The capital stock of the institution is $15,000; the surplus and undivided profits, $11,000; and the deposits approximately $150,000. Mr. Niceley has proven a careful and conservative official, with the best interests of the depositors at heart, while also possessing the proper amount of progressiveness to take advantage of worthwhile opportunities. He is the owner of a modern home on Richmond Street, a fifteen-acre tract adjoining Mount Vernon on the north side, and three town lots. Local war activities found him a generous supporter during the World war, and he devoted much time to the cause, serving on committees for the sale of the different Liberty Bond issues, the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A. and other drives, and also contributing generously himself.

In 1898, near Level Green, Rockcastle County, Mr. Niceley was united in marriage with Miss Lucy M. Catron, a daughter of Henry and Sarah (Lewis) Catron, the former residing at Crab Orchard, Kentucky, as a retired farmer and ex-sheriff of Rockcastle County, and the latter being deceased. To Mr. and Mrs. Niceley there have been born five children: Bonnie, who is the wife of Earl Cox, an undertaker of Lynch, Harlan County, Kentucky; Dessie Helen, a graduate of the Mount Vernon High School, class of 1921, and now a college student; Russell, attending Mount Vernon High School; Henry, attending graded school; and Lewis D., the baby.

WILLIAM ERNEST AUD. Kentucky has always been distinguished for the high rank of her bench and bar. Many of her lawyers have been men of national fame, and there is scarcely a city in the state but that can boast of one or more lawyers capable of crossing swords in combat with many of the distinguished legal lights of the country. In William Ernest Aud are found united many of the rare qualities which go to make up the successful lawyer, possessing those solid and substantial qualities which have won for him a reputation as one of the most reliable members of the local bar.

H. Clay Shryver

William Ernest Aud, senior member of the law firm of Aud & Higdon, of Owensboro, was born at Knottsville, Daviess County, on March 19, 1870, and is a son of Hillary T. and Victoria (Jarboe) Aud, both of whom were born and reared in Daviess County. The paternal grandfather, Thomas Aud, was also a native of the Blue Grass state, but the Aud family came to this state from Maryland in an early day, as also did the Jarboe family, though Mr. Aud's maternal grandfather, Ignatius Jarboe, was born in Kentucky. Hillary T. Aud successfully conducted a mercantile business for many years in Knottsville, where his death occurred in 1905, at the age of sixty-five years. Though he was successful and cared well for his family, rearing to maturity three sons and two daughters, he did not leave a large estate, having been over-generous in his extension of credit to his customers, many of whom failed to pay their indebtedness. He stood high in the esteem of his fellow citizens, having served as a magistrate for nineteen years and possessing a ripeness of judgment and a fund of common sense that made a valued and appreciated counsellor in many matters of local importance, as well as a wise advisor in private affairs. He was a republican in his political faith, while in church faith he and his wife, a lady of strong force of character and sterling qualities of heart and mind, were Roman Catholics, in which faith they reared their children. The mother died in 1914, at the age of seventy years.

William E. Aud was reared in his native town, where he received his elemental education in the public schools. He was then a student in Cecelia College (Kentucky), from which institution he was graduated in 1889. In further pursuit of a literary education he attended for one year a branch school of Saint Mainrad College at Jasper, Indiana. Having decided to devote his life to the practice of law, he then set himself to its study under the preceptorship of J. D. Atchinson, Rubin A. Miller and Colonel Bowers, members of the Owensboro bar and, though he was licensed to practice law in 1893, he continued to read law two years more. In 1895 he entered upon active practice, and has been so engaged continuously here for more than twenty-five years, enjoying a large general practice, though specializing somewhat in equity practice. Since 1914 he has been associated in practice with James R. Higdon, under the firm name of Aud & Higdon. By a straightforward and honorable course he has built up a large and lucrative legal business, in which he has been successful beyond the average of his calling. In discussions of the principles of law he is noted for clearness of statement and candor; he seeks faithfully for firm ground and having once found it nothing can drive him from his position, his zeal for a client never leading him to urge an argument which in his opinion is not in harmony with the law. Therefore he enjoys the confidence of the courts and the respect of his professional colleagues.

On August 27, 1903, Mr. Aud was married to Delphine Miller, of Owensboro, and they have two children, Nancy and Margaret. Mr. and Mrs. Aud are members of Saint Paul's Roman Catholic Church of Owensboro. Mrs. Aud was born at Newton, Illinois, and moved to Owensboro when twenty-one years of age. Politically Mr. Aud is somewhat independent as a voter, but inclines to the democratic party. He was one of the first members of the Knights of Columbus and in the first class initiated in Owensboro. Though a man of unpretentious demeanor, he possesses those personal qualities that draw men to him and enjoys a marked popularity throughout the county honored by his citizenship.

HENRY CLAIBORN HODGKIN. Were a vote to be taken among the people of Clark county to determine the citizen who possesses the greatest degree of popularity there is not a doubt but that the name of Henry Claiborn Hodgkin would be among the leaders when the ballots were counted, if he did not head the list. Sheriff of Clark county since January, 1918, he has invested the duties of his office with splendid enthusiasm and efficiency, and at the same time has maintained a spirit of good-fellowship with his fellow-citizens that has attracted to him countless friends.

Henry Claiborn Hodgkin, or H. Clay Hodgkin as he is more familiarly known, was born October 8, 1875, near Mount Olive Church, Clark County, in the residence now owned by Mrs. Mollie C. Baldwin, his parents being Jesse N. and Minerva (Lisle) Hodgkin. He belongs to one of the most highly-respected families of Clark County, a full review of which will be found in the sketch of Jesse N. Hodgkin elsewhere in this work. In December of the year of his birth Mr. Hodgkin was brought by his parents to near Elkin Station, where he was reared, his education being acquired in the public schools. On July 1, 1905, he became a clerk in the Winchester Bank of Winchester, and was employed there until January 1, 1914. He was then appointed deputy sheriff under H. S. Gilbert, and served four years as deputy. In the elections of August, 1917, he was chosen to succeed Sheriff Gilbert as sheriff of Clark County, and took office in January, 1918, his term expiring January 21, 1922. During his term of office he was elected assistant cashier of the Citizens National Bank of Winchester, and served as such for two years and in 1921 was elected assistant cashier of the Peoples State Bank and Trust Company which position he is now filling in connection with his duties as sheriff. As an officer of the law he has been courageous in maintaining order and indefatigable in his prosecution of the criminal element. The duties of sheriff also carry with them those of tax collector, and in this department he has likewise performed creditably, rendering his county valued service. At the time when he first entered the sheriff's office the annual taxes collected in the county amounted to $160,000, while in the year 1919 Mr. Hodgkin and his two deputies, J. R. Allen and J. D. Bush, collected approximately $375,000. Since assuming the duties of public office Mr. Hodgkin has applied his attention strictly thereto, although he has large landed interests. From young manhood he has been in partnership with his brother, Samuel Hodgkin, of Elkin, Kentucky, and at this time they are the owners of 304 acres of choice land which is devoted to general farming under his brother's supervision. Sheriff Hodgkin's popularity rests largely upon a nature that extends itself to accommodate others and upon a pleasing personality that readily attracts friends, who, once gained, are retained indefinitely.

In February, 1905, Sheriff Hodgkin was united in marriage with Miss Annie Talbott Baxter, of Madison County, Kentucky, born near Brookston, a daughter of Edward Baxter, an ex-Confederate soldier and a brother of J. G. Baxter, former county judge and now road commissioner of Madison County. Sheriff and Mrs. Hodgkin have no children.

CLARENCE WESTERFIELD. As county tax commissioner of Daviess County Mr. Westerfield is one of the best known citizens of his county and is also widely known over the state. He has set a high standard of efficiency in his office and has the benefit of many years of experience in the Court House at Owensboro and a thorough business training.

He is a native of Ohio County, where the Westerfields are a numerous and prominent family. His parents, William H. and Nancy (Chapman) Westerfield, were both born in Ohio County. His father fought three years for the Confederate cause during the war, was always a staunch democrat, was a Master Mason and a member of the Baptist Church. He lived on his farm in Ohio County until 1903, when he bought a farm near Masonville in Daviess County, and on that spent the rest of his life. He died in 1912 at the age of sixty-nine. He was three times married. His first wife was Josie Birk, a daughter of Daniel Birk of Ohio County. Her two children were Mollie and Charlie. After her death William H. Westerfield married Nancy Chapman, who died in 1898. She was the mother of Clarence, Herbert and Bertha Westerfield. For his third wife William H. Westerfield married Miss Fannie Westerfield, now deceased, who was a well known and able school teacher for many years both in Kentucky and western states.

Clarence Westerfield, whose general worth and popularity are attested by the fact that he outgrew the burden of the nickname of "Dude," was born on his father's Ohio farm September 21, 1892, and was only six years of age when his mother died. He was eleven when the family came to Daviess County, and he grew up on the farm near Masonville, finishing his education in the country schools. His life was the routine of a farm until nineteen, and when he left home he became a wagon driver at six dollars a week for the Mullen & Haynes wholesale drug company of Owensboro. A year later he had advanced so far in proficiency and the confidence of the company that they put him on the road as a traveling salesman, and for three years he steadily added to the volume of trade of that concern.

Mr. Westerfield early became interested in politics, and his first public office was as deputy county assessor under A. S. Tyner. He was Mr. Tyner's assistant four years, and with the election of the late R. C. Clark as county assessor Mr. Westerfield was put in charge of the office and had the responsibilities of handling the details of office throughout the four-year term of Mr. Clark. In the meantime the Legislature had changed the title of the office to that of county tax commissioner.

Following his eight years as deputy assessor Mr. Westerfield in 1917 was elected for the full term of four years as county tax commissioner, beginning his duties in January, 1918. He has performed the delicate and difficult duties of tax commissioner with such discrimination and good judgment as to win the approval of the great bulk of tax payers in Daviess County. His duties require frequent attendance at the state capital, where he has gained a large acquaintance with men in public life in Kentucky. Mr. Westerfield is one of the leading democrats of his county, and is a member of the Order of Elks. In March, 1912, he married Miss Jessie Roll, daughter of Dr. J. B. Roll, of Daviess County.

CHARLES OSMUND EVANS. Having spent his life in agricultural pursuits, Charles Osmund Evans cannot help but be gratified with the success he has achieved in his calling, which entitles him to a foremost place among the leading farmers of Daviess County. He was born on a farm in this county, ten miles east of Owensboro, August 17, 1872, a son of John and Agnes (Read) Evans. Agnes Read Evans' mother was Elizabeth Hunter, and her father was De Grafton Read. He was one of three educators to endow Logan College at Russellville. The Read family came originally from Pennsylvania.

John Evans was born in Jefferson County, Kentucky, March 24, 1823, and his death occurred July 4, 1892. He was a son of Francis and Margaret Evans, who spent the latter part of their lives in Daviess County, where they died and are buried. Agnes (Read) Evans was born in Kentucky, March 31, 1833, and died November 22, 1901. She and John Evans were married February 19, 1852, and they had the following children: Mary E., Bettie R., deceased, William Morton, deceased, Margaret May, and Charles Osmund. The parents were consistent members of the Christian Church in which they were active workers.

Charles Osmund Evans was reared on his father's farm and early learned habits of industry and thrift which have contributed largely to his success in life, remaining with his parents until both passed away. On November 8, 1899, he was united in marriage with Miss Ella Peyton Field, a daughter of Ben T. and Martha Jane (Hurt) Field. Ben T. Field was born in Daviess County, Kentucky, March 20, 1842, and died May 2, 1914. His wife was born August 12, 1851, and died October 20, 1899. Mrs. Evans' paternal grandparents were Thomas and Arabella (Morton) Field, and her maternal grandparents were John William and Elizabeth (Board) Hurt. The mother of Elizabeth Board was a Miss Creer, and John William Hurt's mother was Miss Polly Wright, and all of them were natives of Virginia with the exception of Mrs. Thomas Field, who was born in Maryland. During the war between the states Ben T. Field served as a soldier in the Confederate army, raising a company which became a part of the Tenth Kentucky Infantry, Confederate States of America. Serving with gallantry during the war, at its close he became a farmer, and in that calling amassed a comfortable competency. Mrs. Evans is one of six children born to her parents, as follows: Thomas Crawford, John William, Bettie Belle, Ella Peyton, Newton Howell and Virginia May, the last named being deceased. Mr. and Mrs. Evans have a family as follows: John Morton, Mary Elizabeth, Margaret Field, Leila Ward and Charles Osmund.

Mrs. Evans is a Baptist and Mr. Evans belongs to the Christian Church. Until 1906 Mr. and Mrs. Evans lived on the Evans' homestead, but in that year moved to the Field homestead and made it their home until in January, 1918, when they bought their present place, which is regarded as the best residence in Daviess County and is located immediately adjacent to the east end of Owensboro. They are very fine people in every way and number their friends by legions. They have taken a constructive part in the development of the county, where their interests are centered, and are the friends of the public schools, good roads and all movements calculated to be of benefit to the locality and the people living in it.

SIDNEY STUMP, proprietor of the Sunnyside Farm on the Oddville Turnpike, two and one-half miles northeast of Cynthiana, was born on this farm August 22, 1857, and is proud of the fact that he owns this valuable homestead of his family, to whose fertility he has added by intelligent cultivation. He is a son of John and Rebecca (Berry) Stump. John Stump was born in Harrison County, two and one-half miles west of Cynthiana, and his wife was born in the same county. They were reared in this county, where they were married, and following their marriage they located on a farm three and one-half miles northeast of Cynthiana, which continued their home until 1857, when they bought the present farm. Here John Stump died, his widow surviving him until 1890. She was a member of the Christian Church. In politics he was a democrat, and although he did not participate in the war of the '60s one of his sons, George, lost his life in it. There were several children born to John Stump and his wife, all of whom reached maturity, although only two now survive, namely: Sidney and his elder brother, James W., a bachelor, who is living retired at Atlantic City, New Jersey. At one time he was the largest tobacco buyer in Harrison County besides being an extensive land owner.

Growing up on his father's farm Sidney Stump attended the district schools. When his mother died he bought the homestead of 212 acres, and has spent his life upon this farm. Since becoming the owner he has made a number of improvements, building his present residence in 1911. This is a very convenient, modern home with nine rooms on the first floor. He has hardwood floors throughout, and operates his own electric light plant. This is pointed out by his neighbors as one of the model country homes of the county.

On November 26, 1890, Mr. Stump was united in marriage with Vandalia Endicott, who was also born in Harrison County, a daughter of William and Mary (Long) Endicott. Mrs. Stump was reared on her father's farm and educated in the public schools. Mr. and Mrs. Stump have three children: John W., Sidney Jr., and Ray I. Mr. Stump and family are consistent members of the Baptist Church. In politics he is a democrat, but has never cared for public honors. In addition to his other interests he is a stockholder in the Farmers Bank of Cynthiana, and also in the Independent Tobacco Warehouse. He measures up to high standards of citizenship, and he and his wife are deservedly popular in their wide circle of friends, while his rating as a farmer and business man is unquestioned.

EDWARD F. VAN DEREN. Through a period of some four decades Edward F. Van Deren has pursued the routine of a hard working and successful farmer and stock man in Harrison County, and the farm to which he has given so many years of effective labor is the same that he knew as a child and boy. It is the old James Van Deren farm on Falmouth Pike, four miles north of Cynthiana.

On this farm Mr. Van Deren was born January 25, 1858, a son of James and Sarah E. (Waites) Van Deren. This is one of the old families of Harrison County. His great-grandparents were Barnard and Sarah (Murray) Van Deren, who came from Virginia and settled at a very early date about five miles west of Cynthiana, on the banks of Raven Creek, where they developed a farm and home from the wilderness. The grandparents of Edward Van Deren were James and Sarah (Journey) Van Deren. James Van Deren, father of Edward Van Deren, was born in Harrison County in October, 1821, just a century ago, and he grew up in the old Union Church community. After his marriage he settled on the farm now owned by his son Edward, and remained there an honored factor in the community until his death. His widow, aged eighty-five, is still living at Cynthiana. Both were identified with the Christian Church, in which he was a deacon, and in politics he voted as a republican. James Van Deren and wife had seven children: Edward F.; Anna, widow of Hubble Chinn; James G., a retired farmer at Cynthiana; W. S., cashier of the Harrison County Deposit Bank; the fifth child died in infancy; H. P. Van Deren, of Cynthiana, and Elizabeth who died when eighteen years of age.

Edward F. Van Deren acquired his education in the public schools and Smith's Classical School, and for one term was a teacher. His early training was on the farm, and he was well qualified for its responsibilities when he took possession. He owns 200 acres, and success in handling his individual affairs has made him a man of influence in the rural community. He is Secretary of Live Forever Grange and past master of Pomona Grange of Harrison County. He votes as a republican, and he and Mrs. Van Deren are members of the Christian Church of Cynthiana.

On November 17, 1896, Mr. Van Deren married Estella Yancey. She was born in Arkansas, and is a graduate of Hamilton College at Lexington, and was a teacher in Bethel College at Hopkinsville, Kentucky, until her marriage. They have three children: Edward Y., who is a graduate of the Cynthiana High School and of the State University in the agricultural course, and is a practical and scientific young farmer; Sarah M., who is a graduate of Hamilton College at Lexington; and John M., a student in the state university.

FRANK LAIR is a member of a family that has been identified with Harrison County since pioneer days. Lair village and postoffice were named for his grandfather, Charles Lair. As a family they have been people of substantial worth, accumulators of land and thrifty farmers.

The family has been in America nearly two centuries. The founder was Mathias Lair, who was born in Germany in 1714 and came to the American Colonies in 1738, locating in Virginia. He married Catherine Myer, and they had a family of nine children. Mathias Lair died in 1787. One of his sons was Captain Mathias Lair, who earned his title as a soldier of the Revolution. Captain Mathias was the father of Charles Lair, a native of Virginia, who came to Kentucky and established the Lair community in Harrison County. Charles Lair married Sallie Anderson in 1801, and their children were Mathias, Charles, Newton and William. Of these Mathias Lair was born near Lair Station in 1813 and married his cousin, Rowena Lair, who was born in the same community in 1835. Of their eight children the only survivor is Frank Lair, who was born near Lair Station August 26, 1857.

Mr. Lair grew up in the home community, did farm work as a boy and acquired a common school education. His time and interests were with the homestead until he was twenty-two and after that for fifteen years he was a successful owner, trainer and driver of trotting and pacing horses. Since then his time has been fully taken up with his farm of 128 acres seven miles south of Cynthiana. He is a deacon in the Christian Church. On June 23, 1892, Mr. Lair married Miss Bertha Scott, who was reared in the same community in Harrison County. She was born at Moscow, Ohio, May 10, 1875, but was brought to Harrison County when a girl by her parents, James Luther and Sally Scott. She is a graduate of the Harrison Female College. Mr. and Mrs. Lair became the parents of four children, three of whom are living: Ruth Talbott, who is a graduate of the Paris High School and the Eastern Kentucky Normal School and is one of Harrison County's teachers; Irene S., a graduate of the Cynthiana High School; and Frank G., who married Lone C. Clifford, and assists his father. Mr. Lair and family are active members of the Mount Carmel Christian Church.

WILLIAM A. LUCKEY. As a stock dealer William A. Luckey is widely known among the farmers and stock raisers throughout Harrison and adjoining counties. For many years he has farmed either rented land or land he individually owned, and now has a small farm and country place conveniently situated for his business as a stock dealer a mile and a quarter east of Cynthiana.

Mr. Luckey was born in Harrison County, Kentucky, June 17, 1865, a son of Nathaniel C. and Martha (Marshall) Luckey, both natives of Kentucky, his mother having been born in Nicholas County. Nathaniel Luckey went to Harrison County when a boy, and after his marriage settled on a farm there, where he lived until the death of his wife in 1868. Of three children one died in infancy and the two survivors are James S. and William A. Luckey, both farmers in Harrison County.

William A. Luckey was three years of age when his mother died, and after that he lived with his grandfather, James Luckey. Under such circumstances his education was partly neglected, but he learned the fundamentals, and experience has given him a broad knowledge of men and affairs. At the age of fourteen he started out to earn his own living, and until he was twenty-one he worked by the day or month, frequently receiving only eight dollars a month for his labor.

On November 15, 1888, Mr. Luckey married Miss Elizabeth Yates, who was born in Nicholas County and reared in Bourbon County. Her mother dying in her infancy, Mrs. Luckey lived with an uncle until her father, William Yates, was married to Annie Cumbers, when she was nine years old. After their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Luckey lived on a farm for five years as renters, then bought a small place, but continued renting, and subsequently acquired a farm of sixty-five acres, now containing nearly 200 acres, on which they resided for twenty years, and which he still owns. In 1916 he bought the thirteen acres comprising his present comfortable home near Cynthiana.

Mr. and Mrs. Luckey have two children. Bessie, who was educated in the grammar and high schools of Cynthiana and is at home, and Charles L., who was educated at Cynthiana and is a farmer a mile east of Colville. He married Laura B. Faulkner and has a son, Charles William, born November 4, 1919. Mr. and Mrs. Luckey are members of the Indian Creek Baptist Church, while their son and his wife are members of the Indian Creek Christian Church. Fraternally Mr. Luckey is affiliated with Cynthiana Lodge No. 127, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and in politics is a democrat.

COLONEL EZEKIEL F. CLAY. Among the Clays of Kentucky the late Colonel Ezekiel F. Clay had many interesting distinctions, as a gallant soldier in the war between the states, and for more than half a century one of Bourbon County's foremost citizens. His achievements and the ideals with which his name was associated gave his career a measure of distinction not confined to his native state.

Colonel Clay was born in Bourbon County December 1, 1840, and died July 26, 1920, when almost fourscore years of age. He was a son of Brutus J. and Amelia (Field) Clay. Brutus J. Clay from his home in Bourbon County gained a national reputation as a farmer, a breeder of blooded stock, served many years as president of the Agricultural Fair of Bourbon County, and was also sent to Congress and given other positions of honor and responsibility and enjoyed the unbounded confidence of his people through his integrity, high sense of honor and practical sense. He was twice married, his wives being Amelia and Ann Field, sisters. The only child of his second marriage was the Hon. Cassius M. Clay, Jr., of Bourbon County. Col. Ezekiel F. Clay, unlike his younger brother Cassius M. Clay, was not so much inclined to participate in politics. He, however, was always vitally interested in all public matters pertaining to the welfare of the state, county or municipality although never seeking political preferment individually. He was educated in the public schools of his native county, and was a student in Bacon College at Harrodsburg when the war began. In October, 1861, he enlisted as a private in the First Kentucky Mounted Rifles, and during the following months was in service under General Humphrey Marshall in the mountains of Eastern Kentucky and Western Virginia. He then organized a new company, was elected captain early in 1862, and subsequently promoted to lieutenant colonel in the First Battalion. He continued in General Marshall's command throughout 1862. In September, 1863, in command of his battalion and in the brigade commanded by General Hodge, under General Forrest, he participated in the operation following the battle of Chickamauga in the famous raid of General Wheeler through middle Tennessee. He took a prominent part in the attack on McMinnville and later in the attack on Shelbyville, where General Wheeler was defeated. Then, as part of the rear guard, he participated in the strenuous resistance to the pursuing Federals, during which a large part of the Confederate command was cut to pieces and Colonel Clay himself was severely wounded. Later he participated in the Knoxville campaign in East Tennessee and in April, 1864, at Ponceon Creek, Kentucky, while in command of his brigade, was wounded, a rifle ball destroying the sight of one of his eyes. He was captured, and spent a number of months in the Federal prison on Johnson's Island in Lake Erie, being finally paroled and allowed to return to his home in Bourbon County.

It was after the war that he began his career as a breeder of thoroughbred horses, and subsequently achieved prominence as one of the best known turf men of America, not only on account of the many valuable horses which by his skill, judgment and enterprise he produced but also because of his reputation for honor and integrity in all things pertaining to the business. The center of his operations was his fine estate known as Runnymede on the Paris and Cynthiana Pike. On the organization of the Bourbon Bank of Paris he was made president, and held that office until 1909, when he resigned. The last ten years of his life he spent about half the time each year at Lake Eustis, Florida, where he participated in fishing and other diversions. He served for several years as president of the Kentucky Racing Association, the oldest turf organization in America.

Colonel Clay in 1867 began the breeding of Short-horn cattle, and was a factor in that industry in Kentucky until 1875. About a year later he became associated in partnership with Catesby Woodford, and their partnership was maintained until about five or six years before the death of Colonel Clay. They established the famous Runnymede Stud, on the Runnymede Farm, three and a half miles northeast of Paris. This estate comprises 600 acres. Here were bred many wonderful horses, including Miss Woodford, Hanover, Sir Dixon, and other kings and queens of the turf. Colonel Clay was in the thoroughbred business for love of the horse, and his strict integrity and high moral character enabled him to bring about many turf reforms, and numerous laws passed for the regulation of racing on the American track were prompted by his efforts to keep up the standard of racing.

While he possessed one of the typical characteristics of a Kentucky gentleman, love of a good horse, his active interests may be said to have included the whole realm of nature, and he took great delight in flowers and trees and personally supervised the adornment of his beautiful estate in Bourbon County. Runnymede comprises historic ground, since it was at one time owned by Governor Garrard, one of Kentucky's first governors, and the house and church built by him are still standing on the farm. Governor Garrard lived there many years and was buried on an adjoining place, known as Mount Lebanon, and later the State of Kentucky erected to him a monument to mark the site. The house in which Colonel Clay lived for many years was built by Governor Garrard's grandson, William Garrard, and this property was purchased by Colonel Clay soon after the close of the war. It is one of the stately old homes of three-quarters of a century ago, and the grounds surrounding it are a veritable park.

On May 8, 1866, Colonel Clay married Miss Mary L. Woodford, a daughter of John T. and Elizabeth (Buckner) Woodford, of a central Kentucky family whose history is more completely told elsewhere. Colonel and Mrs. Clay had six children: Ezekiel F., Jr., Woodford, Brutus, Jr., Buckner, Amelia and Mary C. Clay. The mother of these children died August 8, 1900. On June 17, 1902, Colonel Clay married Mrs. Florence (Kelly) Lockhart, widow of the late George C. Lockhart and daughter of Rev. Samuel and Mary Kelly. Mrs. Clay is still living at the old homestead. The history of her late husband is detailed in the following sketch.

Of the children of Colonel Clay the oldest was Ezekiel Fields Clay, Jr., whose first wife was Annie Cary Ward, a daughter of Judge J. Q. Ward of Bourbon County. She died, leaving one son, Cary Ward Clay. Ezekiel F. Clay, Jr., married for his second wife Annie Lee Washington, a daughter of Col. George Washington, of Newport, Kentucky. Mr. Clay died January 29, 1915. His widow still occupies the old home, just opposite that of Colonel Clay. She has one son, Ezekiel Fields Clay III.

The second son of Colonel Clay was Woodford Clay, who died in June, 1916. He was a bachelor and was interested in the breeding of horses, being a member of the firm Clay Brothers. He was a well known trainer and follower of the race tracks on the Grand Circuit.

The third son, Brutus Clay, is a well known attorney at Atlanta, Georgia. He married Agnes McEvoy, of Baltimore, Maryland, and they have four children, Mary

G. C. Lockhart

Woodford, Anne McEvoy, Brutus Junius III, and Agnes Marie.

Buckner Clay, the fourth of the sons, is a lawyer at Charleston, West Virginia. He married Juliette Staunton and has one son, Buckner, Jr.

The daughter Amelia Clay is the wife of Sam Clay of Bourbon County and has three living children. Mary Catesby Clay is unmarried and still resides at the old homestead.

GEORGE CATLETT LOCKHART, who practiced law nearly thirty years, achieved all the most substantial honors of a professional career, and not less the attributes of the strong minded and earnest citizen, and a Christian gentleman.

He was born at Lexington, Kentucky, April 28, 1848, and was still in the prime of his powers when death came to him March 9, 1898. His father, Henry H. Lockhart, was born in County Armagh, Ireland, in 1800, of pure Scotch parentage, and was brought to this country in 1807. He was reared in New York, but as a young man went to South Carolina and from there came to Lexington, Kentucky, where for many years he was a farmer and trader. He married Sarah Richardson, a member of an old and prominent Kentucky family of Colonial ancestry. The Richardsons came to Virginia in 1650 from England and toward the close of the eighteenth century a branch of the family established their home in Kentucky.

George C. Lockhart was educated at Lexington, in Bacon College at Harrodsburg, and for several years after the period of the Civil war was engaged in teaching. When General Morgan organized his command in Lexington he was too young to enlist, but he nevertheless joined the troop and served with Morgan in the quartermaster department and was known as Little Quartermaster. He was sent north to meet a spy who was coming South, and, after meeting him, took him through Kentucky. On his next trip to Kentucky he was arrested as a spy in Montgomery County by troops sent from Lexington who had followed his mother, who had gone to see him. He was taken to Lexington and tried, but was acquitted. In 1865-66 Mr. Lockhart was editor of the Mount Sterling Sentinel. He gave all the time he could to the study of law, was admitted to the bar in 1867, but for several years thereafter continued teaching in a collegiate institute in Western Missouri. In 1870 he began practice at Paris, Kentucky, and thereafter was singularly devoted to his profession, and only once was turned aside to occupy political office, when he was elected to the Legislature in 1875. He was appointed local attorney for the Kentucky Central Railroad in 1879. He became district attorney when this road became a division of the Huntington system, and when it was absorbed by the Louisville and Nashville Railway he became attorney for that system and continued as one of the district attorneys of this great railway until his death. At the same time he carried on a great volume of private practice, and for a quarter of a century it is said that his services were identified with practically every important case in the circuit including Bourbon County. He possessed a profound knowledge of the law, had all the resources of an active intelligence that enabled him to meet on equal plane some of the greatest legal lights of his generation, and guided by the highest ethical standards he achieved a name that will long be distinguished in the annals of the Kentucky bar. He was also deeply devoted to the welfare of his home city and its institutions. From 1883 until his death he was a member of the board of education, and was always sought out to give his support to matters of community concern.

On January 31, 1882, he married Miss Florence Leslie Kelly, daughter of Rev. Samuel Kelly, who was one of the ablest ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Mrs. Lockhart was liberally educated, and at the time of her marriage was professor of English literature in the Millersburg Female College. After the death of Mr. Lockhart she became the wife of the late Col. E. F. Clay, and still occupies the fine Clay homestead near Paris. As Mrs. Lockhart she was the mother of three daughters: Mary Hearne, who died in 1915, the wife of Aylette Buckner, still living in Bourbon County, and also survived by one son, Catlett Lockhart Buckner; Sarah Catlett Lockhart, who married Catesby Woodford Spears, of Bourbon County; and Florence Kelly Lockhart, who is the wife of John F. Davis, of Paris, and has two children, John Lockhart and Sally Perrin Davis.

CHARLES B. HOBDA. Out on Waits Pike, five miles north of Cynthiana, are located the farm and home of Charles B. Hobday, one of the live and enterprising agriculturists of Harrison County, who has made something of a specialty of the breeding of Jersey cattle.

Mr. Hobday was born in Harrison County June 30, 1873, a son of John M. and Rebecca M. (Walters) Hobday. His father was born in Culpeper County, Virginia, June 18, 1821, and was eight years of age when his father moved to Pendleton County, Kentucky. He grew up there, acquired a good education at Falmouth, and for seventeen years gave most of his time to teaching in Harrison and adjoining counties. After his marriage he settled near Claysville, and was a practical farmer the rest of his life in that community. He was a member of the Baptist Church at North Fork in Bracken County and was a Mason. His wife was born in Bracken County March 4, 1845, and is still living, in her eightieth year. She was reared and educated in the Claysville community. There are three children: Charles B.; Thomas M., a Harrison County farmer; and Howe, who also farms in Harrison County.

Charles B. Hobday grew to manhood on the old farm near Claysville. He attended school there and gave his time and labor to his father until he was twenty-four. On December 23, 1897, Mr. Hobday married Meade Cummings, who was born in Harrison County March 16, 1880.

After their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Hobday remained on the Hobday homestead until 1906, and then for a period of eleven years lived at Fort Worth, Texas. Mr. Hobday returned to Harrison County in 1917, and has since been a resident in the Poindexter community north of Cynthiana, coming to his present farm in 1920, where he has 150 acres of land, well improved and thoroughly cultivated. He is interested in the success of the democratic party and is the local committeeman. He is affiliated with St. Andrews Lodge No. 18, Free and Accepted Masons, and with Cynthiana Lodge No. 127, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which he is a past grand. He and his family worship in the Methodist Episcopal Church at Cynthiana.

Mr. and Mrs. Hobday have three living children: Charles B., Jr., and Maxine, both students in high school, and Ayleene.

CAM MULLINS has no lack of public confidence and good will in his native county, as is evident by his incumbency of the office of county judge of Rockcastle County. His administration has clearly demonstrated his deep interest in and loyalty to his native county, in which he is a representative of an old and influential family of this section of Kentucky. His paternal grandfather, Spencer Mullins, was born in Virginia, where he was reared to manhood and where his marriage occurred. Spencer Mullins became a pioneer settler in Rockcastle County, Kentucky, where he established his home shortly after his marriage and where he developed and improved the excellent farm on which he and his wife passed the remainder of their lives, both having died prior to the birth of Judge Mullins of this review. Milton Martin, grandfather of Judge Mullins on the maternal side, was born in Jackson County, Kentucky, and there passed his entire life, he having been one of the representative farmers of the county for many years prior to his death. His second wife was the grandmother of Judge Mullins. By his first marriage he had three sons who attained to mature years: Henry was a prosperous farmer in Jackson County at the time of his death, as was also Azariah, and Caleb not only was associated with farm industry in that county but also became a leading member of its bar and served as county judge. The family name of the second wife of Milton Martin was Carpenter, and of the children of this union the following brief record is consistently given: Van is a retired farmer in Breathitt County; Maria and Margaret are deceased; Liberty, who died in Jackson County, was a successful farmer and he served as county judge of his native county; Mary Ann married Champ Mullins, and they became the parents of him who name initiates this review; and Lucy is deceased.

Judge Cam Mullins was born on the old homestead farm of his father, ten miles east of Mount Vernon, judicial center of Rockcastle County, and the date of his nativity was March 12, 1877. He is a son of Champ and Mary Ann (Martin) Mullins, the former of whom was born near Withers, Rockcastle County, February 6, 1823, and the latter of whom was born in Jackson County, in a home that stood on the bank of Horse Lick Creek; she was born in 1847, and she now resides on the old Mullins homestead near Withers, Rockcastle County, one of the venerable and revered women of the county. Champ Mullins passed his entire life on the old homestead farm which was the place of his birth and a portion of which he received as a heritage from his father. He added materially to his inherited land and long continued to be extensively engaged in farm enterprise as one of the substantial and highly respected citizens of his native county, his death having occurred on his farm, January 6, 1898. He was a staunch republican and was an earnest member of the Baptist Church, as is also his widow. The eldest of their children is Lucy, wife of Charles A. Mullins, a prosperous farmer near Withers; Emily, who resides near Withers, is the widow of J. E. Mullins, who was a farmer in that locality and who was serving as a deputy United States marshal at the time when he met a tragic death while discharging his official duties, he having been killed while making a raid against moonshiners near Stearns, McCreary County; Martha, who resides near Gauley in the eastern part of Rockcastle County, is the widow of Frank Mullins, who was a farmer and saw-mill owner in that part of the county; Alice is the wife of W. M. Burnett, a farmer near Gauley; Spencer is a prosperous agriculturist in that same locality; Judge Mullins of this review was the next in order of birth; Walter owns and operates the old homestead farm; Fannie is the wife of Benjamin Metcalf, who is a railroad employe, and they reside at Point Extra, Harrison County.

Judge Mullins attended the public schools of his native county until he had attained to the age of sixteen years, and in the meanwhile he gained a fully share of experience in connection with the productive activities of the home farm, with the work of which he continued his association until he was twenty years of age. He then became a special agent in the service of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and in this capacity he served eight years, with headquarters at Paris, Bourbon County. In the meantime he had continued to look upon his native county as his home, and in November, 1913, he was elected sheriff of Rockcastle County. He assumed the duties of this office in January, 1914, and the popular estimate placed upon his four years' administration was significantly shown in November, 1917, when he was elected to the still more responsible office of county judge. In this judicial position he has been giving vigorous and effective service since January, 1918, and his administration has fully justified his selection for the important post. The judge is a staunch republican and has done excellent work in furthering its cause in Rockcastle County. He and his wife are active members of the Missionary Baptist Church in their home city of Mount Vernon, and his fraternal affiliations are as here designated: Ashland Lodge No. 640, Free and Accepted Masons; Mount Vernon Chapter No. 140, Royal Arch Masons; Mount Vernon Lodge No. 320, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and Livingston Council No. 167, Junior Order of United American Mechanics. Judge Mullins owns a well improved farm lying adjacent to the corporate limits of Mount Vernon on the southeast, and on this place he and his family reside, the house and other buildings on the farm being of modern type. During the climacteric period of the World war Judge Mullins spared himself neither time nor effort in furthering the various war activities in his home county, and he was a liberal subscriber to the various governmental bond loans.

September 3, 1896, recorded the marriage of Judge Mullins to Miss Biddie E. Philbeck, who likewise was born and reared in Rockcastle County, her father having been a prosperous farmer near Withers, in which locality she was reared. She is a daughter of Tansy and Margaret Philbeck, both of whom are deceased. In conclusion is given brief record concerning the children of Judge and Mrs. Mullins: Letha is the wife of W. H. Skidmore, a farmer and school teacher residing near Mount Vernon and a veteran of the nation's military service in the World war, he having been ready for overseas duty at the time when the armistice brought the conflict to a close; Everett is yard clerk in the office of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad at Covington, Kentucky; Bentley remains at the parental home and is employed in connection with the construction and maintenance of state roads; Mary Annie died at the age of two years and three months; Robert Powers is, in 1921, a student in the fifth grade of the Mount Vernon schools, where his younger sister, Augusta Walker, is in the second grade; and Burgess Hughes, the youngest of the children, still maintains much of childish sovereignty in the parental home circle.

FRANK SMITH CLARK, M. D. The conscientious physician is easily the most valuable asset a community possesses, and upon him devolves not only the task of curing the sick and alleviating the distress of the afflicted, but also the prevention of epidemics and the inauguration and maintenance of proper sanitary regulations for the preservation of the health of the people. To the infinite credit of the profession be it said that the majority belonging to it are men of the highest character, actuated by motives that are above criticism, and among those well-known throughout Daviess County and who measure up to the noblest standards of their calling is Dr. Frank Smith Clark of Rome.

Doctor Clark was born near Bardstown, Nelson County, Kentucky, October 23, 1868, a son of Stephen W. and Eliza (Smith) Clark. Stephen W. Clark was born in Nelson County, Kentucky, a son of Edwin Clement Clark, grandson of Richard Clark, and great-grandson of Clement Clark, who was the great-great-grandfather of Doctor Clark. Clement Clark settled in what is now Nelson County, Kentucky, but at that very early day it was still included in the vast expanse known as Virginia. The mother of Doctor Clark was also born in Nelson County, and she was a daughter of Frank Smith, a pioneer wagonmaker of Bardstown and a son of Sidney Smith.

Doctor Clark was one of nine children born to his parents, all of whom were reared in the faith of the Catholic Church. In politics his father was a democrat. During the war between the North and South he served on the staff of Gen. John Morgan, and after the close of the war devoted himself to agricultural activities with gratifying results. He died in 1915, aged seventy-four years, and his first wife passed away when she was thirty-six years old. For his second wife the father married Alice O'Bryan, of Louisville, Kentucky, but they had no children.

Doctor Clark attended Saint Joseph's College, and when he had completed his studies in that institution he taught school for a year, when he began the study of medicine under the preceptorship of his uncle, Dr. Alfred Smith, of Bardstown. On March 14, 1892, he was graduated in medicine from the University of Louisville. In June, 1893, he took a post-graduate course in the New York Infant Asylum, and received a like diploma in 1894 from the New York Polyclinic. During 1893-4-5 he did hospital work in New York City, and then, in the latter part of 1895, located at Louisville, Kentucky, and was there engaged in an active practice. Leaving Louisville, Doctor Clark went to Cloverport, Kentucky, and remained there for four years. In 1918 he came to Rome and here he has built up a remunerative practice and has representation in professional organizations for he is a member of the Daviess County Medical Society, the Kentucky State Medical Society and the American Medical Association.

In 1899 Doctor Clark married Miss Frances Steim of Louisville, Kentucky, and they have had nine children born to them eight of whom survive. Doctor Clark is a Catholic and he maintains membership in the Knights of Columbus.

JOHN A. RENAKER is one of the prosperous farmers of Harrison County and a man who has found in agricultural pursuits the line of work that is both congenial and profitable. His fine farm is located four miles northwest of Cynthia, on the Trickham Pike, and it is kept in a condition that reflects credit on him and the community. Mr. Renaker was born in Harrison County, February 14, 1849, a son of David L. and Mary A. (Lafferty) Renaker, both natives of Kentucky and who were reared in Harrison County. After their marriage they settled on a farm where they lived until claimed by death. For many years they were valued members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and he donated the land and money for the church at Berry, Ky., which was named David's Chapel in his honor. After the church was erected he continued his liberal donations to it the remainder of his life. In politics he was a democrat, but was never very active in local affairs. Of his eleven children five now survive, namely: E. K., who is a resident of Berry; Ordar, who lives in California; John A., who was third in order of birth; Lizzie, who is the wife of Thomas Boyers; and Ethel, who is the wife of Tandy Osborn.

Growing up on his father's farm, John A. Renaker attended the country schools and learned to be a farmer, remaining at home until he was twenty-two years old. He then was married and began farming on his present farm, where he has 200 acres of valuable land. For thirty-eight years he was in the auctioneering business, and has had charge of some of the most important sales in the county. Mr. Renaker has many other interests, among them being considerable stock in the Berry Deposit Bank. For some years he has maintained membership with Berry Lodge No. 108, Knights of Pythias, and with the Burns Grange.

Mr. Renaker was married to Alice Terry, and they had nine children, five of whom survive, namely: W. F., who is an auctioneer and farmer; Charles A., who is a railroad engineer; Clifton, who is an auctioneer and farmer, living at Dayton, Ohio; Kate, who is the wife of Fred Cason; and Rose, the wife of Henry Russell. Mrs. Renaker died, and he was later married to Susie Baird. They have no children, but are rearing an orphan, Leo Liles, taken in his fourth year. They now spend their winters in Florida, and are people of large means. During his earlier years Mr. Renaker was one of the most active men in his district, and was known far and wide, and was and is popular with all classes. He has played quite an important part in securing a proper development of the resources of the county, and has every reason to be proud of what he has accomplished.

STANLEY BLAKE. When Stanley Blake arrived at Berry in 1910 his available assets in money amounted to 50 cents. However, he was the possessor of a trade, much self-confidence, an indomitable spirit and a consuming ambition, and likewise he was pretty well informed on the subject of dogs. Today, eleven years after his arrival, he is the owner of 288¼ acres of land and the buildings thereon, and is the proprietor of the Blue Grass Farm Kennels, representing a large and constantly-growing business.

Mr. Blake was born in Butler County, Ohio, October 30, 1876, a son of Harry and Kate (Darmel) Blake, both of whom are deceased. There were twelve children in the family, nine of whom are still living, and of these four were reared by Stanley, who is one of the elder members of the family. Mr. Blake was reared on the home farm and secured his early education in the rural schools, but had no inclination for the life of a farmer and accordingly set about securing an advanced education in the University of Chicago, where he spent three years. At the same time he learned the trade of barber, which was to serve him in good stead later, and worked thereat for about one year. Always fond of dogs, he had made a close study of these intelligent animals, and finally entered the kennel business at Newport, Kentucky, where he spent eleven years. For various reasons his business did not flourish as he thought it should, and he eventually sold out and accepted a position in the United States forestry service. After spending four months in the West, he decided that forestry expert work was not his forte, and he returned to Kentucky, arriving at Berry, as before noted, with just fifty cents in his pocket. Here he was fortunate in securing a position in a barber shop, and, as he expresses it, "barbered some," until he had accumulated the sum of $25, with which he again established himself in business as the proprietor of kennels. That was in 1910. On an outlay of $25 it would not be expected that very active growth could ensue, but after several years Mr. Blake found himself in a position to greatly increase his equipment and facilities. Accordingly he made the first purchase which formed the nucleus for his present big business, and each year has seen him enlarging his business and extending its scope, his holdings at this time representing an outlay of $67,000. Mr. Blake has specialized in the raising and breeding of hounds, bird dogs and airedales, and has built up a patronage that extends far beyond the limits of his immediate community, being in constant touch with dealers and fanciers in various states. Numerous animals which have come from his kennels have won awards and blue ribbons at the big dog shows, and the Blue Grass Farm animals have gained an enviable reputation.

In politics Mr. Blake is a republican, and his fraternal affiliation is with the Knights of Pythias. He is also a member of the American Society of Foreign Wars, having been a volunteer in the American army during the Spanish-American war, in which he saw active service. On May 9, 1906, Mr. Blake was united in marriage with Miss Nannie Jenkins, who was born at Parkersburg, West Virginia. Clara May, a young woman of unusual attainments and a graduate of the Newport High School, the School of Domestic Science at Philadelphia and the Miller Business College at Cincinnati is the child of his former wife, Agnes Campbell.

JAMES H. KNOX, while a native of Illinois, has spent most of his life in Kentucky and for over forty years has been a prosperous farmer in Harrison County. His farm and country home are sixteen miles north of Cynthia, near Boyd Station.

Mr. Knox was born in Vermilion County, Illinois, October 8, 1858. His parents, Isaac and Lucinda (Ingles) Knox, were natives of Kentucky, the paternal grandfather being Ezekiel Knox, an early settler in Harrison County. Isaac Knox was born near Boyd in 1826. Lucinda Ingles was born in Pendleton County in 1830. After their marriage they moved to Illinois for a time, also lived in Ohio four years, and were residents of Pendleton County until 1879, when they moved to the farm now owned by their son James H. They lived out their lives here and were highly honored and respected people, active members of the Baptist church. The father was a democrat. During his lifetime he owned a 150-acre farm. There were four children: Nannie, wife of A. D. Colvin, of Fort Worth, Texas; John W., of Millersburg, Kentucky; James H.; and T. W. Knox, with the Boyd Milling Company.

James H. Knox grew up on a farm, and after finishing a common school education took part in its duties and responsibilities. His present estate comprises 280 acres. He is also one of the directors in the Deposit Bank of Boyd. Mr. Knox votes as a democrat.

In 1889 he married Anna Childers. She is a native of Harrison County, Kentucky. They have seven children: Newton, who married Bina Perkins and is a farmer; Curtis, who married Martha Arnold and is a farmer; Katie, wife of Shirley Latimer; Archie, who married Erma Arnold and lives at Latonia, Kentucky; Myrtle, widow of Howard Elmore; Thacker and Benjamin, both at home.

JOHN LEWIS GRAHAM as superintendent of the Daviess County schools is one of the prominent school men of the state. Abundant natural qualifications have been supplemented by long experience and deep study of the problems involved in modern education and school management.

He was born on his father's farm in Daviess County, August 10, 1884, son of Henry Clay and Martha (Decker) Graham, and grandson of John T. and Martha (Tatum) Graham. This is one of the old and prominent families of Kentucky, having lived within the borders of the state practically from the wilderness period to the present. John T. Graham and his wife were born in Logan County, the former in 1805 and the latter in 1825. Of their seven children Henry Clay Graham was born in Logan County, January 4, 1843, when his illustrious namesake was at the height of his career as a statesman. In September, 1861, at the age of eighteen, he enlisted in the Ninth Kentucky Confederate Infantry. Then followed a participation in the battles and campaigns of the war which took him through the fire of battle at Shiloh, Chickamauga, Vicksburg, Baton Rouge, Murfreesboro, Atlanta, Jackson, Missionary Ridge, Kenesaw Mountain and others. Though never wounded, he was shoulder to shoulder with his comrades in all these battles and the dangers to which he was exposed are the better understood when it is stated that at the close of the war only five survivors remained of the original regiment. He was captured at Jonesboro and thereafter for six months was confined as a prisoner of war at Camp Douglas, Chicago. Henry Clay Graham in 1878 married Martha Decker, who was born in Daviess County, July 26, 1851, and is still living. Her father, William H. Decker, was born in Meade County, Kentucky, in 1826, and her mother, Mary C. (Horn) Decker, was born in Daviess County in 1833. Henry Clay Graham died in Daviess County, November 17, 1916.

A son of this old soldier, John Lewis Graham, spent his boyhood on his father's farm and made the best of his advantages in the country schools. At the age of twenty-two he was granted a teacher's certificate and for fifteen years his effort and thought have been thoroughly engaged in educational affairs. For eleven years he was a teacher in rural schools, for four years in the Masonville High School, and one year in the Seven Hills School. This varied experience gave him a thorough knowledge of the needs of the various classes of schools and the different districts in Daviess County, and this knowledge, together with his recognized ability as an educator, made him the favorite candidate for superintendent of county schools in the election of August, 1918. He began his duties in January, 1919, for a term of four years. In March, 1921, he was appointed for four more years, beginning January 1, 1922.

In order to supplement his early educational advantages Mr. Graham attended the Owensboro College, the Bowling Green Normal and the University of Indiana. He has served as president of the superintendents' department of the Kentucky Educational Association, also as president of the trustees of the association, and is a member of the National Educational Association. Mr. Graham is a member of the Baptist Church and in politics is a democrat.

In 1908 he married Miss Hallie Ford Miller. Their two children are Martha Virginia and Miller Clay Graham. Mrs. Graham was born in Daviess County, a daughter of the late David and Kate (Kelley) Miller, of Ohio County, Kentucky, and a niece of the late Reuben A. Miller of Owensboro.

CONRAD FRITZ is one of the veteran farmers of Harrison County, though when he first came here forty-five years ago he followed the cooper's trade and made barrels at Cynthiana. Years of labor and good management have brought him an ample competence, but he still lives on his farm and country home two miles west of Cynthiana.

Mr. Fritz was born near Baden-Baden, Germany, November 24, 1846, a son of Joseph and Genevieve Fritz. His father in Germany was a vineyardist and farmer. In 1852 the family came to the United States and located in Brown County, Ohio, where Joseph Fritz bought a farm and remained the rest of his life, rearing his children in the faith of the Catholic Church. He was a democrat in politics. Of eight children five are still living: Mary, deceased; Conrad; Sophia, deceased; John, in Massachusetts; Katie, deceased; Joseph, a farmer in Mason County, Kentucky; George, a farmer in Brown County, Ohio; and Emma, widow of Jacob Fryer of Brown County.

Conrad Fritz was six years of age when he came to the United States. His educational opportunities in Brown County were somewhat restricted, and his training was largely that of a farm boy with work and responsibility imposed upon his shoulders at an early age. While there he learned the cooper's trade, and after a journeyman's experience established a shop at Cynthiana in 1876. He continued the cooperage business until 1884, when he began farming as a renter. After nine years he bought a place near Robinson Station, lived on it thirteen years, and then came to his present community and now owns 386 acres, thoroughly improved and equipped for high class farming. He is now practically retired from the responsibilities of the farm and has spent seven winter seasons in Florida. He is a democrat in politics. Mr. Fritz and family are members of the Catholic Church.

On November 4, 1873, he married Elizabeth Underfanger, who was born in Germany and came to the United States when a girl with her mother. Mr. and Mrs. Fritz have eleven living children: Joseph, a farmer in Harrison County; Andrew, also a farmer in that county; Elizabeth, wife of William O. Leach, of Ohio; John, a farmer in Harrison County; Arthur, a Bourbon County farmer; Emma, wife of Homer Reeves, living in Western Missouri; Amelia, wife of Jacob Dinger, of Maysville, Kentucky; Gertrude, wife of Charles Mason, operating her father's farm, and she has one son, Charles Ray; Lewis, a farmer in Harrison County; Gussie, wife of Millard Gossett, of Bourbon County; and Minnie, wife of Patrick Ryan, of Cincinnati.

CHARLES J. LOCKHART, M. D. American families rarely present an example of four successive generations identified with one profession. The practice of medicine seems an established tradition with the Lockharts. Dr. Charles J. Lockhart, one of the prominent members of the medical profession at Owensboro, represents the third generation of the family in the profession, his father and grandfather having been able members of the calling, while his son has achieved distinction as a specialist in medicine and surgery.

Charles J. Lockhardt was born in the Village of Ensor, Daviess County, September 6, 1851, son of William and Mary Elizabeth (Sublett) Lockhart, a grandson of Richard and Isabella (Hale) Lockhart, and great-grandson of Levi and Nancy (Huff) Lockhart. Levi Lockhart was a native of Virginia, of Scotch ancestry, and served as a gallant soldier in the Revolutionary war. Following the winning of independence he came to Kentucky, and was one of the pioneers of Mercer County, where he devoted his time and energies to farming. Though well advanced in years, he volunteered at the outbreak of the second war against Great Britain in 1812, and thus twice earned the honor paid a soldier.

His son Richard Lockhart was born in Mercer County, Kentucky, and early in life took up the profession of medicine. For several years he practiced in Indiana, but then returned to Kentucky and located in Daviess County, where he was one of the honored members of the profession until his death.

Dr. William Lockhart was born while his parents were living in Indiana, on April 26, 1817, about a year after Indiana was admitted to the Union. He grew up in Daviess County, Kentucky, and practiced medicine there for upwards of half a century. He died at the age of seventy-five, and his wife passed away at the same age. Their three children were Charles J., Simon (now deceased) and Laura.

Dr. Charles J. Lockhart had barely completed a common school education when he began the study of medicine. He learned much from association and fellowship with his honored father, and it was almost an unconscious choice dictated by the example of his father and grandfather that led him into his profession. Subsequently he received the Doctor of Medicine degree from the University of Louisville, and for nearly half a century has been one of the able physicians and surgeons of Daviess County. Much of his work was done in the country, and he shared in the hardships of the older profession, when doctors rode and drove over country roads with none of the facilities that make the role of a doctor comparatively easy in modern times. He moved to the City of Owensboro in 1902 and kept his home there for eighteen years, and still maintains his office there. His home is now at Thruston, about four miles from Owensboro. With the advent of the motor car he keeps in closer touch with his practice today than he possibly could have done twenty-five or thirty years ago. Through all the years he has been an active member of the Daviess County and State Medical societies. He is a Mason and Elk. He has many of the characteristics of the old school of kindly country doctors, earnest, sympathetic, unassuming in manner, friendly and courteous. His life has been unpretentious, yet productive of inestimable services to his friends and community.

Doctor Lockhart married Miss Hannah Craig in 1881. She was born in Daviess County, daughter of Robert and Jennie (McHenry) Craig. Their oldest son is Robert Lockhart, who acquired his literary education at Center College in Danville, Kentucky, graduating with the honors of his class. He studied medicine and graduated from the University of Louisville, and has taken numerous post-graduate courses in New York and other cities. He has made his mark as a specialist in diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat, and is one of the prominent representatives of that branch of medicine and surgery in the City of Cleveland, Ohio.

CHARLES SIMEON HAYDEN, an energetic and well-known agriculturalist living near Sutherland, Daviess County, is one of the dependable gentlemen of his neighborhood, and one who stands exceedingly well with his fellow citizens. He was born in this county March 2, 1867, a son of Joseph Simeon and Mary Frances (Rapier) Heyden, both of whom were born in Nelson County, Kentucky, where they were married. There they resided until 1854, and then came to Daviess County, settling near West Louisville, and for the remainder of their lives they continued to live in this county, the father being engaged in farming. He lived to be eighty years of age, but the mother died when she was thirty-nine years old. She bore her husband ten children, but only five grew to maturity, they being as follows: Mary, Catherine, Richard Lewis, Charles Simeon and Julia B., and of these, Mary and Richard Lewis are now deceased. The children were all reared on the farm and brought up in the faith of the Catholic Church.

Charles Simeon Hayden was educated in the public schools of Daviess County, spent one term at Gethsemane College, Kentucky, and graduated from St. Mary's College in 1889. He remained on his father's farm until he was thirty-two years of age, at which time he was married, in 1899, to Miss Lucy Delphine Hayden, a native of Daviess County and a daughter of Wilfred J. and Lucy (Hayden) Hayden. While her parents were of the same family name, they were not kinfolks, her father having been born in Hardin County and her mother in Daviess County. Neither are Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Hayden relatives, although bearing the same name. Mrs. Hayden's paternal grandfather was George Hayden, who moved from Hardin County to Daviess County at an early day.

At the time of his marriage Charles S. Hayden was a poor man, but he succeeded in buying a farm of 142 acres near the village of Tuck in Daviess County, going into debt for his land and implements. He toiled diligently and managed well, paid his debts as they matured, prospered and still owns this farm, which he has tilled and otherwise improved, making it one of the most valuable farm properties of the county. Several years ago Mr. Hayden bought his present residence farm of 117 acres near Sutherland, and this, too, he has greatly improved, putting in tiling, erecting fences and commodious and sanitary barns, and through his industry and thrift has become one of the wealthy agriculturalists of Daviess County. He has never aspired to political honors, preferring to devote his time and energy to his farm interests, although during the war he took an active part in all charity work, being an energetic member of the Red Cross, and selling and buying Liberty Bonds extensively. He is a democrat in his political views, but is not a partisan. He and his wife and children are members of Saint Anthony's Roman Catholic Church, and he is a member of the Knights of Columbus, Owensboro Council No. 817. Mr. and Mrs. Hayden have had five children born to them, of whom the eldest, a son, died in infancy, the others being as follows: Wilfred Joseph, Lucy Delphine, Charles Simeon and Julia Irene. The family are numbered among the most highly respected people in this part of the county.

ALGERNON S. YEWELL, D. O. For the past seventeen years Doctor Yewell has been one of the leading representatives of osteopathy at Owensboro. In his profession he has enjoyed the fruits of his own work and the widespread recognition given the profession as a whole as one of the soundest branches of the science of healing.

Doctor Yewell represents an old and honored Daviess County family, and was born on his father's farm December 15, 1872. He is a son of Franklin and Martha (Ray) Yewell and grandson of Jeremiah and Dicey Ellinder (Wilhoit) Yewell. The Yewells came to this country at the very beginning of colonization, the tradition being that three English brothers came together. Jeremiah Yewell was born in Virginia in 1782, came to Kentucky at an early date, and was an extensive farmer and also one of the first distillery operators in Oldham County. About 1841 he moved to Daviess County, bringing his family by flatboat while his slaves drove the livestock across the country. Jeremiah Yewell acquired extensive tracts of land in the vicinity of Owensboro, his home being southwest of the city. He died there highly honored and respected in 1862. His first wife, Miss Pope, died leaving the following children: Albert G., Alan P., Sally, Minerva, Ruth Ann and Benjamin P. Dicey Ellinder Wilhoit was the mother of John, Algernon S., James M. and Franklin Yewell.

Franklin Yewell was born in Oldham County, Kentucky, in 1829, came to Daviess County at the age of twelve, and for many years operated an extensive farm and stock business southwest of Owensboro. He finally moved to Owensboro and for a number of years was engaged in the real estate and money lending business. He died at Owensboro March 19, 1897. He was a staunch Baptist and reared his family in the same faith. His first wife was Mary Ray, who died a few months after their marriage. He then married her sister, Martha Ray, who became the mother of three children, Mary E., Sally Leota and Algernon S.

Algernon S. Yewell grew up on his father's farm, also attended school in Owensboro, was a student in the Owensboro College, and prepared for his professional career in the American School of Osteopathy at Kirksville, Missouri. He graduated in 1903 Doctor of Osteopathy, and at once began practice in his home city and has had a busy program of professional activities for many years. He also has control of 400 acres of land in Daviess County and makes a specialty of raising Duroc hogs, in which much of his time is now spent. He is an extensive raiser of stock and does an extensive business in this line.

In 1899 Doctor Yewell married Bertha Chism, a native of Daviess County. They are active in the Baptist Church and Doctor Yewell is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner.

OLIVER PERRY RAYMOND is president of the Raymond Coal Company of Indiana, and as a successful general contractor his business interests and relations have made him known over Kentucky and a number of other states.

Mr. Raymond was born in Robertson County, Kentucky, February 24, 1869, a son of Marcus D. and Cynthia A. (Mockbee) Raymond, his father a native of Kentucky and his mother of Missouri. After their marriage they settled on a farm in Robertson County, and Marcus Raymond devoted the rest of his life to agricultural pursuits. After his death his widow removed to Cynthia, where she spent her last days. She was a member of the Christian Church, and he followed the fortunes of the republican party. In the family were seven children: J. J., deceased; Oliver P.; Ora J., wife of Henry Berton; M. D., deceased; Susie, wife of J. D. Clark; Belle, wife of Albert Tolle; and Thomas A. of Cynthia.

Oliver Perry Raymond grew up on the home farm in Robinson County, and acquired a public school education there. At the age of twenty, on September 11, 1889, he married Louisa J. Mockbee, also a native of Robinson County, where she was born March 5, 1868. Of the four children born to Mr. and Mrs. Raymond the survivors are Willard H. and Wilber M., both at Cynthia.

In the contracting business Mr. Raymond has been associated with his brother Thomas A. Raymond, and their business has been conducted for thirty years. They have been builders of roads, streets and many large building contracts, and Mr. Raymond has his business headquarters at Cynthia, and he owns the property on which the plant of the Raymond Coal Company is located, and also has several dwelling houses in the city. He is a republican in politics, and is affiliated with St. Andrew's Lodge No. 18, Free and Accepted Masons, is a Royal Arch and Knight Templar Mason, and is a member of the Scottish Rite Consistory at South McAlester, Oklahoma. He is also affiliated with the Knights of Pythias. Mr. and Mrs. Raymond are members of the Christian Church.

ANDREW STEELE. For some four or five consecutive generations there has been an Andrew Steele in Fayette County, and the name has appeared in the annals of pioneer times in Kentucky, while today the representative is one of the solid agriculturists and citizens of that vicinity.

In archives at the City of Washington are two letters written by Andrew Steele in 1757 addressed to Governor Harrison of Virginia. These letters make reference to the battle of Blue Lick, stating that twenty-one of the Kentucky pioneers were killed and that help must come or all good citizens would leave the country. The original Steele settled at Steele's Run at a big spring, property now owned by C. C. Patrick, though some of the original homestead comprises the farm of Andrew Steele, a great-grandson of the pioneer. Several Andrew Steeles were laid to rest in the burying ground in the old homestead. The old house is still standing, the main part being over a hundred years of age. John Andrew Steele was born in Fayette County and died when about eighty years of age. He married Jane Patterson, of Dayton, Ohio, and after their marriage they made their bridal tour on horseback to Kentucky. Her father was Col. Robert Patterson, whose name figures conspicuously in the early and later history of Dayton, Ohio, and also of early Kentucky. He is credited with having erected the first cabin at Lexington, and he helped lay out the town of Lexington and of Cincinnati. The head of the National Cash Register Company of Dayton is a descendant of Col. Robert Patterson, and he has compiled and published much of the history of the Pattersons both in Kentucky and in other states.

The third Andrew Steele was born on the old Steele farm and spent his life there, dying at the age of sixty-nine. He married Sally Gray, who had grown up on an adjoining farm, a daughter of William and Maria (Lamb) Gray. Andrew Steele third was chairman of the Board of Transylvania College, and was himself educated in Lexington, at Transylvania. He was one of the original trustees or directors of the Kentucky Orphan School at Midway and was an elder in the New Union Christian Church from its organization. This church is two miles from the Steele home, and he was succeeded by his son Patterson as a trustee of the Orphan School, and when the latter died his son Arthur took his place on the board. Andrew Steele was a very staunch prohibitionist. He was a Union man during the Civil war, and joined a company of Home Guards at the time of Bragg's invasion of Kentucky. He became a noted stockman, raised great numbers of mules and also traded in mules, contributing a large proportion of the fine animals to the Cincinnati market. He was also a breeder of trotting horses, and he raced the famous Blackwood, which established the world's record of 2:31 as a three-year-old, lowering the previous record, which had stood at 2:52. Blackwood he sold to E. R. Durkee at the highest price ever recorded up to that time for a racing animal.

Andrew Steele, third, and wife had eight children. Jennie, the oldest, was married to Edward Wood, formerly lived in Lexington and is now a resident of Owensboro. Maria is the wife of Elder W. R. Moore, a retired minister in Lexington. William, the oldest son, was born August 25, 1852, and is now one of the prosperous farmers living in the Versailles community of Woodford County. He married Margaret Patrick, and their lives ran together for forty-two years, until her death on February 20, 1921. William Steele has five children: Miss Frances; Sally, wife of William Dunlap, of Woodford County; John and William, twins, both farmers in Woodford County; and Charles, who is also identified with agriculture in Woodford County. John Steele, the next of the family, was killed by a Chesapeake & Ohio train at Tebbs Station in February, 1896, when forty-four years of age. He married Dinsmore Patrick. Richard Steele was killed at the same time as his brother at this railroad station, and was a farmer in Clark County, his wife being Susie Jones. The next in the family was Patterson Steele, previously referred to, a farmer of Fayette County, who died at the age of forty-two. He married Fanny Dowden, now deceased. Elizabeth Steele is the wife of George W. Mitchell, a farmer of Woodford County now retired at Lexington.

Andrew Steele fourth, youngest of this family, was born October 16, 1866, and has had the pleasure and responsibility of continuing the family associations with the old homestead in Fayette County. He has increased the acreage of farm during his incumbency and is one of the very able men in that agricultural community. He maintains an independent attitude in politics, somewhat characteristic of the Steele family in general, and he and his family are members of the New Union Christian Church. He married Miss Julia Bryan Piatt, daughter of Asael D. and Bettie (Payne) Piatt, a well known name in Central Kentucky that appears elsewhere in this publication. Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Steele have three children: Piatt A., Elizabeth Gray and Drewsilla.

JAMES MALLORY VAUGHAN occupies a prominent place in the esteem of the people of Northwestern Kentucky and is universally respected, for as a business man fair dealing has been his watchword. He is a worthy representative of one of Kentucky's prominent old families, members of which have figured largely in commercial affairs for several generations, ever lending their share of aid in furthering all movements having as their object the general welfare of the people in a material, civic and moral way. They have not been neglectful of their duties in any of the avenues of life, and they have long ranked among our best citizens, so that there is peculiar satisfaction in offering their biographies in a work of this nature.

The name Vaughan is one of the best and most widely known in the tobacco world in this country, as well as England. The tobacco firm of G. Vaughan & Company was established at Louisville, Kentucky, in 1866, and the Vaughans have continuously been engaged in that line of business since that time. The senior member of the firm was Grandison Vaughan, with whom were associated his three sons, one of whom was Joshua P., father of the immediate subject of this sketch. G. Vaughan & Company continued in business in Louisville for thirty years, having tobacco factories at Louisville and four other cities in Kentucky, including Owensboro. They bought tobacco, and at these factories it was prepared for manufacture, being shipped to many factories in this country and England. They had a large export trade and continued in business up to 1896, when the partnership was dissolved, and at that time James Mallory Vaughan selected and became the owner of the Owensboro factory, which he continued to operate, establishing his home in this city. Thus for over a half century the Vaughans have been closely and actively identified with the tobacco business in Kentucky. When Mr. Vaughan assumed the ownership of the Owensboro plant the style of the firm became J. M. Vaughan & Company, and under that name the business of buying and preparing tobacco for manufacture was conducted until 1913, when it was succeeded by the Ross & Vaughan Tobacco Company, Incorporated, which in 1917 was succeeded by the present incorporated firm, known as the Kentucky and Virginia Leaf Tobacco Company, of which Mr. Vaughan is president.

James Mallory Vaughan is a native son of Kentucky, having been born in Ballard County on April 11, 1862, the son of Joshua P. and Sarah Victoria (Mallory) Vaughan. When he was four years of age his parents removed to Anchorage, a suburb of Louisville, where he was reared. His parents were born and reared near Clarksville, Tennessee. His father was a son of Grandison Vaughan, a native of Virginia and a member of one of the first families of that state, of English origin. His mother was a daughter of Dr. James Mallory, who successfully practiced his profession until sixty-five years of age and then retired, living on his large plantation until he was ninety-six years old. Grandison Vaughan was a planter in Virginia, but at the beginning of the Civil war sold his plantation there and with his many slaves removed to Ballard County, Kentucky, where he bought a large tract of unclaimed land. His son Joshua P. accompanied him, and they remained there until 1866, when they removed to Louisville and engaged in the tobacco business, as related above. Mrs. Joshua P. Vaughan died at the age of forty-three years, leaving five children, of whom James Mallory was the first born. The father subsequently was married to Lula Ferguson, a daughter of John Ferguson, of Tennessee, who was a member of Congress and otherwise prominent in his day. To this marriage two children were born. Joshua P. Vaughan lived to the age of seventy-six years.

James Mallory Vaughan attended the public schools of Louisville, the military school at Anchorage and the old Rugby school at Louisville, graduating from the last-named. His career in the tobacco business began in 1884, when he was twenty-two years old, and he has always been closely identified with that line of business, in which his success has been very gratifying. He is a man of marked business capacity and executive power, and has directed his operations with sagacity and sound judgment.

In July, 1892, Mr. Vaughan was married to Sue Virginia Barclay, of Louisville, and to them was born a daughter, Helen Walton, who died at the age of thirteen years. Mrs. Vaughan died in 1914. The wife and daughter were earnest members of the First Christian Church of Owensboro, in which Mr. Vaughan also holds membership. He has been a busy man and long ago attained a place of high degree and compelling importance in his community, in which he has been a constant quality—one of the kind that can be relied upon, a good workman in the world's affairs. Though a man of unpretentious demeanor, he possesses to a marked degree those qualities which beget friendships, and he is deservedly popular among his host of acquaintances.

LEWIS PARRAUT. Some of the most substantial residents of Harrison County are those who are devoting themselves to the cultivation of the soil, and one of them deserving of special mention is Lewis Parraut, whose valuable farming property is located on the White Oak Turnpike, two miles west of Cynthia. He was born in Alsace-Lorraine, France, in September, 1852, a son of Joe F. and Lena Parraut, both of whom were born, married and spent their lives in Alsace-Lorraine.

When he was seventeen Lewis Parraut left his native land and worked for a farmer in Mason County, but after his marriage he bought a farm in that county, on which he lived until he moved in 1893 to this county. He bought 250 acres of land, and has made a fine property of it.

Lewis Parraut was married to Minnie Wolf, who was born in Bavaria, Germany, where she lived until she was fourteen. At that age she was brought to the United States by her parents, who settled in Mason County. Mr. and Mrs. Parraut have two children: Barbara, who is the wife of Daniel Williams, of Cynthiana; and John L., who married Lillie Chinn, and lives on his father's farm. The family are Catholics and active in St. Edward's Church. In politics Mr. Parraut is a democrat. He is one of the best examples of what can be accomplished through industry and thrift that the county affords. While he has been acquiring a prosperity to which he is entitled, he has also won and holds the confidence of all who know him.

JAY QUINCY WARD. Though his father was one of Kentucky's distinguished lawyers, Jay Quincy Ward early made a definite choice of agriculture as his chosen vocation, and his time and energies have been successfully bestowed for a number of years on his attractive rural estate south of Cynthiana. He has responded to his obligations as a citizen and from July, 1912, to July, 1920, was executive agent for the Kentucky Game and Fish Commission.

His father was Judge John Quincy Ward, whose family was established in Harrison County while Kentucky was still part of Virginia. The Wards are of Scotch-Irish ancestry and located in Virginia in 1750. Joseph Ward was a prominent Virginian, a member of the House of Burgesses and for several terms judge of the Court of Quarter Sessions. He married Margaret Coalter, of Virginia, and about 1785 removed to Harrison County, Kentucky. The father of Judge Ward was Cary Aldry Ward, a native of Harrison County. He was a printer by trade and at one time edited a paper at Oxford, Kentucky. In 1832 he moved to Scott County, where he was a farmer and merchant for many years. His wife was Elizabeth Jane Risk, daughter of John and Ann (Daugherty) Risk, of pioneer families of Woodford County.

John Quincy Ward was born in Scott County, August 29, 1838. He attended the public schools and graduated in 1858 with the A. B. degree from Georgetown College, studied law at Georgetown and was admitted to the bar in August, 1860. He immediately began practice at Cynthiana and rapidly won his way to front rank in the Kentucky bar. His profession gratified the full scope of his ambitions and he never resorted to politics as an aid. In 1862 he was elected county attorney, and so served four years. He was also school commissioner, and in 1873 was a representative in the Legislature. In 1884 he was elected to the Superior Court to fill the unexpired term of Judge Reed, in 1886 being elected for a full term of four years. After devoting six years to the duties and responsibilities of the court he declined further honors and then resumed his practice at Paris, where he then lived, but also maintained an office at Cynthiana. Judge Ward died at Paris, June 26, 1899. He was the first layman to be chosen moderator of the Presbyterian Synod of Kentucky, being so chosen by acclamation in 1893. He was a Mason and a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and for a number of years was curator of the Central University at Richmond. In all the relations of a busy life he remained true to his ideals and his influence for good was incalculable.

Judge Ward married, November 30, 1865, Miss Mary Eliza Miller. She was born in Harrison County, January 8, 1843, and died September 5, 1908. Her parents were James and Ann F. (Boyd) Miller. Judge and Mrs. Ward had three children: J. Miller Ward; Anna C., who died May 9, 1900, the wife of E. F. Clay, Jr., of Paris; and Jay Quincy.

Jay Quincy Ward was born near Cynthiana, April 29, 1873, and spent his early life at the old home two miles east of Cynthiana. He was educated in the public schools, in the Frank Smith Academy, Transylvania College at Lexington, and in 1894 received the Bachelor of Science Degree from Central University at Richmond.

On December 7, 1899, Mr. Ward married Elizabeth W. Spears, who was born in Bourbon County and died June 6, 1900. On April 2, 1921, Mr. Ward married Ellie Barr Crofford, of Gallatine, Tennessee. She is a graduate of the Bellwood Seminary at Anchorage, Kentucky, and of the Mary Baldwin Seminary of Virginia. Mr. and Mrs. Ward are active members of the Presbyterian Church. He is a past exalted ruler of Paris Lodge No. 373 of the Elks. He is a member of the Coeur de Leon Commandery of the Knights Templar and Oleika Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Lexington. Mr. Ward's farm comprises 497 acres, located two and a half miles south of Cynthiana.

JAMES LEE GRAY. For more than a century the Gray family has borne a conspicuous part in the agricultural and business affairs of Harrison County. James Lee Gray has for many years been one of the leading stockmen of the county, and his farm is a portion of the old Gray homestead.

His grandfather, Francis Gray, was a native of Virginia and came to Harrison County when most of the land was still in the wilderness. He married Lydia Givins, a native of Harrison County. Their son, James Harvey Gray, was born at the old homestead in December, 1828, and came to manhood with a common school education. After his marriage he began farming, and at one time operated a distillery on his farm. His leading interest, however, was the breeding of pure bred Shorthorn cattle and Cotswold sheep. His stock was frequently exhibited at fairs and exhibitions, and carried off many cups and other prizes. At the time of his death, which occurred February 14, 1878, he owned 330 acres. James H. Gray married Mary Hester Brown, who was born in Harrison County August 22, 1836, daughter of Francis and Polly (Baxter) Brown, who also came from Virginia. James H. Gray and wife had eight children, and all of them at one time or another lived in Texas, where several of them are still active in professional and business life.

James Lee Gray was born on the old homestead seven miles west of Cynthiana, on Mount Vernon Pike, June 12, 1865. As a youth there he acquired a country school education. He was only thirteen when his father died, and after assisting in the labors of the home farm for several years he went to Texas in 1885 and spent ten years ranching in the western part of that state. In 1895 he returned to Kentucky, and for a quarter of a century his time and energies have been devoted to the portion of the old homestead where he owns 170 acres. He has made this a general stock and grain farm, also growing some tobacco. Besides his farm interests Mr. Gray is a director of the Farmers National Bank at Cynthiana.

At Indianapolis February 4, 1903, he married Miss Myrtle Old, a native of Logansport, Indiana. The family residence for many years was at Indianapolis. Her father was William A. Old, for many years a locomotive engineer, but now retired and living at Cynthiana. Mrs. Gray's mother, Susan Asbury, was born in Harrison County, Kentucky, a daughter of Virtner S. and Sallie (Ingles) Asbury, and was of pioneer Kentucky ancestry, one branch of her family connecting with the family of Daniel Boone.

Mr. and Mrs. Gray have one daughter, Mary M., a high school student. Mr. and Mrs. Gray are members of the Mount Pleasant Presbyterian Church, of which he is one of its elders. In politics he is a democrat.

ARETAEUS KIRK, M. D. For nearly thirty years Doctor Kirk has been one of the busy country doctors in Daviess County, with a practice radiating many miles around his home at Habit. He graduated in medicine about the time he reached his majority, and has been a constant student of the profession in all the years since.

The Kirks are an old and prominent family of Western Kentucky. His great-grandfather, James Kirk, was a Virginian, served as a soldier in the War of 1812, and soon after the close of that struggle located in Daviess County, where he died soon afterward, as a result of broken health incurred in the army. His children were John L., William, Burr, James, Mary Jane and Ann. John Livingston Kirk, grandfather of Doctor Kirk, was a native of Virginia and married Susan Cottrell, also a native of that state. Her father, Reuben Cottrell, was a soldier in the War of 1812.

Thomas Powell Kirk, father of Doctor Kirk, was born in Daviess County August 16, 1839, and has passed his eighty-first birthday, with a long and active career to his credit as an agriculturist, a citizen of influence in his locality, and altogether with an exemplary record in all life's relations. He is one of the few surviving Confederate soldiers, having fought for three years and ten months. He served in Company A, First Kentucky Cavalry of Regulars. He finally stacked his arms at Washington, Georgia, and soon after the war, in 1866, married Miss Phimie Taylor. She lived less than two years after their marriage. In 1868 Thomas P. Kirk married Susan Florence Barnhill. They lived happily together for just half a century, her death occurring in 1918. She was a very devout member of the Baptist Church, and Thomas P. Kirk is of the same religious faith. Six children were born to them, and the five to reach mature years are: Aretaeus, Robert, John, William Otis and Estell.

Aretaeus Kirk was born on his father's farm near Philpot in Daviess County January 4, 1872, grew up on the farm, shared in its duties, attended the local schools, and advanced his education in Bethel College at Russellville and in the State Normal School at Bowling Green. For one year he was a teacher and on June 21, 1892, graduated from Hospital College, the medical department of Central University at Louisville. He at once began practice in his old home locality at Philpot, remained there eight years, and then moved two miles away to the Village of Habit, from which his services extend over a wide stretch of country. He does a general practice and ranks among the ablest members of the profession in the country. He is a member of the County and State Medical societies, and for the past sixteen years has performed the duties of county physician.

Doctor Kirk is a democrat, a Master Mason and a Baptist. He married Miss Ada A. Milton, of Daviess County. They have one son, James Thomas Kirk, who is a farmer at Habit and is married.

ROBERT MURRAY HAGAN. Since 1855 one of the best known farms in Daviess County has been the property owned and operated by members of the Hagan family, whose name it bears. This property, which overlooks the Green River, has been devoted to various farming enterprises, but of more recent years has come into special distinction as being the home of the leading hog breeders and raisers of Western Kentucky, Sylvester Hagan and his son Robert Murray Hagan, who carry on extensive operations in this direction under the firm style of S. Hagan & Son.

The Hagan family, as its name would indicate, originated in Ireland, but has been in Kentucky for at least four generations. Sylvester Hagan, the elder, grandfather of the present Sylvester, was a native of Nelson County, where was born his son, Robert Hagan. Robert Hagan left his native county in 1855 and settled on the present Hagan farm on the Green River, Daviess County, and there passed the remainder of his life, dying at the early age of thirty-two years. Robert Hagan married Helen Carrico, who was born in Daviess County, a daughter of Thomas I. Carrico, a native of Maryland. Following the death of her husband Mrs. Hagan and her four children went to the home of her father, with whom they lived five years, then returning to the Green River farm, where Mrs. Hagan still lives, at the advanced age of eighty-seven years.

Sylvester Hagan, the younger, was born in Daviess County, Kentucky, March 10, 1852, a son of Robert and Helen (Carrico) Hagan. He was ten years of age when his father died, and for the next five years resided at the home of his maternal grandfather, following which he and his mother, with the other children, returned to the farm on Green River. Sylvester Hagan was then a lad of fifteen years, with a country school education. He at once assumed the management of the home farm, accepting its responsibilities with willingness and discharging them with remarkable ability for one so young, and, toiling early and late, was able to make a success of the farm and to develop its possibilities. In 1878 he felt that an opportunity for his advancement presented itself in a mercantile venture at Owensboro, and he accordingly embarked in the grocery business there. However, after five years in this line he decided that farming was his forte, and disposing of his business holdings he returned to Green River, where he has since applied himself to the pursuits of the soil. Through inheritance, through purchase and through his own unflagging industry Mr. Hagan has become the possessor of the old home place and adjoining property, his estate now aggregating 400 acres of some of the most valuable farming land to be found in the county. For many years he has devoted a large part of his attention to raising hogs on an extensive scale, and during the last several years has been in partnership in this business with his son Robert Murray Hagan, as S. Hagan & Son, this firm now being known as the leading raisers and breeders of pure-bred hogs in Western Kentucky.

In 1885 Sylvester Hagan was united in marriage with Miss Laura Smith, daughter of Athel Anderson Smith, who came to Daviess County from Ohio County, Kentucky. To this union there have been born the following children: Robert Murray; Mary, who is the wife of E. R. O'Brien; and Ruth, Miles S., Charles P. and Pauline, who reside with their parents. The parents and their children are faithful members of the Catholic Church, which has been the family's religious faith for many generations. Mr. Hagan is a member of the Knights of Columbus and is a democrat in politics. The Hagan home, overlooking Green River, is one of the finest farm residences in Daviess County, a concrete and stone structure erected in 1907.

Robert Murray Hagan was born on the present Hagan farm in Daviess County December 4, 1888. He attended the public schools and St. Mary's College, and then took courses in agriculture at the University of Kentucky and the University of Illinois. With this splendidly practical preparation he returned to the home place as his father's assistant, and several years ago was admitted to partnership in the firm of S. Hagan & Son. He is known as one of the progressive and enterprising young agriculturists of Daviess County and as being thoroughly familiar with all branches of agriculture, particularly that which pertains to the breeding and raising of fine and pure-bred swine. Mr. Hagan is a member of the Knights of Columbus and gives his political allegiance to the democratic party.

MAJ. CHARLES HARWOOD MOORMAN. While he was a major in the Judge Advocate General's Department of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, Mr. Moorman's years of mature activity have been identified with the legal profession in Kentucky, and for a number of years past with the bar of Louisville.

He was born at Big Springs in Meade County, Kentucky, April 24, 1876, a son of William James and Margaret (Bush) Moorman. His father was born in Breckinridge County in 1829 and died in 1898, while his mother was born in Alabama in 1831 and died in 1883. They were the parents of three children: Willibie, wife of William A. Hynes; James, deceased; and Charles H. William J. Moorman was a merchant and farmer at Big Springs, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and was a loyal democrat until the campaign of 1896, when so many democrats turned from the main faction of their party.

Charles H. Moorman attended public and private schools near his father's home, and later finished his literary training in the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio. He studied law with W. H. Marriott, a distinguished attorney at Elizabethtown, Kentucky, and was admitted to the bar in 1899. After that he practiced law with Mr. Marriott until the latter's death, and continued his professional career at Elizabethtown until 1906, when he removed to Louisville, and until 1916 was assistant district attorney for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad.

Soon after the war broke out in 1917 Mr. Moorman went to France as a volunteer with the American Red Cross. In May, 1918, he was commissioned a captain in the Judge Advocate General's Department and in September of the same year was promoted to major in the same department. He continued in this service in France until May, 1919, and in June of that year resumed his law practice at Louisville as a member of the firm of Moorman & Woodard.

Mr. Moorman is a Royal Arch Mason, and belongs to the Pendennis Club, the Louisville Country Club, Chess and Whist Club, and the American Legion. He is a member of the Episcopal Church and is a republican in politics.

On November 28, 1914, he married Lily B. Belknap, daughter of Col. Morris Belknap and granddaughter of that distinguished Kentuckian Gen. S. B. Buckner.

HON. JOHNSON N. CAMDEN, a former United States senator from Kentucky, and present national committeeman from this state in the democratic party, has for thirty years been prominent among Kentucky horsemen and stock farmers, and is proprietor of the noted Spring Hill Farm near Versailles.

Mr. Camden was born in Parkersburg, West Virginia, January 5, 1865, a son of Johnson N. and Anne (Thompson) Camden. His father was a man of eminence in public affairs and at one time sat in the United States Senate. The son was educated in the Virginia Military Institute at Lexington, studied law in the Columbia University School of Law and the Summer Law School of the University of Virginia, but his legal education has been primarily useful to him in handling his extensive business interests.

On October 16, 1888, Mr. Camden married Susanna Preston Hart, of Versailles, Kentucky. The Spring Hill Farm near Versailles is the old estate of the Hart family, and one of the most beautiful places in that section of Kentucky.

Mr. Camden in 1890 turned his attention to the management of the Spring Hill Farm, and has ever since been extensively engaged in agriculture and as a breeder of fine cattle and horses. He is president of the Kentucky Jockey Club and chairman of the State Racing Commission. His thoroughbreds have won many honors in the Grand Circuit. Those who visit Spring Hill Farm are frequently presented with the pleasing picture of a group of beautiful thoroughbreds in the woodland pastures. Spring Hill Farm contains 2,000 acres, and in many ways is a model and example of the highest class methods of diversified agriculture. It is the home of a very notable herd of Herefords, many of which have been prize winners in exhibitions. The honors of the extensive herd are shared by Woodford VI, who in 1917 was winner of the junior championship among the Herefords at the International Livestock Show, and by Beau Woodford Junior, champions at the International at Chicago, and also by the grand champion of 1920, Principis Domino, who is the first grand champion bull ever brought into Kentucky of this breed. Mr. Camden is a director of the National Hereford Association. His flock of Hampshire sheep won every first prize in all classes in the Ohio State and Indiana State fairs in 1920.

For years Mr. Camden has been deeply interested in the advancement of agricultural conditions. In 1913 he gave a great barbecue on his farm, attended by 20,000 people. It was a great event in Kentucky agriculture, and many speakers of national prominence were on hand to present a broad appeal to the farmer. Mr. Camden was appointed chairman by Governor Mc-Creary of a committee to prepare a statement relative to the agricultural needs of Kentucky as material to be used by The Permanent American Commission on Agricultural Finances, Production, Distribution and Rural Life, in compiling its report to Congress. The report drawn up by Mr. Camden's committee was published as Circular No. 16 of the Kentucky Agricultural Experiment Station.

Mr. Camden for some years past has been actively identified with the opening and development of coal mines in Eastern Kentucky. In 1912 he served as state chairman of the Wilson campaign, and on June 16, 1914, was appointed by Governor James B. McCreary as United States senator from Kentucky to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator William O. Bradley. In the following November he was elected for the remainder of the unexpired term, ending March 4, 1917. Mr. Camden is a member of the Episcopal Church, is a member of the Lexington and Country clubs of Lexington, the Metropolitan and University clubs of Washington, and the Pendennis Club at Louisville. Mr. and Mrs. Camden have two children, Tevis and Anne.

CHARLES ROBERT HEMPHILL, D. D., LL. D., who has been a resident of Louisville since 1885, is dean and professor of New Testament Exegesis and Homiletics of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary in Kentucky, and has been identified with that institution nearly thirty years.

He was born at Chester, South Carolina, April 18, 1852, a son of James and Rachel E. (Brawley) Hemphill, and represents one of the most distinguished names not only in South Carolina but in other states of the South. The Hemphill family and the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church were established about the same time in South Carolina.

Rev. John Hemphill, D. D., a native of County Derry, Ireland, of Ulster-Scotch parentage and a minister of the Associate Reformed denomination, on coming to America in 1781 lived for a time in Pennsylvania, and thence rode horseback to Chester County, South Carolina. After graduating at Dickinson College, Pennsylvania, he became pastor of Hopewell Church, Chester District, South Carolina, one of the oldest Associate Reformed Presbyterian Churches of the South. One of his sons, John Hemphill, became one of the historic characters of Texas, serving as chief justice of the Supreme Court of the republic and state, a United States senator, and dying in 1862 while a member of the Confederate Congress. Another son of this pioneer minister was James Hemphill, father of Doctor Hemphill of Louisville. James Hemphill was born near Hopewell Church in Chester County in 1813 and spent all his life in South Carolina, where he died in 1902. He graduated in 1833 from Jefferson College in Pennsylvania, and began the practice of law at Chester. He was strongly opposed to the secession movement, but with the outbreak of the war remained with the state and was a chosen leader in civil affairs in his home town and section during the period of the war and reconstruction. He is remembered as a man of great piety and learning, of lovable character, possessing a keen sense of humor and gift of story telling and historic reminiscence. One of his sons was the late John James Hemphill, who had a brilliant career as a lawyer and congressman, representing South Carolina in Congress from 1880 until 1890, and thereafter practicing law in the City of Washington. A cousin of Doctor Hemphill is Maj. James Calvin Hemphill, for twenty-five years editor of the Charleston News and Courier and later of the Richmond Times-Dispatch.

Charles Robert Hemphill graduated from the University of South Carolina in 1869, from the University of Virginia in 1871, and from the Presbyterian Theological Seminary at Columbia in his native state in 1874. He

He is also a Doctor of Divinity from Central University, Kentucky, and received the LL.D. degree from Hanover College, Indiana, in 1895 and from Westminster College, Missouri, in 1898.

From 1874 to 1878 Doctor Hemphill was instructor of Hebrew at Columbia Theological Seminary, was professor of Greek and Latin at the Southwestern Presbyterian University during 1879-82, and professor of Biblical Literature at Columbia Seminary in 1882-85. He came to Louisville in 1885 to assume the duties of pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, and the duties of that pastorate he performed until 1899.

In 1893 he also accepted the chair of New Testament Exegesis in the Louisville, now the Kentucky Presbyterian Theological Seminary, and in 1910 was elected as the first president of the institution, which office he held until 1920. In the educational and administrative affairs of his church Doctor Hemphill has performed many notable services, making him widely known all over the South and the Middle West. In 1895 he was moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States and in 1896 a member of the Pan-Presbyterian Council at Glasgow. From 1902 to 1914 he was a member of the International Sunday School Lesson Committee. He is author of the essay on Validity and Bearing of the Testimony of Christ and His Apostles to the Mosaic Authorship of the Pentateuch in the work "Moses and his Recent Critics," 1899. For many years he has been a member of the Louisville Public Library Board, belongs to the Conversation Club of Louisville, and is a member of the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis.

On September 1, 1875, Doctor Hemphill married Emma L. Muller, of Columbia, South Carolina, who died April 4, 1920.

JOHN PUTNAM HASWELL. A Louisville lawyer in the Republic Building, John Putnam Haswell gained admittance to the bar before he was of age, and his career has been one of steadily advancing honors and success, sufficient to make him well known all over Kentucky.

Mr. Haswell was born in Hardinsburg, Breckinridge County, October 7, 1871, a son of James Gibbs and Frances H. (Bassett) Haswell. His parents were both New Englanders. His father was born in Providence, Rhode Island, in 1815, and died in 1890, while his mother was born in Connecticut in 1835 and died in 1900. They were married in Connecticut, and of their eight children five are still living, John Putnam being the sixth in age. James G. Haswell grew up at Circleville, Ohio, during pioneer times, had a high school education there, and as a young man moved to Kentucky and for many years was in the general merchandise business at Hardinsburg. He studied law, was admitted to the Kentucky bar by examination, and acquired an extensive practice before his death. Though largely self educated, he was noted as one of the best read men in the state. During the period of the Civil war he was provost marshal of Breckinridge County and also United States commissioner. He was a member of the Filson Club at Louisville, the State Bar Association, was a Mason, belonged to the Methodist Episcopal Church, and began his voting as a whig and ended as a republican.

John Putnam Haswell attended school at Hardinsburg, finishing the high school course in 1887. As the oldest son at the time of his father's death he had to take care of and largely provide for the family. In the meantime he had studied law with his father and was admitted to the bar at the age of nineteen, his examination being before Judge T. R. McBeath. Mr. Haswell continued his general practice as a lawyer at Hardinsburg until 1897, when he was elected a member of the Legislature and re-elected in 1899. He was subsequently chosen again to the Legislature in 1907, in which year Governor H. E. Willson appointed him special Circuit Court judge of the Ninth District. Later he was appointed railway commissioner, and served four years. He resigned to accept the appointment as United States assistant attorney for the Western Kentucky District on April 1, 1911. He filled that office about three years, and since then has been engaged in a private law practice at Louisville.

For the past eight years Mr. Haswell has been a regent of the Kentucky State Normal School at Bowling Green. He is a republican, a Methodist, and fraternally is affiliated with Breckinridge Lodge No. 67, Free and Accepted Masons, Western Star Chapter No. 20, Royal Arch Masons, Kanaddan Council, Royal and Select Masters, and the Knight Templar Commandery. On August 5, 1919, he married Avis Wescott, who was born in Clay County, Iowa, youngest of the four children of L. C. and Gertrude (Secor) Wescott. Her father, a native of New York State, was a pioneer in Wisconsin, being a merchant and farmer at New Lisbon, and was elected a delegate to the convention which framed the First Constitution of Wisconsin. Later he moved to Clay County, Iowa, where he owned a farm and for a number of years had his home in Minneapolis.

J. GRAY McALLISTER, D. D., is one of the eminent scholars of the Presbyterian Church and is a former president of Hampden-Sidney College in Virginia. Virginia is his native state, and he is one of the members of the faculty of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of Kentucky at Louisville.

Doctor McAllister was born at Covington, Virginia, November 27, 1872, a son of Abraham Addams and Julia Ellen (Stratton) McAllister. He is one of three brothers to earn distinction in the world of science and letters. His older brother, Joseph T. McAllister, is a Virginia lawyer, for many years has been counsel for the Virginia Hot Springs Company, and is also an author and historian with several published works to his credit. HUBBARD F. GRIFFITH. One of the oldest farms in Harrison County distinguished by continuous possession of one family and long a center of the pure bred livestock industry is the Silver Lake Farm, the present proprietor of which is Hubbard F. Griffith, a great-great-grandson of the founder of this well known family in Kentucky.

William Griffith was born in Virginia and was one of the early settlers in Bourbon County, Kentucky. He was a delegate from that county to the convention which framed the first constitution for Kentucky. Not long after the constitution was ratified he took sick, and died at the age of forty, when in the prime of his years and usefulness. He married Sallie Baker, who after coming to Kentucky studied medicine and was very proficient in the application of herbal remedies to disease.

One of their sons was Maj. William Griffith, who held the rank of major in the State Militia. He moved from Bourbon to Harrison County, settling five miles southwest of Cynthiana, where he became owner of the extensive tract of land comprising about twelve hundred acres known for years as the Silver Lake Farm. He erected the present brick residence about a century ago. He was born in Virginia November 5, 1782, and died July 7, 1843.

A grandson of Major Griffith and son of William Burrell and Harriet (King) Griffith (he dying in 1837), was William King Griffith, who owned Silver Lake Farm and spent all his life in its occupations. He died December 21, 1915. He married Margaret K. Spears, who died January 29, 1918. His children were: William B., deceased; Emma H., wife of Rev. J. T. Sharrard, of Paris, Kentucky; Hubbard F.; John K., who died in 1906, at the age of forty-three, at Kansas City, Missouri, where he was a prominent attorney.

Hubbard F. Griffith grew up on the old Silver Lake Farm, had a public school education, attended Smith's Classical School and Eastman's Business College at Poughkeepsie, New York. After finishing his education he returned to the homestead, and has made a notable success as a farmer and stock breeder. The feature of his stock farm is his herd of Polled Angus cattle, headed by Allenhurst Blackbird No. 315363. Since the death of his mother his nephew, William King Griffith and wife, Betty George, have occupied the home with him. They have three children, Mary Gallo-way, William King and Elizabeth Golden Griffith.

AUSTIN EUGENE POPHAM, M. D. The leading representative of the medical profession at Knottsville in Daviess County is Doctor Popham, formerly a successful physician and surgeon at Louisville, and who served for a time as an officer in the Medical Corps during the World war.

Doctor Popham is a native of Kentucky, born on a farm in Breckinridge County October 6, 1879, son of Michael Fieldon and Theresa (Bevin) Popham. His parents are natives of the same county. His father was an industrious farmer, and when Doctor Popham was twelve years of age the family established a home at Cloverport.

Doctor Popham received his early schooling in Cloverport and as a boy clerk in a drug store acquired his early familiarity with materia medica and first determined to follow the profession of pharmacy. He was graduated in 1901 from the Louisville College of Pharmacy, but immediately began the study of medicine in the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville and graduated M. D. with the class of 1904. For a time he practiced at Louisville, for three years at Uniontown, and then returned and resumed practice at Louisville until the fall of 1913. For the past seven years he has enjoyed an exceptionally large practice at Knottsville and vicinity. He is a member of the Daviess County and Kentucky State Medical Societies, and has devoted his years to the study of everything connected with his profession and has the character to supplement his professional training.

At the time of the war with Germany he volunteered his services to the Government, was commissioned a lieutenant in the Medical Corps and when the armistice was signed was doing duty at Camp Greenleaf, Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia. Doctor Popham is a Catholic and a member of the Knights of Columbus.

In 1906, while living at Uniontown, he married Miss Mary O'Brien, of Breckinridge County. They are the parents of eight children.

JUDGE WILLIAM M. REED. The law is a profession and not a vocation. Its practice involves some of the most fundamental interests of private, social and civic relationships, and now, as always, an able lawyer, even though he studiously avoids public office, has a work that cannot be dissociated from the public interests and welfare.

Many great and eminent lawyers have distinguished the annals of the Kentucky bench and bar. For all the high and difficult standards thus raised, the service of Judge William M. Reed of Paducah has qualified him to be considered in the front rank of the Kentucky lawyers an jurists of his time. He has been in practice nearly fifty years. His practice has covered the entire First Congressional District. At this writing he is closing his third consecutive term as judge of the Circuit Court of the Second Judicial District.

Judge Reed, who has been a resident of Paducah for twenty years, represents some of the rugged pioneer stock of Western Kentucky. His grandfather, Noah Reed, was born in 1795 in North Carolina, in which state he married Nancy Shemwell. About 1830 they came West, establishing their home in the new County of Graves in Kentucky. Noah Reed was a farmer and planter, was interested in local politics as a democrat, and both he and his wife spent the rest of their lives in Graves County, where he died in 1860.

The father of Judge Reed also bore the name William M. Reed. Born in North Carolina in 1825, he was a child when brought to Kentucky, grew up in Graves County, and after his marriage moved to Marshall County. His affairs as a farmer were beginning to prosper when accidental death, due to a falling tree, terminated his life in 1848, at the age of twenty-three. He was likewise a democrat in politics. His wife was Margaret McCain. The mother of Judge Reed was of Irish descent, was born in Davidson County, Tennessee, in 1820, and survived her husband more than half a century. She died in Graves County in 1899. Of her two children, N. R. Reed became a merchant, insurance broker and general business man and died at Ocala, Florida, in 1909.

Judge William M. Reed was born in Graves County, Kentucky, September 5, 1848, a few months after the death of his father. His mother married Noah Park, of Marshall County, when William M. was a small boy. By this marriage she became the mother of nine children, three sons and six daughters: J. C. Park, a farmer in Graves County; Judge D. G. Park, a lawyer of Louisville, Kentucky; Charles Park, who died in infancy; and Victoria, Mary, Emeline, Valluria, Vituria, and Rosa Park. William M. Reed grew up in the home in Marshall and Graves counties until he was seventeen. He then left the home and thereafter supported himself.

His advantages were somewhat limited, owing not only to the early death of his father, but also to the disturbed conditions caused by the Civil war. A sense of responsibility was developed as a fundamental part of his character while a boy. He was under the necessity of helping in the practical work of the home, but he also made the best possible use of his advantage in the rural schools and had the privilege of attending Marshall County Seminary two years and Princeton College, at Princeton, Kentucky, on year.

When Judge Reed left college in 1871 he began the study of law at Benton in the office of Philander Palmer. He was admitted to the bar in March, 1873, before he was twenty-five years of age. Judge Reed had his home at Benton until 1900, and from that town his reputation as an able lawyer spread quickly over the entire First Congressional District. For years he attended nearly every session of the courts in Calloway, Marshall, Graves and McCracken counties. With many important interests claiming his professional attention, he established a law office at Paducah as early as 1880, though he did not move his home to that city until 1900. For thirty years his time and abilities were fully absorbed in an extensive general practice.

In the early period of his professional career he served as county attorney of Marshall County. He represented that county three terms in the Legislature, 1877-78, 1885-86, and 1887-88. For a number of years his professional associates acknowledged that he possessed all the qualities and temperament required of the judicial office, but he did not consent to become a candidate for the bench until November, 1903, when he was elected for his first term as circuit judge of the Marshall counties. He went on the bench in January, 1904, and for eighteen consecutive years handled with exceptional ability the cares and responsibilities of the judicial office. He was re-elected in 1909 and was chosen for the third term in 1915. This term expired in January, 1922, and Judge Reed refused to be a candidate for re-election.

Besides his honored position in the bar and on the bench Judge Reed has acquired many interests in his part of the state. He is a stockholder in the City National Bank, the Citizens Savings Bank and the Ohio Valley Trust Company of Paducah, and in the banks of Kevil, Lovelaceville, and Bandana in Ballard County, Gilbertsville in Marshall County, Cerulean in Trigg County and Tolu in Crittenden County. He owns considerable improved real estate in Paducah, including his modern home at 2131 Jefferson Street, and formerly owned three farms near Benton, but sold these agricultural properties in 1919.

While his profession has always had first claim upon him, Judge Reed has always been a loyal democrat and is regarded as one of the foremost representatives of his party in the state. He is a member of the Christian Church, the Masonic fraternity and is actively affiliated with the State and American Bar associations.

In October, 1872, at Benton, Kentucky, he married Miss Mary R. Strow. Her parents, Willis and Mary (Carter) Strow, now deceased, lived at Benton, where her father was a merchant. Judge and Mrs. Reed had five children: Clarence Boone, the oldest, is a farmer five miles west of Paducah. Cecil, who attended Kentucky State College at Lexington and graduated in law from the Danville Law School, is secretary and treasurer of the Ohio Valley Bank & Trust Company of Paducah. Lula, who graduated from Price's College at Nashville, Tennessee, later from the Oxford Woman's College at Oxford, Ohio, with the A. B. degree and also completed a course of library training at New York City, is the wife of Fain King, secretary and treasurer of the King Mills & Lumber Company of Paducah. The fourth of the family is Roscoe Reed, a Paducah lawyer, whose career is elsewhere reviewed. The youngest, Ruby, died at the age of thirteen months.

ROSCOE REED, vice president of the Kentucky State Bar Association, is a son of Judge William M. Reed and has had a busy professional career since his admission to the bar twelve years ago.

He was born at Benton, Marshall County, Kentucky, January 14, 1885, and acquired his early education in the public schools of his native town. He graduated in 1902 from the Paducah High School, and from Miami University in Ohio with the A. B. degree in 1906. He took his law course in the Jefferson Law School at Louisville, where he received his LL. B. degree with the class of 1908. Mr. Reed is a member of the Phi Delta Theta College fraternity. From 1908 until 1912 he was division claim agent of the N. C. & St. L. Railway Company. In 1912 he was elected city attorney of Paducah, an office he held four years. Since then he has been engaged in a general civil and criminal practice as a member of the well known law firm of Mocquot, Berry & Reed in the City National Bank Building. An able young lawyer, he has also become widely identified with the social and civic affairs of his home city. He is a steward in the Methodist Episcopal Church, president of the Men's Bible Class and in Masonry is affiliated with Plain City Lodge No. 449, A. F. and A. M., Paducah Chapter No. 20, R. A. M., Paducah Council No. 32, R. and S. M., Paducah Commandery No. 11, K. T. Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Louisville, Paducah Shrine Club, and also Paducah Lodge No. 217 of the Elks. He is a member of Paducah Den of the Lions Club, Paducah Country Club, Board of Trade and politically is a democrat.

His home is at 2131 Jefferson Street. On October 24, 1919, at Hopkinsville, he married Miss Helen Roper, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ellis Roper, of Hopkinsville. Mrs. Reed is a graduate of the Hopkinsville High School.

As it was two of his sons represented the family as Confederate soldiers.

Richard Hawes Taylor was born in Daviess County January 29, 1835, and was reared on his father's farm. After receiving an excellent literary education he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1858, and was engaged in an active practice for many years. When this bank was merged into the First National Bank he was made president of the new organization, and for twenty-five years served it as its efficient executive. He had farming interests as well, and about 1876 moved to a farm residence situated about two miles southeast of Owensboro, and there he lived until his death, which occurred in 1900.

In 1858 Richard H. Taylor was married in Jefferson County, Kentucky, to Mary Fielder, who was born in September, 1839, and died a few years before her husband. They had the following children: Jonathan Gibson, who was the eldest born; Susan E., who was born in September, 1863; Samuel Pendleton, who was born in March, 1874; and Zachary, who was born in May, 1880.

Jonathan Gibson Taylor, whose name heads this review, received his literary education in the University of Virginia, and then studied law in the law school of the University of Louisville. Following his admission to the bar he began to practice his profession at Owensboro, and carried it on actively for twenty years, when he retired so as to devote himself exclusively to agriculture. He resides on his parents' former homestead just outside the city limits of Owensboro. The old residence was destroyed a few years ago by fire, but Mr. Taylor rebuilt on the original site, which is one of the beautiful spots of the county. In 1902 he was married to Elizabeth Browning Richardson, who was born at Trenton, New Jersey.

She is also a devoted member of the Christian Church and in March, 1921, attained the age of eighty-three. She is the mother of three sons, Emmett Howard, in the wholesale coal business in Chicago; William Botts Irwin, a hardware merchant at Riverside, California; and John Lacy.

John Lacy Irwin spent his boyhood days on the farm and while there attended the common schools. Leaving home when about eighteen, he went to Louisville and in the offices of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad learned telegraphy and shorthand and was in the service of that company for about fifteen years, being advanced to various grades of responsibility and at the time of his resignation was private secretary to the superintendent of machinery. Mr. Irwin was a resident of Louisville for over twenty years, and on leaving that city moved to Chicago, where for four or five years he was in the coal business.

On returning to his native county he located at Elizabethtown and in 1913 received a proof of the confidence reposed in him by his fellow citizens when he was elected county clerk. He qualified for his duties in January, 1914, and in 1917 was re-elected. Mr. Irwin is a staunch democrat in politics. He is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner and a member of the Christian Church.

LUCIEN DUNLAP GREENE. One of the prominent young lawyers of Louisville, while his time and abilities have been fully enlisted in building up his practice during the past ten years, Mr. Greene has also found opportunity to continue his earlier interests in educational affairs, and is one of the very earnest and public spirited men of his home city.

Mr. Greene was born in Montgomery County, Kentucky, July 9, 1883, a son of Lucien Butler and Sallie F. (Johnson) Greene, also natives of Montgomery County. His father was born December 25, 1845, and died September 13, 1920, while his mother, still living, was born in 1852. Five of their eight children are alive, Lucien D. being the fourth in age. The father was a successful merchant and farmer at Mount Sterling until he retired some five years before his death. For many years he held the post of deacon in the Christian Church at Mount Sterling, and was always affiliated with the democratic party.

Lucien D. Greene had a liberal education, attending the Kentucky Military Institute and later St. Charles College at St. Charles, Missouri. From 1904 to 1908 he was professor of mathematics in the Kentucky Military Institute. He began the study of law in the meantime, was admitted to the bar by examination in 1909, and finished his course and received his diploma from the University of Louisville Law School in 1910. He is engaged in general practice as a lawyer and is also head consul for the Kentucky District in the Woodmen of the World and for the past six years has had charge of the public speaking department of the Louisville Young Men's Christian Association.

Mr. Greene is a Knight Templar Mason with the Louisville Commandery, a member of Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine, the Broadway Christian Church and the Kentucky State Bar Association. In politics he is a democrat. On April 22, 1913, he married Virginia Graves. They have one son, Lucien Butler.

THOMAS HENRY MATTHEWS throughout his residence in Louisville has been actively identified with the Kentucky Central Life and Accident Insurance Company, of which he is vice president. He is a Georgian by birth, and his early life in that state was spent in the teaching profession.

He was born near Dallas, Georgia, October 24, 1878, a son of Jesse B. and Dora A. (Smith) Matthews. His parents were natives of Paulding County, Georgia. His father, born September 16, 1855, spent his active life as a farmer, retiring in 1917. He died March 5, 1921. The mother of Thomas H. Matthews died in 1885, at the age of twenty-eight, and when her son was seven years of age. The father was a democrat and a member of the Baptist Church.

Thomas H. Matthews acquired a grammar and high school education at Dallas, Georgia, and remained in that state, engaged chiefly in teaching school, until he came to Louisville in 1903. He was chief clerk for the Kentucky Central Life and Accident Insurance Company until March, 1917, and was then elected vice president and is one of the active executives of this well known corporation.

Mr. Matthews demitted from Dallas Lodge No. 182 to Louisville Lodge No. 400, Free and Accepted Masons, on June 6, 1910, and is affiliated with Louisville Lodge No. 8, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and the Walnut Street Baptist Church.

On September 17, 1910, he married Miss Mabel Alice Slaton, of Breckinridge County, daughter of Will and Lucy Slaton, natives of the same county. Her mother is still living, at Cleveland, Ohio. Mrs. Matthews was the oldest of three daughters, and is the only one living.

WILLIAM LEON KENNETT is identified with one of the oldest organizations of livestock dealers in Kentucky, P. C. Kennett & Son, livestock purchasing agents at Louisville. The head of this firm, P. C. Kennett, has been in the livestock business as a dealer for half a century. They have through many years of experience gained a very extensive clientele and have perfected facilities enabling them to serve the discriminating interests of their patrons as buyers of selected stock, satisfying the most exacting demands. The firm besides its offices at Louisville maintains branch offices at Nashville, Montgomery, Memphis, East St. Louis, Cincinnati, Indianapolis and Lafayette.

P. C. Kennett, senior member of this firm, was born in Spencer County, Kentucky, in 1842, and married Margaret Polina Meyers, who was born in the same county the same year. Both grew up there and were educated in the public schools, and Mrs. Kennett was a teacher for a time. P. C. Kennett was a farmer, but since 1871 has been in the livestock business as a buyer and seller, and was one of the pioneers to do business at the Bourbon Stock Yards at Louisville, which have been his headquarters for the past twenty-five years. He is a life-long member of the Christian Church, is a republican, but has never sought public office. Of the five children born to their union two died in infancy and three are still living, William L. being the second in age.

William Leon Kennett was born in Spencer County July 16, 1869, but acquired his education at Louisville, attending the Male High School. When he was only fourteen years of age he began to take an active interest in the business of his father, and they have been closely associated ever since.

Besides his partnership in this firm Mr. Kennett is president of the Montgomery Stock Yards Company in Alabama, a director in the Union Stock Yards Company at Nashville, and is a director of the Stock Yards Bank of Louisville. He is also vice president of the Louisville Bedding Company and vice president of the Monarch Auto Company and a director in the Oxygen and Hydrogen Company.

Mr. Kennett is a life member of Preston Lodge No. 281, Free and Accepted Masons, and is a charter member of Crescent Hill Lodge No. 820, Free and Accepted Masons. He is affiliated with Eureka Chapter No. 101, Royal Arch Masons; Grand Council, Royal and Selected Masters; DeMolay Commandery No. 12, Knights Templars, and the Grand Consistory of Kentucky and Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine. On January 1, 1889, Mr. Kennett married Miss Mamie Phoebe Curtis, a native of Fayette County, Kentucky.

JOSEPH MATTHEWS GERTEISEN, a prosperous farmer and public-spirited citizen of Daviess County, in which he was born April 25, 1874, is a son of Frank and Tiny (Ruster) Gerteisen, the former a native of Ohio and the latter of Indiana. The parents came to Kentucky after their marriage, first living at Louisville but later moved to Daviess County and settled on a farm. They had twelve children, Joseph M. being the youngest, and when he was four months old the mother died. The father survived her several years and died in Tell City, Indiana. The oldest sister of Joseph M. Gerteisen, Mary by name, reared him, and still makes her home with him, neither of them having married.

Growing to manhood on a farm, Joseph M. Gerteisen secured but a limited education, and since he was seventeen years old has fought the battles of life for himself and his sister. He has worked for wages, and then later rented farm land, and through his industry and thrift prospered so that in 1903 he was able to buy his present farm of 120 acres of land, lying along the Ohio River above Owensboro about three miles. This is one of the old homesteads of the county, and the residence is a commodious brick structure which is so placed as to overlook the river. Here Mr. Gerteisen and his sister accord a hearty welcome and generous hospitality to their many friends. They were reared in and still adhere to the Catholic faith. Mr. Gerteisen has always manifested a commendable spirit of public enterprise, and during the great war withheld no support from the many inaugurated movements to enable the administration to carry out its policies.

In 1910 Mr. Gerteisen was in a hotly contested campaign for the office of sheriff on the democratic ticket, but was not successful, owing to a division in the party in local matters. He has always been engaged in farming, and with the exception of a brief period when he was interested in a retail liquor business has not been engaged with outside matters. He disposed of his interest in this because he felt it was not a line in accordance with his ideas of honor, and he realized that he would rather make his money out of tilling the soil.

HARRY MALCOLM DENTON, a prominent young attorney of Louisville with a special reputation for his success as a criminal lawyer, is a native of Kentucky and represents one of the old and solid families in the western part of the state.

He was born in Henderson County December 29, 1883, a son of Theodore Lawrence and Nollie (Taylor) Denton, and a grandson of George Washington and Martha Denton. George Washington Denton was in his day one of the leading farmers, tobacco growers and land owners of Union County, and was liberal with his means and personal energy in behalf of all good causes in his community. He was one of the most active supporters of church and school work in the Baptist denomination. In politics he was a democrat. Theodore L. Denton, the oldest of four children, has likewise spent his active career as a farmer and tobacco grower in Henderson County, but is now living retired at Corydon. He was born in Union County, and his wife was a native of Greenville, Kentucky, the former a member of the Christian Church, the latter of the Methodist Church, South. The parents and all their eight children are still living, Harry Malcolm being the oldest.

Harry Malcolm Denton graduated from the Corydon High School in 1902. He then entered the Southern Normal School at Bowling Green, now the Western Kentucky Normal School, and received his Bachelor of Science degree in 1905 and his A. B. degree in 1907. For two years after leaving normal college he was principal of schools at Bethel, Louisiana, and from there entered Yale University Law School, graduating LL. B. in 1912. Mr. Denton did his first work as a lawyer and earned his early reputation in Eastern Kentucky at Whitesburg, but since February 28, 1915, has been a member of the Louisville bar, and his talents have been employed in many cases that have attracted general attention. Mr. Denton is a democrat, a member of the Christian Church, belongs to the Jefferson County Bar Association, and is affiliated with Willis Stewart Lodge No. 224, Free and Accepted Masons.

SAMUEL ARETUS ANDERSON is a product of western Kentucky. He had the experience of a farmer boy, became a printer and newspaper publisher, achieved success in politics as a republican in a democratic stronghold, studied law and since 1910 has been one of the valued and successful members of the Louisville bar.

Mr. Anderson was born at Whitesville, Daviess County, Kentucky, January 29, 1872. If that community on April 12, 1848, there was born to the Anderson family a son, R. A. Anderson, and to the Hayes family a daughter, Sophronia C., and nearly twenty years later these two linked their lives in marriage on February 27, 1868. R. A. Anderson acquired a public school education in his native county, and in 1862, when only fourteen years of age, enlisted in the Third Kentucky Cavalry and played a gallant part as a boy soldier of the Union. He was wounded while in the army and was honorably discharged at the close of the war at Louisville. The remainder of his life was spent in the industrious and honorable pursuit of farming. He did general farming, but was a great lover of fine saddle horses. R. A. Anderson, who died in August, 1919, was for a number of years commander of the G. A. R. Post at Hartford, Kentucky, and was a member of the Christian Church. In politics he was aligned with the democrats until 1899, and after that with the republican party. His wife died February 16, 1914, and of their nine children eight are still living, Samuel Aretus being the third in age.

S. A. Anderson was born on his father's farm near Whitesville in Daviess County, but after 1879 lived with his parents on their farm in Ohio County. He attended public schools, and at the age of sixteen began to work for the Hartford Republican as a printer. He was a printer in the offices of the Hartford Republican and Hartford Herald for five years, and at the age of twenty-one came to the responsibilities and dignity of the ownership of the Hartford Republican, of which he was publisher and editor for a number of years.

In the midst of his journalistic career came his first notable triumph in politics. In 1897 he was nominated by the republicans of Ohio County as candidate for clerk of the Circuit Court. His election was in the nature of a personal triumph, since he was the first republican circuit clerk ever elected in Ohio County. He filled the office one term, and while in office he passed the bar examination, and on leaving the courthouse began practice at Hartford. Mr. Anderson was engaged in practice there until December, 1910, when he removed to Louisville, and for the past ten years has maintained his offices in the Marion E. Taylor Building. Along with a busy professional clientage he has always maintained a great interest in politics. He was republican nominee for judge of the Jefferson Circuit Court, Criminal Division, in 1915, but was defeated with other republican aspirants of that year. During 1918-19 he served as a member of the Louisville City Council. Mr. Anderson is a member of the Methodist Church, and fraternally is affiliated with the Elks, Knights of Pythias and Maccabees.

On September 19, 1894, he married Miss Elva M. Morton, oldest daughter of the late Judge John P. Morton, who for a number of years filled the post of county judge of Ohio County. The three children of Mr. and Mrs. Anderson are Mary Louise, wife of Gilbert Watkins; Capt. Samuel A. Anderson, Jr., who gained his title in the football world; and Helen Morton Anderson, attending the Girls' High School at Louisville.

Mrs. CHRISTOPHER DAVID CHENAULT, of Lexington, whose maiden name was Sarah Gibson Humphreys, was born at the old ancestral home of her parents, Sumners Forest, Woodford County, Kentucky, March 21, 1858. Reared in an atmosphere of refinement and culture, in a home filled with traditions of men and women who helped to make the early history of Kentucky, surrounded by rare old mahogany, silver, glass, a library of the choicest and rarest books that money and good taste could select, it is not surprising that this young woman of the "Blue Grass" should have grown up with all the tastes and inclinations of her forebears.

Mrs. Chenault was educated in the schools of Versailles and Lexington, Kentucky; Boston, Massachusetts, and for three or four years with her brother on her mother's plantation by an English tutor who was preparing her brother for college. Her tastes were entirely literary, artistic and musical, but before she was twenty it devolved upon her to take over her farm, a part of the old home place, Sumners Forest, which had descended to her, her sister, Mrs. Lewis Johnstone (Lucy Alexander Humphreys), and brother, Joseph Alexander Humphreys, from their great-great-grandfather, John ("Parson") Brown and Mary Preston, his wife, and for ten years or more she devoted herself to the activities of farm life, making an unusual success of it, especially in the training of trotting, harness and saddle horses, disposing of them at high prices. She believed in only humane methods of breaking horses, using always gentleness, kindness and affection in training to harness and saddle. An interesting item from a paper published thirty years ago reads: "Sumners Forest is now owned by Mrs. Lewis S. Johnstone and Sallie Gibson Humphreys, unmarried. The latter is probably the only young lady in Kentucky who gives her personal attention to her business unaided. She does her own buying and selling, writes her own leases and superintends all the improvements, repairs and work on her farm. She is a noted equestrian and fearless driver. She not only supervises the breaking and training of her horses, but assists in doing it. In fine, she is a business woman, at the same time is cultured, accomplished and refined, and is greatly admired in society for her beauty of person and character and disposition."

While a young girl on her farm Mrs. Chenault organized and carried on successfully a literary society in her home county and town (Versailles), taking the editorship of the monthly newspaper in connection with it, furnishing editorials, articles on the leading topics of the day and news of the members of the society in the town and county.

Some of the interesting history concerning Sumners Forest and its owner, Joseph Alexander Humphreys, is told on other pages under the name of Joseph A. Humphreys. The Humphreys were originally in Wales, being driven from there by religious persecution to the north of Ireland and thence coming to America. David C. Humphreys married Sallie Scott, daughter of an eminent physician of Central Kentucky. While his children were quite young he moved from Sumners Forest to Waverly, an estate of 3,000 acres adjoining Woodburn Farm, presenting Sumners Forest to his oldest son, Joseph Alexander Humphreys. The latter was born July 26, 1826, was educated in the school of Mann Butler at Frankfort, and while attending school there lived in the home of his uncle, John Brown. He graduated from Center College at Danville at the age of fifteen, and later attended Princeton College and Yale University, where he took special courses and spent also five years abroad in travel and as a student in the hospitals of Paris, hoping to devote his life to medicine. His health did not permit of this and he was finally persuaded to become a farmer. Mr. Humphreys was most advanced in his ideas and had the distinction of bringing to Kentucky for use on his farm the first portable engine that ever crossed the Mason and Dixon line. He also brought to Kentucky the first Morgan horse, that later became quite celebrated in the horse world. His health was far from robust, and it was a great grief to him that he could not take up arms for his beloved Southland. He died in New York, where he had gone for treatment under a celebrated physician, February 15, 1863.

His wife, and the mother of Mrs. Chenault, was Sarah Gibson, author and woman suffragist, who was born in Warren County, Mississippi, May 17, 1830. Her father, Tobias Gibson, was born October 27, 1800, in Adams County, Mississippi, son of Reverend Randall and Harriet (McKinley) Gibson. Randall Gibson with his parents and other relatives moved from British Neck, Pedee River, South Carolina, to the territory of Mississippi, where they were among the earliest pioneers. Harriet McKinley, a daughter of Captain John and Mary (Connolly) McKinley, was born at Valley Forge the winter the army was camped there. Tobias Gibson was for a few years a merchant at Port Gibson and then bought a handsome cotton plantation nearby. In 1826 he married Louisa Breckenridge Hart, of Spring Hill, Woodford County, Kentucky, a woman of masculine intellect, unusual culture and great force of character. She was the daughter of Nathaniel and Susanna (Preston) Hart and her Christian name was selected by James B. Breckenridge. She was the mother of six soldier sons of the South, named General Randall Lee, Dr. William Preston, Colonel Hart, Captain Claude, Captain Tobias and McKinley Gibson. After his marriage Tobias Gibson moved to Terrebonne Parish, Louisiana, where he purchased a large landed estate, which he conducted with so much energy and intelligence that he soon became wealthy and retired to Lexington, Kentucky, where he lived until the outbreak of the war. He kept up a domestic establishment upon a liberal scale, educated his family in Europe, but handled his business affairs with such skill as to build up one of the largest and most productive estates in Louisiana. He was prompt, exact, energetic, intelligent, methodical and fertile in resources and experience, and up to within a day or two of his death he was busy superintending his affairs. His former slaves adored him, and hundreds followed his body to the station when it was brought to Kentucky for burial. Without taste for public life, he once served as senator in the Louisiana General Assembly. He was the devoted personal friend of Mr. Clay, Mr. Wickliff and Mr. Vertner and other prominent men of that day. He died at his Oak Forest plantation February 7, 1872. His daughter, Sarah Gibson Humphreys, was the oldest in a family of six brothers and two sisters.

Miss Sarah Gibson Humphreys was married to Colonel Christopher David Chenault March 30, 1892, in St. John's Episcopal Church at Versailles, and went immediately to his home in Richmond, Madison County. Two children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Chenault: Sarah Gibson Humphreys and Lucy Humphreys. The former married Dr. Garret Davis Buckner, a chemist at the State University. The latter became the wife of Mathew Williams, the great-great-grandson of Henry Clay.

Mrs. Chenault has always been an ardent suffragist and in 1896 was one of the state vice presidents of the Association. She has been a contributor of short stories and articles to local papers and a writer of plays for home talent. She is a charter member of the Woman's Club of Central Kentucky. She organized the Boonesborough Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, at Richmond, and was its regent for ten years, state regent for three years, vice regent for two years, and at the meeting held in Washington, D. C. in April, 1921, was elected vice president. Twice she was president of Chapters of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, of the Chapter in Richmond and for two years of the Lexington Chapter, and the first state treasurer of that organization. She is a member of the Colonial Dames, Associated Charities, on the Board of the Humane Society, member of the Red Cross, was a vice president of the Spinner and Pocahontas Memorial, and is a member of the State and National Associations. Mrs. Chenault feels that her best work has been in connection with the Daughters of the American Revolution. Just now she is working out plans for a Kentucky Daughters of the American Revolution Mountain School to be maintained by the Daughters of the State. It has long been her wish to have the Daughters of Kentucky take hold of this patriotic educational work in one of the mountain counties where educational facilities have been meager, and now that the State Daughters of the American Revolution have taken hold and are determined to push the school through to completion Mrs. Chenault regards that as the triumph of her twenty-eight years of service with the organization.

CHRISTOPHER DAVID CHENAULT, son of Waller and Talitha (Harris) Chenault, was born in Madison County, Kentucky, May 22, 1846. His education commenced at the age of five years under Governor McCullough, and was continued under John L. Waller at Green Hill Academy on his father's farm, a school built especially for the education of their children by his father, Gen. C. M. Clay, Samuel Bennett and Joseph Chenault. His next teachers were William Chenault and Jason W. Chenault. He finished his education at Harrodsburg at the age of fifteen.

The Civil war having begun and Kirby Smith having fought and won the battle of Richmond, Kentucky, he made all arrangements to enter the Confederate army in Chenault's Brigade, and on their retreat from Kentucky went as far as Richmond. He was persuaded by his brother, Cap. Joe Chenault, to stay at home and care for his mother and younger children, six in number, which he did. After the Southern army retreated his arrest was ordered by the Federal authorities. Acting on information given him by his cousin, John Bennett, he went hastily to Cincinnati, where he completed a course in bookkeeping and banking at Bartlett's Commercial College. Then being advised that it was safe to return home, he took charge of the books of Burton & Holloway, a wholesale and retail dry goods establishment at Richmond. Not liking this business, he took charge of his farm. In 1870 he entered the Madison National Bank at Richmond as bookkeeper, and after two years became cashier, an office he filled for about thirty years.

On August 1, 1872, he married Florence Dillingham. She died in February, 1890, survived by four children, Margaret, Joe, Florrie and Kittie. On March 30, 1892, Mr. Chenault married Sallie Gibson Humphreys, of Woodford County.

In politics Mr. Chenault was always a democrat, serving as chairman of the Madison County Democratic Committee and as chairman of the Eighth Congressional District during the entire term of Congressman James B. McCreary. He was the financial commissioner of Madison County, and was largely instrumental in the building of the railroad from Paris to Livingston and the railroad from Versailles to Beattyville, of which he was president. About twenty years of his life were spent in the development of railroad facilities that transformed these counties into two of the most prosperous in the state. He has often been reminded by the people of Estill and Lee counties of the sacrifices made by him in their behalf.

In 1902 he and his family removed to Lexington, and after a short time he was elected cashier of the National Exchange Bank. Several years later this was consolidated with the Central Bank, and out of the two was organized the Lexington Banking and Trust Company, with a capital of $600,000. He became cashier of the company. A few years afterwards it was consolidated with the Phoenix National Bank, becoming the Phoenix Third National Bank, now one of the largest financial institutions of Kentucky.

The Chenaults first settled in America about 1700, coming from southern France. They were Huguenots and followers of John Calvin. They with two hundred other Huguenots were granted by the Colonial Government of Virginia a tract of land in Monikin Town, then Powhattan, now Goochland County. From that original seat they and others of the same extraction have spread to all parts of the country, winning honor and respect wherever they have gone. Mr. Chenault like most of his family, with few exceptions, is a Baptist, and for a long time was superintendent of the Sunday School of his church at Richmond and moderator of the Tates Creek Association at the old Gilbert's Creek Church.

The first Chenault settlers in this country were Stephen Chenault and his wife. His son was Hugo, Hugo's son was Felix, who married a Miss Dabney (or D'Aubigne) their son was William, who married Elizabeth Mullins, and their son William married Susanna Phelps Waller, a son of William and Susanna, married Talitha Harris, and they were the parents of Christopher David Chenault.

JOHN BROWN, the first United States senator from Kentucky, was one of a distinguished family, and the relationship includes the Humphreys of Lexington and Central Kentucky.

This branch of the Brown family was established by Rev. John Brown, whose ancestry was English. At the age of seventeen he came from Ireland after the siege of Londonderry. He was one of the two men who constituted the first graduating class at Princeton. He married Margaret Preston, daughter of John and Elizabeth (Patton) Preston, of Virginia, and they had four sons and one daughter. The sons were men of extraordinary talents who enjoyed the advantages of a liberal collegiate education and distinction in their professions.

The oldest was John Brown, Jr., who was born at Staunton, Virginia, September 12, 1757, and died at Frankfort, Kentucky, August 29, 1837. He was in the Revolutionary army, first under Washington and afterward under the command of the Marquis de Lafayette. He read law in the office of Mr. Jefferson. He came to Kentucky in 1782, just after the battle of Blue Lick. His father, Rev. John Brown also came to Kentucky and was the first pastor of Pisgah Church, serving that congregation until his death. He was laid to rest in Pisgah Cemetery, but his body was subsequently interred in the Brown family plot at Frankfort.

The distinguished part acted by Senator John Brown in the early political history of the state is familiar to most Kentuckians. He represented the District of Kentucky in the Virginia Legislature; was the first member of Congress of the United States from the great valley of the Mississippi; was three times elected to the United States Senate; and was honored with many important commissions by General Washington, Mr. Adams, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe. His name figured conspicuously in the proceedings for the separation of Kentucky from Virginia and the admission of the state, and also in opening the Mississippi River to the commerce of the western states.

Senator John Brown acquired the ownership of the historic Kentucky estate known as Sumner's Forest. It is said that during his ownership he sold off 500 acres of land to defray the expenses of himself and wife to New York, where they purchased a handsome "coach and four" in which they made the return trip. Mr. Brown was at that time in the Senate.

His wife, the daughter of Rev. John Mason, of New York, was a very accomplished and lovely woman, and it is said that she established the first Sunday School west of the Alleghenies.

James Brown, a brother of Senator John Brown, also began the practice of law at Frankfort and became secretary to Governor Isaac Shelby. Soon after the Louisiana Purchase he removed to New Orleans, where he served as Federal judge of the territory of Louisiana and represented the state in the United States Senate from 1813 to 1819 and was elected for a second term but resigned in 1823 to go as a Minister to France. He and Henry Clay were brothers-in-law, having married sisters, daughters of Colonel Thomas Hart of Lexington.

Still another brother of Senator John Brown was Dr. Samuel Brown who completed his medical education in Edinburgh, Scotland, and in 1797 located in Lexington. He was instrumental in founding the first medical school at Lexington, as a department of Transylvania University, and his original discoveries and researches lend his name the highest distinction among the American medical profession in the first half of the last century. Dr. Samuel Brown's son, Mason Brown, was the eminent lawyer and jurist of Frankfort, and Judge Mason Brown's son, Benjamin Gratz Brown, earned national fame as a lawyer, anti-slavery advocate, soldier, United States Senator, Governor of Missouri, and in 1872 was candidate for vice president on the ticket headed by Horace Greeley.

Dr. Preston Brown, a brother of Dr. Samuel Brown, was also a very celebrated physician in Kentucky. He came into possession of Sumner's Forest upon the death of his parents and resided there with his family until 1826. He sold the place to his nephew, David Carlisle Humphreys.

DELOZIER MOXLEY is a Louisville lawyer engaged in general practice with offices in the Inter Southern Building, and is also well known in local literary circles and in early life was a newspaper man.

Mr. Moxley was born in Louisville May 24, 1861, a son of Richard S. and Mary (Davidson) Moxley. His father was a native of Kings Court House, Virginia, and his mother was born at Washington, D. C. Richard S. Moxley acquired his early education in Virginia, and as a young man came to Louisville and was bookkeeper with the wholesale drygoods house of James Lowe and later with Anderson & Company. For a period of fifteen or twenty years he was cashier of the Louisville City National Bank, and then lived retired from active business until his death. He was a deacon in the College Street Presbyterian Church and always voted as a republican.

Delozier Moxley is the third in a family of four children, all of whom are living. He was educated in Louisville, attending the Male High School, and then had an experience of several years in the Northwest. For about a year he was in the advertising department of the St. Paul Pioneer Press, and then going out to Billings, Montana, established the Billings Herald, which he conducted for a year. On returning to Louisville Mr. Moxley had charge of the money order department of the postoffice for several years, and in the meantime studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1892. He has since achieved a large volume of general practice and is a member of the Jefferson County Bar Association in good standing.

For ten years he was president of the Cadmus Club, a club whose members were united by ties of interests and inclinations for literature. Mr. Moxley is a democrat in politics. On October 24, 1892, he married Miss Carrie Snead, daughter of Samuel and Genevieve (Flusser) Snead, natives of Kentucky, now deceased. Mrs. Moxley was the fourth in a family of nine children. Her father was one of Louisville's prominent iron and steel manufacturers.

ROBERT PUSEY HOBSON, assistant local attorney for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, with offices in the Inter Southern Building at Louisville, represents a family long prominently identified with the legal profession in Kentucky.

His father is the distinguished Judge John Peyton Hobson, of Frankfort. Judge Hobson was born in Powhatan County, Virginia, September 3, 1850, a son of W. W. and Idabella (Bowling) Hobson. He completed his education in Washington College in Virginia, now Washington and Lee University, of which four of his sons are graduates. Judge Hobson on coming to Kentucky taught in Lynnland Institute from 1870 to 1873, and since 1873 has been a continuous member of the Kentucky bar. He practiced in Hardin County, at Elizabethtown, for over twenty-five years. He was elected and served two terms, 1898 to 1914, as judge of the Kentucky Court of Appeals, and since leaving the bench has continued his practice as a lawyer at Frankfort. In 1915 Judge Henry S. Barker, while president of the University of Kentucky, conferred upon him the honorary degree LL.D. He is a democrat and an elder in the Presbyterian Church. Judge Hobson married, February 25, 1885, Mary E. Nourse, of Elizabethtown, Kentucky, where she was born August 29, 1863. They are the parents of five sons and one daughter: Charles N. and John P., Jr., both lawyers; Mary Belle, wife of P. L. Carroll; Willis, a mining engineer; Robert P.; and Joseph.

Robert Pusey Hobson was born at Elizabethtown, Kentucky, September 7, 1893, and was six years of age when his father removed to Frankfort to take up his duties on the bench. He acquired his early education at Frankfort, graduating from high school in 1911, and then entered Washington and Lee University at Lexington, Virginia, where he graduated A. B. in 1914 and from which he received his law degree in 1917. During the period of the war Mr. Hobson served by appointment in August, 1917, as a special agent in the Department of Justice, being relieved of the duties of this position October 4, 1920. He was admitted to the bar in 1916, and has since maintained an office in Louisville where he is engaged in general practice in addition to his duties on the legal staff of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. Mr. Hobson is a member of the Pi Kappa Alpha college fraternity and is a democrat. On November 15, 1917, he married Catherine P. Cochran, and they have one son, Robert Cochran.

EDWARD GAY HILL was admitted to the bar in 1903, and since then has been engaged in a steadily increasing practice as a lawyer at Louisville. He has enjoyed exceptional success in his profession and has an even wider reputation as an orator and a political campaigner, having been one of the principal speakers enlisted in the cause of the republican party to the people of the state in recent years.

Mr. Hill was born at Ocean Springs, Mississippi, August 17, 1883, a son of Felix Robertson and Ordalia (Mayes) Hill. His father was born at Nashville, Tennessee, in March, 1843, and was liberally educated in public schools and colleges, and was appointed to a cadetship in the West Point Military Academy, but on account of illness did not enter. At the outbreak of the war between the states he was a student in the University of Tennessee, and left to go into Forrest's Cavalry. Later he was appointed a chaplain. While carrying messages he was wounded near Courtland, Alabama, the birthplace of his wife. He was in service during the last three years of the war, and subsequently for many years was a prominent minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, being pastor of some of the largest churches in the southern states. In connection with his ministerial duties he was also editor of a magazine. Reverend Doctor Hill died April 30, 1917. He was affiliated with the Masonic fraternity, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and was an independent democrat in politics. His wife, Ordalia Mayes, was born at Courtland, Alabama, in 1846, and is still living. Of their five sons and two daughters four are living, Edward Gay being the youngest child.

Edward Gay Hill received his preparatory education in Smith's Academy, a department of Washington University at St. Louis. He also attended the Louisville Male High School and graduated from the law school of the University of Louisville with the class of 1903. He was admitted to the bar in March of that year, and his work as a lawyer has been continuous except for the one year he spent in Europe during 1910-11. He is a member of the Louisville and Kentucky State Bar Associations. He is also affiliated with Falls City Lodge No. 376, Free and Accepted Masons, and is a member of the Fourth Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Mr. Hill was a democrat until 1916, and since that year has given an effective service to the republican party. He was one of the leading speakers throughout the state during the campaigns of 1919-20, and contributed much to the election of Governor Morrow. Mr. Hill, who has been a resident of Louisville since 1899, is a member of the Pendennis Club, and his friends know his versatile literary gifts, represented in the authorship of a book of poems, "The House of Aegeus and Other Verse"; also other verses published in magazines and the general press. He was editor of the American Red Man for several years. It has been said that Mr. Hill made more speeches in Kentucky in behalf of the Government during the war than any other "Four Minute Man" in the state.

On September 6, 1905, he married May Effie Nuttall, a native of Henry County, Kentucky. They have one daughter, Marjorie Robertson.

REV. GEORGE NIEHAUS is the beloved pastor of St. Lawrence Catholic Church, the oldest church of that denomination in Daviess County. Catholic worship has been maintained in the vicinity of the present Philpot

Station a few miles east of Owensboro for nearly a century. The few Catholic families in that locality were attended by a missionary priest as early as 1823. It is said the first services were held by Father Nerinox in the house of Ezekial Heuring. The baptismal record shows the first baptism was performed August 12, 1823, by Rev. J. Durbin, who attended the church as a mission until 1833.

The first resident pastor was Rev. John Wathen, and he also had charge of the mission at Yellow Bank, Owensboro, which subsequently developed as the first Catholic Church of that city. Father Durbin erected the first St. Lawrence Church, a log structure that stood not far from the site of the present church. The deed for the grounds of St. Lawrence is dated November 4, 1828, the donors being Field and Griffith. The original 400 acres included also the tract known as the Cecelia Head tract. Father Wathen was pastor from 1833 to 1841, and during this time the second church of brick was erected. This old brick church stood and was used until 1870, when the present St. Lawrence Church was constructed. Father Wathen is the only priest whose remains lie buried at St. Lawrence Cemetery, though he died while at Concordia in Meade County.

Other priests to serve St. Lawrence were Rev. W. S. Coomes from 1841 to 1848; this being followed by the long pastorate of Rev. Michael M. Coghlan from 1848 to 1872; Rev. Charles Eggermont from 1872 to 1879; Rev. P. M. J. Rock from 1879 until 1885. Father Rock built the present rectory. The first rectory was a log structure only recently torn down. Rev. Thomas M. Gambon was pastor for about a year, and in 1886 was succeeded by Rev. Thomas H. Jenkins, succeeded by Rev. O. P. Ackerman. The pastor from 1888 to 1892 was Rev. James B. Monaghan, and the predecessor of Father Niehaus was Rev. L. E. Clements, who remained until 1914.

St. Lawrence was for many years one of the largest parishes in Daviess County. It was divided in 1890 and St. William Parish at Knottsville organized. In 1920 St. Lawrence congregation embraced some ninety-five families, and 135 school children were enrolled in the parochial school.

Rev. George Niehaus was born in Germany August 25, 1854, and was seven years of age when his parents, John H. and Catherine (Spille) Niehaus, came to the United States in 1861. The family located at Cincinnati, where Father Niehaus was reared and educated. As a young man he learned the trade and art of carving and sculpture. After his priestly vocation was determined upon he finished his literary education in the St. Francis Seminary at Cincinnati, and took his philosophical and theological courses in Preston Park Seminary at Louisville. In the Louisville Cathedral he was ordained a priest by Bishop McCloskey December 28, 1885, when thirty-one years of age. His health at that time being somewhat precarious, he was sent west and for eight years labored in the missionary fields. With improved health he returned to Kentucky and was made resident pastor at Cloverport. While there he built the present rectory of the parish and the church. He served as resident pastor of St. Martin's Church in Meade County for over nineteen years, and in 1914 began his congenial and constructive labors at St. Lawrence, where he has been a real spiritual leader among his own people and a highly popular citizen among all classes. Father Niehaus built with his own hands a large and beautiful cross of concrete in the St. Lawrence Cemetery, the cross being surmounted by a figure of the Christ. The physical position of the church building and rectory has been greatly improved. The most important achievement of his pastorate was the establishment in 1920 of a parochial school. St. Lawrence Church in former years had a much larger membership than at present and much larger boundaries for the parish, but this was the first time the church conducted a parochial school.

FRANK A. MENNE. Following the lead given by his early years of experience after leaving college, Frank A. Menne has become one of the nationally prominent candy manufacturers, and for many years has been active head of one of the leading confectionery establishments at Louisville.

He was born at Louisville December 14, 1857, a son of Frank J. and Anna (Christ) Menne. His father was born in Prussia July 12, 1812, and his mother in Bavaria, Germany, in 1822. They were married after they came to Louisville, and lived here the rest of their lives, the father dying in 1875 and the mother in 1900. Of their family of four sons and three daughters Frank A. is the last survivor. His father as a young man at Louisville gained his first experience in a local quarry, and later and continuing until his death was a grocery merchant. He was a devout Catholic and a democrat in politics.

Frank A. Menne attended the parochial schools of Louisville and was the first graduate of St. Xavier's College, in 1873. On leaving college he found employment with William Ehrman & Brother, candy makers, and continued with that establishment until 1882, when he entered business with his father-in-law in the manufacturing candy business. This business was conducted as the Frank A. Menne Candy Company, but in 1902 he greatly broadened the scope of the business by organizing with others the National Candy Company, of which he now is vice president and director and manager of the Frank A. Menne Factory, being the Louisville branch of the National Candy Company.

Mr. Menne is one of the successful business men and thoroughly public spirited citizens of Louisville. He is a director of the National Bank of Kentucky, a member of the Pendennis and Louisville Country Clubs, the Louisville Lodge of Elks No. 8, a fourth degree Knight of Columbus, a Roman Catholic and a member of St. Frances of Rome Church, and in politics votes republican in national affairs and independently in local campaigns.

In 1879 Mr. Menne married Anna Kimmel, who died in 1889. In 1890 he married her sister, Katie Kimmel. There were two children of the first union, one dying in infancy, while Flora A. is the wife of Charles S. Evans. The children of the second marriage are three sons and three daughters: William Charles, who died in infancy; Bertram Louis, who married Genevieve Happell and has a son, Bertram Louis, Jr.; Edwin Charles; Catherine May, wife of Frank Coggins, of Canton, Georgia; Mildred Margaret, and Clifford Raymond.

CLAY RICHARD HUNT, present county treasurer of Jefferson County, is a practical farmer and livestock man, and for a young man has achieved considerable reputation both in business and politics.

He was born in Jefferson County November 6, 1893, a son of Cyrus E. and Mary (Skinner) Hunt, being the youngest of their children, five of whom are still living. His father was born in New York State February 3, 1849, and died October 6, 1910, while his mother, still living, was born in Jefferson County, Kentucky, in 1859. Cyrus Hunt, after completing his education, came from New York to Jefferson County, and spent his active life on a farm in that county. He was a republican in politics and a member of the Church of Christ.

Clay Richard Hunt, besides the advantages of the common schools while he lived at home, acquired a good education in Potter's Bible College at Bowling Green, and for three years attended Cordell Christian College at Cordell, Oklahoma. He then returned to Jefferson County, where his farming enterprise has taken a special direction in the breeding of Duroc swine. Mr. Hunt occupies his present responsible office by special appointment made April 5, 1921. He is a republican and a member of the Church of Christ. On September 26, 1920, he married Beulah Symcox, a native of Oklahoma.

JOHN B. EADS, M. D. A retired physician living at Lexington on the Versailles Pike, three-quarters of a mile from the city, Dr. Eads has to his credit a long and capable service in his profession, and has also owned and handled extensive interests in farms and lands. He is a member of the prominent Eads family of Wayne County, and was born in that county.

His grandfather, Jacob Eads, was a native of North Carolina, where he married Ada Norman. As early as 1800 he came to Kentucky, and at a time when choice was unrestricted selected some of the rich bottom lands along the Cumberland River in a valley as rich as the Nile. His lands ran for some ten or eleven miles up and down the valley, and his total holdings would be valued now at $250,000. His land became known as Eads Bottom, and in the same community was established later the postoffice of Eadsville. A portion of this land is still held by his descendants. His son William M. Eads was born in the same community and on the same farm as the latter's son, Dr. John B. Eads, and spent his life there, where he died at the age of fifty-two. He married Elizabeth G. Stephenson, who is now living with her son W. M. Eads on Tait's Creek Pike, nine miles south of Lexington.

John B. Eads spent his boyhood days on the farm and was educated in local schools. He graduated in 1897 from the medical department of the University of Louisville, and for a brief time practiced at Wapello, Iowa. He then returned to the home of his widowed mother. His older brother, Dr. Lee J. Eads, was for some years in practice in Texas and is now located at Hamilton, Missouri. A son of Dr. Lee J. Eads, Lee S. Eads, graduated from the University of Missouri and was a soldier under General Pershing during the expedition into Mexico. Following that he resumed his law studies at the University of Missouri, and early in the World war went abroad as a captain in the Sixtieth Infantry. He was promoted to major and was killed in France while leading his company.

Dr. John B. Eads continued practice at the old home in Wayne County for several years, and later was made physician and surgeon in the Government service with headquarters at the Lock and Dam No. 21 at the lower end of Eads Bottom. During this improvement work the Government had as high as 600 men employed, and Dr. Eads was kept busy with general practice and much surgery, and was very successful in handling the health of the community. He remained there for six years, and in 1910 located at Spears in Fayette County. He had bought a farm in Jessamine County, and remained there and practiced for four years, after which he moved to Lexington in order to have the advantage of school facilities. Dr. Eads has owned several farms in the Blue Grass region, and he also bought and owned the old homestead. He has been associated with the various medical societies, and has given service on both the local and state Boards of Health. He is a democrat in politics. It is said that the famous bridge builder and engineer, Captain James B. Eads, is one of the same family stock.

April 29, 1900, Dr. Eads married Josephine Eads, also a descendant of the pioneer Jacob Eads. Her father, James H. Eads, now living retired at Stanford, Kentucky, at the age of eighty, was for many years one of the largest land owners and most constructive business men in Wayne County. He owned much of the land along the Cumberland River opposite the Eads Bottom, having five different farms there. Besides farming he was a merchant at Norman's Landing or

John. B. Cads. M.D.

Agnew Postoffice, operated the Ferry there, and his enterprise was the chief business activity of the community. Norman's Landing was an important freight point, and much lumber was shipped from there. Mrs. Eads was educated in private schools, is an active member of the Baptist Church, and for a number of years was a teacher in the Sunday School. She is the mother of two children, Audrey, a student at Sayre College in Lexington, and Errol Malcolm, a pupil in the Picadome School.

ARTHUR B. BENSINGER has had a busy career at the Louisville bar for the past twenty years, and is a former member of the faculty of the Louisville University Law School and has otherwise had interests that make his name well known in the professional and civic affairs of his community.

Mr. Bensinger was born in Louisville February 8, 1880. His parents, William and Caroline (Lapp) Bensinger, were natives of France. His mother was born in 1847 and died in 1905. Of eleven children, Arthur B. is the youngest, and five of them are still living. His father was born in 1840 and as a young man came to the United States and began his business career at Shepherdsville, Kentucky, as a furniture merchant. This business developed, and in time he had a chain of furniture stores through Kentucky and Tennessee, one store being in Louisville. He retired from active business in 1898, and lived at Louisville until his death, in 1903. He was a democrat in politics.

Arthur B. Bensinger attended school at Louisville, graduating from the Male High School in 1899. He then entered the Law School of the University of Louisville, graduating in 1901, and since that date has been engaged in a general practice, both in the State and Federal courts. He succeeded Judge Emmett Field as professor of the law on evidence, contract and criminal law in the University of Louisville, and continued his duties as a professor until 1918. From 1905 to 1910 Mr. Bensinger was first assistant city attorney. He is a member of the Jefferson County, Kentucky State and American Bar Associations, belongs to the Louisville Board of Trade and is affiliated with Daylight Lodge No. 760, Free and Accepted Masons, and Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine. In politics he did not follow the example of his father, being a republican.

On November 28, 1906, Mr. Bensinger married Miss Blanch Adler. Their four children are Arthur B., Jane Miller, Carroll and James M.

WILLIAM LEE TYLER, M. D. During a period of seventeen years William Lee Tyler, M. D., has been engaged in a general medical practice at Curdsville, and in this time has gained a substantial reputation for professional skill and constructive citizenship. His entire life has been passed in Daviess County, where he was born on his father's farm June 10, 1875, a son of Reuben Ballard and Mary (Yeager) Tyler. This family, originating in the Old Dominion state, has furnished many prominent men to various professions, to business, agriculture and the arts, and to military and civil affairs.

Reuben B. Tyler, the paternal grandfather of Doctor Tyler, was born in Virginia, and in that state became a prominent planter as well as the proprietor of the old Franklin Hotel in the City of Richmond. A stalwart supporter of the Southern Confederacy, his fortunes were swept away with the downfall of the "Lost Cause." Reuben Ballard Tyler, father of Doctor Tyler, was born at Richmond, Virginia, in 1852, and when still a young man migrated to Kentucky and located in Daviess County, where he met and married Mary Yeager, who was born in 1853 at Maxonville, Kentucky, a daughter of Elisha G. Yeager, an early settler of Daviess County from Oldham County, Kentucky, his birthplace, his people having come originally from Virginia. The wife of Elisha G. Yeager was Susan Convers, who was related on her mother's side of the family to the well-known and prominent Speers of Virginia.

One of a family of four children, Dr. William Lee Tyler was reared on the home farm in Daviess County and received his early education in the rural schools. Later he was sent to receive private instruction at Masonville, following which he taught for seven years in the country schools, in the meantime studying medicine. He completed his medical studies at Central University, from which institution he was graduated with his degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1904, and at once entered upon the practice of his calling at Curdsville, which has since been the place of his residence and the scene of his success. Doctor Tyler has built up a large practice at Curdsville and in the surrounding country, and is held in the highest confidence by those who have become familiar with his professional skill and personal excellencies. He is admirably fitted for the profession of which he is a devotee, having a genuine liking for his calling and being an ardent student thereof, also possessing kindness of heart and a gentleness that makes his presence a welcome one in the sick room. He is a valued and active member of the Daviess County Medical Society, the Kentucky State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. During the World war he tendered his services to the Government and was placed on the reserve list of the United States Army Medical Corps, and acted as a member of the National Council of Defense of Daviess County. His religious faith is that of the Baptist Church. In politics a democrat, he has not sought office but has performed a good citizen's duty in all movements which have had for their object the betterment and advancement of his community.

Doctor Tyler was married in 1906 to Miss Laura McCain, daughter of Henry H. McCain, of Curdsville, a veteran of the Civil war. To this union there has been born one son, William Lee, Jr.

RICHARD PERRY ROWE. Life presented a busy and strenuous program to Richard Perry Rowe, and he has accepted the opportunities and adventures therein with commendable good spirit, has carried on a good fight against heavy odds at times, and has made a name for himself as a successful lawyer, farmer and business man.

Mr. Rowe, whose home is in Daviess County, was born in Ohio County, Kentucky, March 16, 1854, and represents an old Kentucky and Virginia family. His earliest ancestor of whom there is accurate record was George Rowe, a native of Virginia and of Irish lineage. The next, also named George Rowe, was born in Culpeper County, Virginia, and came to Kentucky more than a century ago, settling in Ohio County in 1806. He married Mary Brown. Their son, Robert Rowe, married Nancy Ross, who were the parents of John Plain Rowe, and grandfather of Richard Perry Rowe.

John Plain Rowe was born in Ohio County in 1830 and died in Daviess County in 1917, at the advanced age of eighty-seven. He spent his active years as a farmer, and during the period of the Civil war was a Union soldier. John Plain Rowe married Rebecca Ursula Igleheart, a native of Ohio County and daughter of Jacob Henderson Iglehart, who was of Holland Dutch ancestry. The children born to their marriage were Richard Perry, James Albert, Jacob, Edwin and Robert, twins, the last dying in infancy.

Richard Perry Rowe grew up on his father's farm in Ohio County, attended country schools, and for one year was a student in Bethel College at Russellville. He also taught school and later gave his very constructive influence to local educational affairs in the office of school commissioner or superintendent of Ohio County schools. Besides the value of his record in office he earned the distinction of being the first republican to hold a county office in that county. He also served seven years as postmaster of Hartford, following which he was a merchant at Hartford, this portion of his business career being attended with indifferent success. Following that he entered the timber business, acting as a broker and buying and selling timber in the valleys of the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers. Part of the time he lived at Paducah. He then located on a farm at Island in McLean County, moved to Owensboro in 1915, and in 1916 came to his present country home south of Owensboro.

During his early years Mr. Rowe gave serious attention to the study of law. Later on, when business reverses occurred, he was prompted to take up the law as a profession and in 1889 was admitted to the bar at Paris, Tennessee, and still later was licensed to practice in the courts of Kentucky. It was a profession in which his knowledge and broad experience gave him a place of special advantage, and he retired from practice only as a result of paralysis of the muscles of the throat, followed by impairment of speech.

Mr. Rowe has always been a staunch republican and while in Ohio County was active in his party, serving as chairman of the County Central Committee six years. Under his leadership Ohio County for the first time after the Civil war gave a republican majority. He is a Baptist, and has always strongly allied himself with the best interests of the community in which he has lived.

The deepest sorrow of his life assailed him at his country home south of Owensboro on August 29, 1919, when his wife and the companion of his youth and mature years passed away. October 11, 1876, forty-three years before her death, he married Miss Lillian May Karnes. She was born and reared near Island in McLean County. Mr. and Mrs. Rowe had three children, Ernest Perry, Eric Judson, and one son, John Mason Rowe, who died at the age of twelve years. Ernest P. Rowe is now a prominent young attorney at the Owensboro bar. The younger son is actively associated with his father on the farm, and also earned a patriotic record in the United States Navy from December, 1917, until October, 1919.

ERNEST PERRY ROWE. Admitted to the bar six years ago, Ernest Perry Rowe has fully justified the confidence and anticipations of his friends as to a successful career in his chosen profession. He is one of the able members of the Owensboro bar.

He was born near Mayfield, Kentucky, January 4, 1890, son of Richard Perry and Lillian May (Karnes) Rowe. His father is a widely known citizen of Western Kentucky, and the account of his life is published in the preceding sketch. The son was reared in McLean County and moved to Owensboro, in January, 1915. He had a public school education, also attended Bethel College at Russellville and took up the study of law under his father, finishing his course in the University of Kentucky. He was admitted to the bar in April, 1914, and began practice with his father at Owensboro. For a man of his years and experience he has an exceptionally large clientele. In February, 1921, he formed a law partnership with Wilbur K. Miller, under the firm name of Miller & Rowe.

In politics he is a republican, and was secretary of the Daviess County Central Committee in 1920. He is a Baptist and a Royal Arch and Knight Templar Mason.

Mr. Rowe married Miss Eva Mary Eaton in 1911. She was born and reared in McLean County, daughter of John A. and Louella V. (Brown) Eaton. Mr. and Mrs. Rowe are very proud of their three children, named John Richard, Dorothy Lou and Eva Lillian Rowe.

MILTON HANNIBAL SMITH was one of the last survivors of that group of railway executives who built and operated the American transportation system whose efficiency was unrivaled in the half century following the Civil war. Nearly all the railway presidents whose names had a real personal significance during the last half of the last century has passed away, and death also called Milton Hannibal Smith February 22, 1921, after he had been in the service more than sixty years. For much the greater part of this time his work was with the Louisville & Nashville Railway, and as such his career has a peculiar interest to Kentuckians.

Milton Hannibal Smith was a son of Irulus and Almira (Blakeslee) Smith and was born September 12, 1836, in Windham Township, Greene County, New York. In January, 1838, he was taken to Sherman Township, Chautauqua County, New York, where he received his first schooling, and in October, 1850, at the age of fourteen, the family moved to Shaumburg Township, Cook County, Illinois.

The late Mr. Smith came south in 1858, and was in Tennessee and Mississippi until January, 1860, when he entered the employ of the Southwestern Telegraph Company as an operator at Oxford, Mississippi. In October of that year he was sent to Jackson, Tennessee, as assistant agent of the Mississippi Central Railroad and operator for the Southwestern Telegraph Company. In June, 1861, he was transferred to the superintendent's office of the Mississippi Central Railroad at Holly Springs, Mississippi, as telegraph operator and chief clerk. From September, 1863, until after the close of the war he was with the United States Military Railroads, at first in charge of transportation at Stevenson, Alabama, and subsequently performing duties at Chattanooga, during the Atlanta campaign, at Huntsville, Knoxville and Atlanta until September, 1865.

Coming to Louisville in the fall of 1865, Mr. Smith entered the employ of the Adams Express Company. In June of the following year he was sent to Alabama as division superintendent of the Alabama & Tennessee River Railroad. In August of the same year he returned to Louisville as local agent of the Louisville & Nashville, and was made general freight agent of that company in June, 1869, continuing to serve in that capacity nearly ten years.

Leaving Louisville in October, 1878, Mr. Smith went to the general offices of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company at Baltimore, where he was subsequently made general freight agent, a position he held until October 1, 1881. He was then employed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company as general agent at New York, but on the first of January, 1882, resigned to return to Louisville and accept the post of third vice president and traffic manager of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. In July of that year he was promoted to first vice president, was also general manager during 1883-84, and from July 11, 1884, to October 6, 1886, was president of the company. From October 6, 1886, to March 9, 1891, he was again vice president of the Louisville & Nashville, and on March 9, 1891, he began his long service as president, an office he held continuously for nearly thirty years, until his death.

Milton H. Smith married for his second wife Annette M. Jones, of Frankfort, Kentucky, who survives her husband, and is the mother of the following children: Milton, Sidney and Eva Lee. By his first marriage with Eva Jones Mr. Smith had one child, Nettie Belle.

JAMES R. HOWELL. The Howells are one of the numerous families of LaRue County. The outstanding feature of the family as regards their impress on the business of the community has been through the industry of grain milling. For nearly a century wheat and corn and other grains have been manufactured into foodstuffs in mills operated by the Howells. This has been one of the most dignified and important occupations since man became civilized, and it is a distinctive tribute to the Howells that men of that name have followed the milling vocation in LaRue County through several successive generations.

In 1829 Jimmie Howell bought a mill from George

J. E. Madden

Cypese located on Otter Creek. That was a typical old-time mill and employed the hand bolting process, while the grain was ground between old-fashioned mill stones. A son of Jimmie Howell was Joseph Howell, also one of the early day millers of LaRue County, operating a mill on Otter Creek. His son, James Mace Howell, was born in LaRue County April 7, 1849, and is one of the fine old-school type of Kentucky gentlemen. During his active life he has been a miller, merchant and farmer. He married Martha J. Bruingfield, and both are still living, members of the Baptist Church and democrats in politics. They were the parents of the following children: Cattie, deceased; Joseph, former sheriff of LaRue County; John, deceased; Maggie, Ellen, James R., Nora, Hattie, Stella, and Fred.

James R. Howell was born on a farm in LaRue County December 7, 1879, grew up in the country, acquired a good education, and his early life was spent in the practice of farming. For a number of years he has been identified with the milling industry, and is now interested in a hundred barrel per day capacity mill known as the Hodgenville Roller Mill, whose output of high grade flour commands a large sale throughout LaRue and surrounding counties.

Mr. Howell has also been active in politics. In 1911 he was sent to represent LaRue County in the Legislature, and from 1914 to 1919 was chief field deputy for the Western District of Kentucky under the United States marshal. During that time he made more than 1,200 arrests. He is a democrat, a member of the Masonic Order and the Knight Templar Commandery at Lebanon. Mr. Howell married Miss Mattie Johnson.

JOHN E. MADDEN. "There are intervals when the studios and the grave must suspend their inquiries and descend from the regions of science; and to excel in those innocent amusements which require our activity is often one of the best preservatives of health and no inconsiderable guard against immoral relaxation."—Rev. W. B. Daniel.

One of the most conspicuous figures in the present-day history of the Blue Grass State is John E. Madden, a man who has been so actively and successfully identified with the thoroughbred stock breeding and stock raising interests that he has acquired an international reputation. Equally noted as a citizen whose useful career has conferred credit upon the community and whose marked abilities and sterling qualities have won for him the repute which he enjoys, he holds today distinctive precedence as one of the ablest and most successful breeders of thoroughbreds in America. Strong mental endowment, invincible courage, and a determined will, coupled with an honesty of purpose that has hesitated at no opposition, have so entered into his composition as to render him a dominant factor in the business circles with which he has been identified. He is essentially a man of affairs, sound of judgment and far-seeing in what he undertakes, his business enterprises having resulted in large financial returns, while at the same time he has ever retained the confidence and esteem of all classes.

John E. Madden was born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and is descended from sterling old Irish stock, through which he inherited that mental and bodily alertness so characteristic of the Celtic race. Physically, he has from boyhood been noted for his activity, for in his youth he was famous as an athlete and has carried into his mature life the vigor, endurance, and resiliency of youth. Mr. Madden became deeply interested in racing horses and in 1889 he came to Lexington, Kentucky, in search of a good trotter. He was not only successful in finding what he was looking for but he also found a land with which he at once fell in love, and he decided to make his home here. He bought a large tract of blue grass land and a stable of trotters, out of which he developed a number of champions, and he soon became known as one of the leading horsemen of America. After giving his attention to the Grand Circuit for several years, with most gratifying results, Mr. Madden next turned his attention to the thoroughbreds. Here, too, he met with wonderful success, many of the greatest horses on the turf being bred, owned, and trained by him. "Hamburg," which he sold to Marcus Daly for $40,000, the record price at that time, was bought and trained by Mr. Madden and his earlier turf triumphs were won under the Madden colors. Mr. Madden has often said that he "would rather train a good horse than be President of the United States." He owned "Plaudit," winner of the Kentucky Derby, "Imp," a great mare, "Ogden," the Futurity winner and now in the stud at Hamburg Place, and "Yankee," another Futurity winner. Mr. Madden bred "The Finn," a great race horse and a successful sire; "Sir Martin," who swept the two-year-old platter clean and who would have won the English Derby but for an accident, being the only American horse ever a favorite for that classic race; "Sir Barton," brother of "Sir Martin," the 1919 winner of the Kentucky Derby, by many called the horse of the century; "Purchase," one of the leading three-year-olds of 1919; "Old Rosebud," a turf phenomenon, winner of the Kentucky Derby and many other stakes. He owned "Star Shoot," the premier stallion of America, who led the winning sires for four years in succession. "Grey Lag," who is referred to as the three-year-old of 1921, was bred by him, and sold for $10,000 when one year old. Indeed, to narrate Mr. Madden's triumphs in detail would be to write the turf history of this country for the past twenty-five years.

Mr. Madden is now the owner of 4,000 acres of blue grass land in Fayette County, Kentucky, 2,500 of it being embraced in Hamburg Place, one of the largest breeding establishments in the United States. In the columns of the "Thoroughbred Record" of April 10, 1920, appeared the following interview with Mr. Madden, from which liberal quotations are made at this time as giving the views of the foremost American breeder on a subject of supreme importance:

"Mr. Madden was asked, 'What quality does the English thoroughbred possess which is lacking in our own race horse?' Mr. Madden said: 'I would not put it that way. Our best do not lack either speed, courage, or stamina as compared with the English thoroughbred, but in general the English have found the secret of intelligent, scientific mating which has not been completely revealed to the American breeder. I am led to these conclusions by my own experiences as a breeder and the records of the winning sires of two great classics, the Kentucky Derby and the Futurity. . . . No one of the the forty-five Kentucky Derby winners, with the notable exception of "Halma," sire of "Alan-a-Dale," ever sired a Derby winner, although all of them had their breeding opportunity. No winner of the Futurity, the largest fixed event of this country, has as yet sired a winner of this race.* This does not reflect on the quality of our thoroughbreds, but it places the responsibility for this failure where it belongs,—at the doors of the breeders who, having once bred Derby and Futurity winners, have mated them so unwisely that they have not been able to reproduce their kind. . . . Too many raise horses, too few breed them. There is nothing so discouraging as a well-bred failure. I can give you several forceful illustrations. In 1900 I purchased in England "Sandringham," brother to those two good horses, "Persimmon" and "Diamond Jubilee," both Derby winners. I then foolishly put price before merit. Another instance: I bought "The Scribe," son of the English Derby winner, "Isinglass," out of the Oaks and St. Leger winner, "Memoir," by "St. Si-

* (Since the above interview was given "Bunting" won the Futurity, duplicating the triumph of his sire, "Pennant.")

mon." Again I was tempted by pedigree and lost sight of merit. I had the same sad experience with "Planudes." I bought the horse because he was a son of the great "St. Simon," and whose dam was the Oaks winner, "Lonely."

"My mistake was in not having purchased a horse like "Rock Sand" or "Meddler," or more stallions like "Star Shoot" and "Friar Rock;" then I would have done something worth while."

"How do you propose to bring about the desired result?"

"Oh, that's simple," said Mr. Madden. "We have a better climate, better grass, and more acreage than England, and there is no reason why, with the proper attention to the mating of race horses, we should not breed thoroughbreds the equal of the best produced in England."

Mr. Madden has two sons, Joseph M., aged twenty-one, and J. Edward, Jr. They are both graduates of Princeton University and, running true to type, have inherited their father's love for athletics and have won high recognition in inter-collegiate competition. Both of them were soldiers in the World war. Captain J. Edward Madden was in France with the American Expeditionary Forces, and in the inter-Allied athletic meet held in the Pershing Stadium in Paris won several medals. Both sons are now engaged in oil productions in the fields of Texas and Oklahoma, but retain a keen interest in the breeding of trotters and thoroughbreds at Hamburg Place.

HAL PRICE HEADLEY is a son of Hal Pettit Headley, and their names are considered almost interchangeable with respect to their prominent associations with the great thoroughbred industry of Blue Grass Kentucky. Both have been identified with the ownership and management of the famous Beaumont Farm at Lexington. This farm and stables have originated and have been the breeding center for some of the greatest examples of horse flesh in the world. Hal Price Headley besides giving his attention for many years to the activities and industry of Beaumont Farm and the livestock interest is also president and principal owner of the Headley Tobacco Warehouse Company and is one of Kentucky's largest tobacco growers. He is also a director of the Phoenix and Third National Bank of Lexington.

He was born on part of his present farm December 19, 1888. The career of his father is sketched on other pages. He was educated in the Virginia Military Institute and graduated from Princeton University in 1910, and since then has been in the full tide of his business activities. As a tobacco man Mr. Headley had 440 acres in crop for the season of 1919, and an acreage of 400 acres in 1920. The Headley Tobacco Warehouse was erected in 1919, and has been a big factor in handling the great tobacco crop of Kentucky, and has set some important records both as to quantity handled and prices paid to producers.

The Beaumont Farm, two miles from Lexington, on the Harrodsburg Pike, contains some 1,600 acres of the finest blue grass land. Two other farms of 800 acres are used in connection, chiefly for breeding of cattle. Beaumont has long been a noted center for horse breeding. Some of the famous sires have been kept in the Beaumont stables. Among them was Ultimus, who cost $26,000 and was the sire of Step Lightly, the futurity winner of 1920. The Headleys paid $38,000 for Uncle, sire of Old Rosebud, a Derby record winner. They recently imported from England Brown Prince, bought for $50,000 and now one of the most noted stallions in Kentucky. Beaumont Farm is known wherever lovers of thoroughbreds are found, and its products have contributed some of the most featured horses to the sport of kings.

During the World war Hal P. Headley rendered invaluable service to the Government in the remount department, and was active in various other drives. He has never been tempted by offers of political office, but has found other ways to make his interests and his energies count for the general good.

The Headley home, a mile and a half from Lexington, on the Harrodsburg Pike, is one of the most attractive country places, and has been the center of much social life. Hal P. Headley married Miss Martha Withers, daughter of W. T. Withers, Jr. They have three children, Martha, Alma and Adele.

WILLIE DUNCAN WILLIAMS, one of the enterprising farmers of Daviess County, who has been very successful in his operations, is a native of this county, born May 18, 1879, a son of John James and Fetura (McKinney) Williams. The birth of John James Williams took place near Philpot, Daviess County, Kentucky, January 16, 1849, and he is a son of John Duncan and Elizabeth (Jones) Williams, and grandson of Raleigh Williams. Fetura (McKinney) Williams was a daughter of James McKinney. John James Williams has always lived in Daviess County, where he has been occupied with agricultural pursuits to a profitable extent. He and his wife became the parents of the following children: Nannie May, who died at the age of thirty-one years; Willie Duncan, who was second in order of birth; and Edward Marvin. The first Mrs. Williams died when she was forty-five years of age, and some time subsequently John James Williams was married to Ella Bristow, but there have been no children of this marriage. Mr. Williams has always been a good citizen, active in supporting public-spirited movements in this section, and also in the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is a consistent member.

Willie Duncan Williams was reared on his father's farm and under his instruction learned farming in all of its details. For seven years he put his practical knowledge of farming at the disposition of his county, and efficiency conducted the Daviess County poor farm. In 1917 he bought the P. J. Miller, Sr., homestead on the Litchfield Road, and the old residence, a large and substantial brick building, has been repaired and remodeled into one of the finest residences of this part of the county. The farm comprises 180 acres of valuable land, and on it Mr. Williams is carrying on general farming and stockraising, his long experience aiding him in organizing his work in a highly efficient manner.

In 1903 he was united in marriage with Miss Eula Hickman, a daughter of C. S. Hickman, of Daviess County. Mr. and Mrs. Williams have two children: Clyde M. and Guy Hickman. Mr. Williams belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church. In politics he is a democrat, while his fraternal affiliations are with the Masons. Both he and his wife are held in high regard throughout the county, and their pleasant home is a gathering place upon numerous occasions, at which times a delightful southern hospitality is dispensed by the genial host and hostess.

LEWIS EDGAR YEWELL has lived a busy career as a farmer, farm owner, business man, legislator and public spirited citizen in Daviess County, and is one of the best known men of the Owensboro locality.

He was born in this county May 1, 1860, son of James Marion and Mary Elizabeth (Conyers) Yewell. The Yewells have been a prominent family in Daviess County for eighty years. James M. Yewell was born in Oldham County, Kentucky, March 4, 1827, son of Jeremiah and Dicey Ellinder (Wilhoit) Yewell. Jeremiah Yewell was born in Virginia July 27, 1782, of Colonial and Revolutionary stock. It is the family tradition that three brothers came from England at a very early date in American colonization, and from there have descended all the Yewells found in this country. Jeremiah Yewell's first wife was a Miss Pope, who was the mother of Albert G., Alan P., Sally, Minerva, Ruth Ann and Benjamin P. His second wife, Dicey Ellinder Wilhoit, became the mother of four children, John, Algernon S., James M. and Franklin. When Jeremiah Yewell came out of Virginia he first settled in Oldham County, and while living there conducted a large farm and was also one of the first to operate a whisky distillery in the state. He prospered, and his surplus was wisely invested in additional lands. He was also an extensive slave holder. About 1841 he brought his family and personal goods to Daviess County by flatboat, while his slaves drove the livestock overland. In Daviess County he bought a large tract of land and located a home farm on the Hartford Road, southeast of Owensboro. Here he lived out the rest of his life until his death in 1862. He was well educated, seldom required the services of a lawyer to draft his legal documents, was a man of strong convictions and great courage, and exemplified many of the best traditions of the old Virginia gentleman. He did not easily give up some of the interesting customs of old plantation life. One of these customs always maintained on the plantation was the building of the fire on the hearthstone every day even in summer, a little ceremony attended to by one of his slaves. Jeremiah Yewell in early life gave no thought to religion. His son James M. Yewell as a boy made a confession of religion and became a charter member of the First Baptist Church of Owensboro. His influence led many others into the church, including his own father, who late in life embraced religion, and it was Jeremiah Yewell, with two or three other men in the locality, who financed and built the Zion Baptist Church, located on the old Yewell farm. When that church was completed the son James M. withdrew from the church at Owensboro and united with the Zion Church.

James Marion Yewell was fourteen years of age when the family came to Daviess County. He grew up in this section of the state, and lived a long and useful life as a farmer and was universally respected by all who knew him. He died February 13, 1911, in his eighty-fourth year, being the last survivor of his brothers and sisters. His first wife was Mary Elizabeth Conyers, who became the mother of Virenda, Dicey Ellinder, Mattie Belle and Lewis Edgar. His second wife was Sarah Ann Lashbrook, whose three children were named Effie Rebecca, Monovia R. and Roy Marion. James M. Yewell in early manhood was affiliated with the Masonic fraternity, was a stanch democrat in politics, and universally known as a man of honesty, fidelity and noble purpose, his word being regarded as good as his bond, and to his children he left the rich heritage of a good name and untarnished character.

Lewis Edgar Yewell grew up on his father's farm, was educated in local schools, and attended West Kentucky College in South Carrollton. For thirty years he has lived on his present farm on Leitchfield Road, less than two miles from Owensboro. Here he built a residence, planted trees and developed a beautiful estate. Up to the time of his marriage his life was spent at the old home. He married Mary Belle Daly in 1882. Her father was Dr. Frank Daly, of Daviess County. Mr. and Mrs. Yewell have a son and a daughter. The daughter, Mary Blanche, is the wife of J. D. Martin, of Owensboro. The son, Arthur Daly Yewell lives with his father on the farm. He married Miss Nell Parish. Lewis Edgar Yewell had the misfortune to lose his good wife by death on July 29, 1918. She had been the soul of the home and had lived out her life as a member of the Christian Church, in which Mr. Yewell is also an active member. He has always been a democrat and was elected a member of the Legislature in 1915, serving one regular term and a special session. He gave a good account of himself at Frankfort, and throughout his home county is known as a man of sterling character, with an influence ever cast in the direction of progress and community upbuilding.

E. L. HUTCHINSON has been a resident of Lexington forty years. The greater part of that time he has practiced law, but has also been connected with banking and other interests, and has long been prominent in the social life of the city.

Mr. Hutchinson was born at Charleston, South Carolina, and his father, Mathias Edward, and his grandfather, Edward L. Hutchinson, were both members of the South Carolina bar. His grandfather also had an extensive plantation. Mathias E. Hutchinson married Louisa Ingraham Bonneau, of French Huguenot ancestry. She was a niece of Commodore Nathaniel Duncan Ingraham, who served his apprenticeship under Paul Jones and was hero of the "Costa" affair, for which Congress granted him a sword and a gold medal. Her family was also connected with that of Henry Laurens, president of the First Continental Congress, and with John Laurens, who was an aide on Washington's staff.

E. L. Hutchinson graduated from Union College at Schenectady, New York, in 1879. The next year he came to Lexington as private tutor in the family of Alexander Jeffrey. He read law with Judge Beck and R. A. Thornton, and in 1884 was admitted to the bar. Two years later he was chosen city attorney and served two terms. He then became president of the City Council, and later served as a member of the Board of Aldermen. He was connected with the city government at an important time in municipal affairs at Lexington, when the city was beginning its paving program and providing for the installation of waterworks. Mr. Hutchinson was elected in 1907 president of the Lexington Bank and Trust Company, taking charge of that institution at a very difficult financial period, and guiding it through the five years following until it was merged with the Phoenix and Third National Bank. Mr. Hutchinson ranks high as a lawyer and has given his talents to a general practice.

He was the promoter and president of the first Country Club, one of the leading social organizations of Lexington. He also organized and was president of the Lafayette Social Club, which later merged with the Lexington Club. He was the first president of the Lexington Union Club, established twenty-five years ago, and was also identified with the Iroquois Riding Club. Mr. Hutchinson is a dog fancier, and every year goes out to some territory for big game. He has been a sound money man since 1896 and a member of Christ Church Cathedral of the Episcopal denomination.

Mr. Hutchinson married Miss Jessie Leigh, of Little Rock, Arkansas. Mrs. Hutchinson has been prominent in civic work, the Associated Charities, the Woman's Club, and was active in many of the movements in which the late Mrs. Desha Breckinridge was prominent.

L. WILSON FIELDS is a lawyer by profession, for many years has been associated in practice with his father, D. D. Fields, but their profession has involved them very intimately with the coal and mineral development of Eastern Kentucky. It is doubtful if any individual lawyer in the state has handled more important cases involving titles and patents to mineral lands than D. D. Fields.

L. Wilson Fields, whose home for the past two years has been in the City of Lexington, is in the seventh generation of the American branch of the family. His grandfather, Isaac N. Fields, was a native of Culpeper County, Virginia. He was a teacher by profession and one of the leading apostles of general education in Eastern Kentucky. He had hunted in Kentucky in 1800, and in 1802 he brought his family to Letcher County. He married in Virginia Alcy Day, and they had one child when they moved to Kentucky. Isaac Fields taught a private school in Letcher County, and more than a century ago was a stanch advocate of compulsory education and did a great deal of valuable work in training public sentiment in that direction. He died at the age of eighty-eight, while his widow survived him to the age of ninety-four. They were of the hardy pioneer stock, and all of their thirteen children grew to maturity, and there was not a death in the family circle until 1903. One son, L. W. Fields, moved to Missouri, where he served as county judge and as a member of the State Legislature. The oldest of the children, Sally Day is still living in Letcher County, at the age of ninety-seven, and is still able to ride horseback.

D. D. Fields is the youngest of this family and at the age of sixty-seven resides at Whitesburg, Kentucky. In early life he taught school, studied law and was admitted to the bar, and in 1888 served as sheriff of his county. He works as hard now as at any time in his early career. He is well known for his prominence in civil cases and especially in land titles. D. D. Fields married Ritter Musslewhite, who died in 1914. All of their three sons and three daughters are still living.

The second of the children is L. Wilson Fields, who was born in Letcher County April 19, 1877, his birthplace being a farm, though he was reared in the county seat. He attended common schools, the Holbrook Normal at Knoxville, Tennessee, and several years of teaching on his part makes it possible to say that three generations of the Fields family have been identified with educational work in Eastern Kentucky. He graduated in law from Center College at Danville in 1897, but had been admitted to the bar when he was only eighteen, being the youngest man ever licensed to practice in Kentucky. He at once joined his father in the firm of D. D. Fields & Son, and his work has largely been in the same kind of practice as that in which his father has achieved a state wide reputation. D. D. Fields has for forty-eight years represented the Mineral Development Company and has passed on every title to land purchased by this corporation, which owns over 80,000 acres of coal lands. These titles have presented many complicated questions. Among cases that have been of more than local prominence were those of the Mineral Development Company vs. the Kentucky Coal Lands Company, involving a 12,000-acre land patent; also Scott vs. Kirby, these being outstanding land cases of Eastern Kentucky. The latter involved title to 34,800 acres, and after going through the state courts was carried to the United States Supreme Court. In the first case the United States Supreme Court reversed the decision of the State Court, and the litigation was fought for twenty years. D. D. Fields has appeared as attorney for all the state courts and many of the federal courts.

Both father and son have been prominent in republican politics in Eastern Kentucky, attending conventions and doing campaign work, and for years some member of the family has been identified with public office in Letcher County.

L. Wilson Fields organized the Caudill Coal Company in 1916, and is its vice president. The president of the company resides in another state, and the chief responsibility of handling the business devolves upon Mr. Fields. The company has a 500-acre tract of Elkhorn coal on Sand Lick Creek, and this has been developed by the building of railroad facilities and the Village of Caudill, and the plant now has a ten-car daily output. Mr. Fields is also agent of the Letcher County Coal Corporation and is manager of this holding company. He was purchasing agent of the Swift Coal and Timber Company, and under his supervision about 40,000 acres of coal lands were acquired.

In September, 1902, Mr. Fields married Miss Belle Salyer, who was born in Wise County, Virginia, but in childhood was brought to Perry County, Kentucky. She is a daughter of Drury Wallace and Hester (Bruce) Salyer. Her father was a prominent merchant and lumberman, operating largely in Knott County, Kentucky, and is now living at Marshall, Arkansas. Mrs. Fields' grandmother was Mattie Culbertson, daughter of Charles Kilgore, who was a Revolutionary soldier, was wounded at the battle of Kings Mountain and received a large land grant for his service. Mr. and Mrs. Fields have four children: Louise, Leroy W., Wallace and Lovette. Mr. Fields was for six years worshipful master of Whitesburg Lodge No. 754, Free and Accepted Masons, has sat in the Grand Lodge, was for four years high priest of Whitesburg Chapter No. 149, Royal Arch Masons, and has also been active in the Eastern Star. His vacation seasons are usually spent in hunting.

C. W. BOHMER, of Lexington, who has the distinction of having opened and established the first loose leaf tobacco warehouse in Kentucky, is a past master by experience and study in every phase of tobacco marketing, and his experiences and achievements form an important chapter in the history of the Kentucky tobacco industry.

Mr. Bohmer was born at Richmond, Virginia. His father, a native of Germany, came to the United States just before the Civil war and joined the Confederate Army, being a colonel under General Lee. He was extensively identified with the export of tobacco from American states. He finally returned to his old home in Germany and erected a residence, which he called in reminiscence of his American residence Villa Virginia, at Wiesbaden. He lived there until his death in 1912.

C. W. Bohmer was sent to Germany to complete his education, and finished it in a gymnasium or college at Lippe-Deimold. At the age of twenty-one he began his career in the tobacco trade. At that time the American tobacco business was on a strictly competitive and independent footing. There were numerous small manufacturers, perhaps the largest being T. C. Williams of Richmond, Virginia. An output of 2,000,000 pounds in a year was considered phenomenal. Tobacco was purchased on the exchanges at Richmond, sales being based upon samples. The first loose leaf market in that state was at Lynchburg. C. W. Bohmer operated at Lynchburg as an exporter of tobacco.

One of the fundamental principles he has lived to realize in practice was the necessity of bringing the market close to the grower. Many years ago Mr. Bohmer came to recognize the possibilities of the White Burley sections of Kentucky and Tennessee, and in 1900 opened a warehouse at Clarksville, Tennessee. Impressed with the still greater possibilities of the Blue Grass section, in 1903 he removed to Lexington. There followed some extended and serious consultations with W. B. Hawkins, a prominent tobacco grower, who also realized a great need of a change in methods of marketing. At that time Kentucky growers were completely dependent upon the Louisville and Cincinnati markets. There was no loose leaf business, all the tobacco being cured and shipped to those two cities in hogsheads. Many of the evils familiar to livestock and produce growers through the operations of commission houses and the commission method of marketing applied to the tobacco growers at that time with exaggerated force. The central markets were so manipulated by the great tobacco manufacturers already gathered into practically a trust that no competition existed, and for several years the prevailing price was about six cents a pound. Moreover, annoying delays occurred before the owner could realize cash returns from his shipment, and tobacco farmers of Kentucky were rapidly being bankrupted. Mr. Hawkins wanted to establish a farmers' sales agency, but the advantages of a local loose leaf market were so obvious that in December, 1903, Mr. Bohmer began the organization of the Burley Loose Leaf Tobacco Company with a capital of $50,000. A building 150 by 250 feet, with capacity for 500,000 pounds, was erected on the site of the present Reynolds Company plant. On January 9, 1905, the first tobacco loose leaf sales were held. It was a great occasion and a great day in Lexington. A photograph of the scene shows both sides of the street lined with loaded wagons standing in line awaiting turn to unload, and so great was the crowd that police were required. The sales floors were crowded. During that first season 8,000,000 pounds were marketed in loose leaf and prices obtained made all growers happy. Soon afterward a redrying plant was put in operation by Mr. Bohmer, thus performing an important service in preparing the crop for shipment. During 1906 other warehouses rapidly sprung up and facilities were greatly amplified.

When some fifteen years ago Mr. Bohmer made the prediction that 50,000,000 pounds of tobacco could be sold on the Lexington market his ideas were ridiculed as extremely visionary. As a matter of fact in 1920 more than 62,000,000 pounds were sold in the Lexington market, and the average price of forty-eight cents a pound was of course beyond anything even dreamed of a few years previously.

Mr. Bohmer's pioneer enterprise and other efforts to place the primary market near the grower caused the utmost hostility on the part of the old dealers at Louisville and Cincinnati, who instructed their agents to resort to any tactics to block the move. However, it was a case of fighting against natural law, and the local markets soon possessed all the advantages. The Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Company was one of the first to adapt itself to changed conditions and bought several of the warehouses in Lexington, in fact owning all but two or three at one time. Almost coincident with Mr. Bohmer's efforts at establishing the loose leaf market came the organized efforts of the growers resulting in the pooling system and the "cutout" of portions of the crop, a situation subsequently featured by the night riding, barn burning, destruction of seed beds and almost conditions of civil war in Kentucky. In the meantime, however, the growers in the organizations had realized as high as eighteen cents a pound for their crop, as against the price of six cents which had been the maximum a few years before.

With the rapid development of the Lexington primary market came the urgent need for ample storage facilities. Mr. Bohmer, having sold his original warehouse to the Reynolds Company, then concentrated his attention upon providing storage facilities, and erected sheet iron buildings with special attention to fire protection. At the beginning he could store only a few thousand hogsheds, but has kept his building capacity increasing until now 30,000 hogsheds of the redried tobacco can be stored and kept until such times as manufacturers call for its shipment. Many tobacco men have followed Mr. Bohmer's entry into the Lexington tobacco market. He was instrumental in demonstrating the importance of the White Burley field to R. J. Reynolds of Winston-Salem, North Carolina, and that company is now one of the largest operating in the White Burley district. No phase connected with tobacco handling is unfamiliar to Mr. Bohmer. His uppermost thought for many years has been keeping the market most convenient to the grower. It can only be a source of great satisfaction to know that the idea he put into action with his first loose leaf warehouse at Lexington has borne fruit until now fifty-two Kentucky towns have their own local markets.

He was not only the first to open a loose leaf warehouse in Kentucky, but also operated the first redrying plant and the first fireproof tobacco storage plant in the state.

The Bohmer home on Versailles Pike is one of the pleasant country retreats near Lexington, and Mr. Bohmer has been very happy in his domestic relations and one of the popular men socially in the community. He married at Lexington Miss Laura Hall. Before her marriage she was in charge of the trust department of the Phoenix and Third National Bank. They have one son, Charles W. Bohmer, Jr. Mrs. Bohmer is a member of the Christian Church.

FRED P. DABOLT. When it is stated that Mr. Dabolt is president of the Bond State Bank and vice president of the Bond-Foley Lumber Company it becomes at once evident that he is numbered among the progressive and representative business men of Jackson County. He is a young man of vital energy and constructive enterprise, and he has made his influence definitely felt in connection with civic and business affairs in Jackson County, where the Bond-Foley Lumber Company is conducting vigorous and extensive operation on its valuable tract of 35,000 acres of virgin timber.

Mr. Dabolt was born in the city of Buffalo, New York, on the 6th of May, 1882. His father, Paul Dabolt, was born near that city in 1840, and his death occurred at North Collins, New York, in 1889, his entire life having been passed in the vicinity of Buffalo and he having been extensively engaged in agricultural and live-stock enterprise in that section of the old Empire state. He was a democrat in political allegiance and both he and his wife were communicants of the Lutheran Church. His parents, Martin and Lana Dabolt, were both born in Alsace-Lorraine, France, then a part of Germany, but they were both probably of French descent. The maiden name of Mrs. Dabolt was Lana Keller, she having been born near Buffalo in 1848, and her death having occurred at Springville, New York, in March, 1920. Of the children the eldest in John, a successful farmer and fruit-grower near Versailles, New York; George is established in the mercantile business at Cuba, that state; Mary is the wife of D. C. Babcock, a contractor and builder residing in the city of Detroit, Michigan; William is a farmer near Otto, New York; Louise died at the age of eighteen years; Fred P., of this sketch, was the next in order of birth and is the youngest of the children.

The public schools of Erie County, New York, were the medium through which Fred P. Dabolt gained his early education, and in 1900 he was graduated in the high school in the city of Buffalo. For eighteen months thereafter he held the position of bookkeeper in the offices of the Buffalo Spring & Gear Company, and the next two years found him similarly engaged with the Buffalo Hardwood Lumber Company at Buffalo. He was then transferred by the company to its office at Becton, Arkansas, in which locality the company was conducting extensive lumbering operations. From the position of bookkeeper Mr. Dabolt there rose, in 1905, to the office of general manager of the business, and of this post he continued the efficient incumbent about one year, or until the completion of the company's operations in that district. He was then transferred to the company's offices at Memphis, Tennessee, where he continued in charge of the office affairs until 1908. He then entered the employ of the Standard Furniture Company of Herkimer, New York, in the capacity of assistant manager of its lumbering operations at Foley, West Virginia, where he remained until the work in that district was completed, in 1911. He was then transferred to Catlettsburg, Kentucky, and assigned supervision of the company saw mills in that locality. He there continued his effective service until 1913, when the Standard Furniture Company acquired timber interests in the vicinity of Bond, Kentucky, and effected the organization of the Bond-Foley Lumber Company, as a subsidiary corporation. Mr. Dabolt came to the stage of operations in Jackson County, became a stockholder in the new corporation and was elected vice president, of which office he has since continued the incumbent. This company manufactures hardwood lumber from its extensive timber reserve in Jackson County, where it employs an average force of 300 men, with well equipped saw mills and planing mills, and with office headquarters on Main Street in the Village of Bond. The corporation maintains also a well ordered commissary department, as well as machine shops, and in its operations it utilizes twenty miles of logging railroad. In this last connection it was found imperative to construct a railroad from Bond to East Bernstadt, a distance of thirteen miles, and in carrying forward this enterprise a subsidiary corporation was formed, under the title of the Rockcastle River Railroad Company. Of this company Mr. Dabolt is vice president and general manager, besides which he is president of the Bond State Bank, in the organization of which he was instrumental, in September, 1917. His broad and varied experience has made Mr. Dabolt an authority in all phases of the lumber business and he has, as may readily be understood, an insatiable appetite for work, with the result that he may with all consistency be termed one of the vigorous and resourceful captains of industry in the Blue Grass state. He has identified himself loyally with the interests of the state of his adoption and is one of the alert and progressive citizens of Jackson County, where he has entrenched himself firmly in popular confidence and good will, even as he has here been a constructive force in civic and industrial advancement. His political support is given to the republican party, he holds membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and Mrs. Dabolt is a member of the Baptist Church, and he is affiliated with the lodge of Free and Accepted Masons in his home village of Bond. He took a characteristically active and loyal part in local activities in support of the Government policies and work in connection with the World war, was chairman of the Bond Chapter of the Red Cross, aided in the local drives in support of the Victory and Liberty loans, Savings Stamps, etc., and made his personal subscriptions as liberal as his means justified.

In the City of Memphis, Tennessee, in 1907, Mr. Dabolt wedded Miss Sarah E. Painter, who was born in the State of Pennsylvania and whose death occurred at Ashland, Kentucky, in 1911. She is survived by one son, Frederick P., who was born January 6, 1909. On the 27th of December, 1916, at London, Kentucky, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Dabolt to Miss Lucy Russell, daughter of J. M. and Martha (Scales) Russell, who now maintain their home at Seattle, Washington, Mr. Russell being a traveling salesman for a large wholesale shoe house. Mrs. Dabolt is the gracious and popular chataleine of the attractive family home at Bond, and is a leader in the social activities of the community.

JAMES C. STONE is joint owner with Mr. John L. Buckley of the Central and Planters Tobacco Warehouse Company of Lexington, one of the largest markets for leaf tobacco in the White Burley district. Mr. Stone is a veteran of the Kentucky tobacco market, and his present business is a direct outgrowth of and his experiences are intimately identified with the developments that give a remarkable interest to the history of the tobacco industry in Kentucky.

About the time Mr. Stone acquired his first experience in the tobacco business, some twenty-five or thirty years ago, the American tobacco manufacturers were making their first consolidations which led to the establishment of the old American Tobacco Company. This process of consolidation went on until about half of the manufacturers were represented. Another group comprised the old Continental Tobacco Company, and outside of these two large groups only a few independent manufacturers remained. The two large groups consolidated as the American and Continental Tobacco Company, and later the American Tobacco Company became what was known as the tobacco trust, and for several years bought between eighty-five and ninety per cent of all the Burley tobacco produced in the Burley belt of Kentucky. While there was nominal competition the fact remained that the buyers had won unvarying schedule of prices and that schedule was so low that growers were rapidly being reduced to a state of serfdom to the interests that dominated the business. The last large independent company to sell out to the trust was the Liggett & Meyers Company of St. Louis. In former years all tobacco was marketed at the great central markets of Cincinnati and Louisville in hogsheads, and there was no loose leaf business. The Liggett & Meyers Company had established what was known as a country leaf department, and this practice of buying loose leaf was continued by the American Tobacco Company. The oppressive conditions under which the growers suffered resulted in the organization of two great societies, one the American Society of Equity in the western or dark leaf section of Kentucky, and the other the Burley Tobacco Society of the Blue Grass section. A large part of the Kentucky tobacco crop was marketed through these organizations in "pools," and the Burley societies negotiated on practically equal terms with the tobacco trust from 1906 to 1908. Then in 1908 came the defection, partly due to legal attacks made on the Burley Tobacco Society, and also from a growing restiveness on the part of growers, culminating in the historic episode of Kentucky night riding, the story of which belongs more properly in the general history of Kentucky. It was noteworthy that the crops of 1906 and 1907, held in pools by the growers' organization, were sold at double the prices formerly paid by the American Tobacco Company.

When the American Tobacco Company discontinued buying operations there came about the third phase of tobacco marketing, when private owners started loose leaf houses, building immense warehouses capable of accommodating many millions of pounds of tobacco in the loose leaf. One of the pioneers in this phase of the business was Charles Bohmer of Richmond, Virginia. Largely under the auspices of the Burley Tobacco Company many warehouses were bought or built for marketing, drying, storing and handling the crop for the greatest possible profit to the growers. The Burley Company also entered the manufacturing field, buying the old Strader Tobacco Factory at Louisville, and continuing its operation until within recent years. In course of time the Burley Company was operating some seventeen warehouses, but finally began selling these warehouses, largely to individuals or syndicates directly representing the growers. There are now about fifty loose leaf markets and about a hundred warehouses, with 10,000 stockholders.

In 1911 the Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Company acquired at Lexington the Central Kentucky Tobacco Warehouse, and in a few years owned and operated seven warehouses in that field, this Lexington group being organized as the Lexington Tobacco Warehouse Company. James C. Stone became president of this company. He was formerly director and manager of the Ninth Street Warehouse at Louisville for the Louisville Warehouse Company, and came to Lexington to take charge of the business. For a time the Lexington Company owned all but one of the loose leaf establishments in the city. In September, 1918, the Lexington Warehouse Company was dissolved after five seasons of operation. During 1916-17 Mr. Stone had sold several of his warehouses, until by the spring of 1918 only two remained under the old corporation. These were the Central and the Planters, which are now owned by Mr. Stone and Mr. Buckley. These two houses in 1920 handled and sold over 10,000,000 pounds of tobacco, and in 1921, up to March 17th, the sales in the two houses amounted to over 6,000,000 pounds. Altogether there are twelve warehouse companies in Lexington, with eighteen warehouses, and in the season of buying three sets of buyers attend the sales, it taking seven days for all three groups of buyers to make the rounds of the warehouses. The floor space of the Central and Planters warehouses is such as to give a capacity for the marketing of a million pounds of tobacco each day. This company has a regular staff of employees numbering about twenty-four, including two auctioneers, besides the common laborers. It requires a capital of about $100,000 to handle the business, and the payroll runs between $1,000 and $1,200 per week.

James C. Stone was born at Richmond, Kentucky, January 3, 1878. His father, Samuel H. Stone, was born in Madison County, Kentucky, and in 1859 was taken to Leavenworth, Kansas, where his father, Gen. James C. Stone, was a banker. Samuel H. Stone subsequently returned to Kentucky, and in Madison County married Pattie Harris, a daughter of John D. Harris, member of one of the prominent old families of Madison County. John D. Harris at one time was a candidate for the nomination for governor of Kentucky. Samuel H. Stone was liberally educated, spending four years abroad, two years at Heidelberg and two years in Leipsic, Germany. After his marriage he devoted his time to farming. In 1896 he was elected state auditor, being the first republican honored with that office in Kentucky. He served in the office until 1900 and then engaged in the tobacco warehouse business at Louisville. In 1902 he sold his interests to the Louisville Warehouse Company, but continued as a director. He died at Louisville April 4, 1909, at the age of fifty-nine, and his widow is still living in Louisville.

James C. Stone entered the tobacco business in 1899 with his father, Samuel H. Stone, and older brother, William Harris Stone, who died in 1901. His only surviving brother is Samuel H., one of the prominent business men of Louisville.

Mr. Stone has many important financial and business interests at Lexington and elsewhere. He is a director in the Fayette National Bank, the Phoenix Hotel, the Kentucky Steel Products Company, is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner, and a stockholder in the Kentucky Jockey Club.

In 1913 he married Mrs. Carrie Ferguson Brown, of Louisville, granddaughter of Silas F. Miller, of Louisville. By her first marriage she has two children, John Mason Brown, a student in Harvard University, and Mary Miller Brown, a graduate of Bryn Mawr. Mr. and Mrs. Stone have one son, J. C., Jr.

E. B. SWEENEY was formerly in the wholesale grocery business but in 1914 acquired the plant of the Lexington Broom Works, an industry that had been established three years previously. Mr. Sweeney has made something more than a local industry of the manufacture of brooms at Lexington. The annual capacity of the plant is now 15,000 dozen brooms, and the most modern machinery and mechanical facilities have been installed for every process. One important branch of the factory is devoted to the making of mops, and this is one of the few factories equipped with mop making machinery. The output includes every type of broom from the lightest to the heaviest, and for all different purposes. A force of about fifteen men are employed in the business. The output is sold to the jobbing and wholesale trade, and three salesmen are on the road, covering the territory of Kentucky, West Virginia, Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama and Georgia, and also parts of North Carolina. During the past six years this business has quadrupled, and while Mr. Sweeney invested about $7,000 or $8,000 in the business in 1914, it now requires a capital of $35,000. Mr. Sweeney has given this his personal attention, and the success is due to his good judgment and phenomenal energy.

E. B. Sweeney was born in Casey County, Kentucky, March 10, 1868, son of George W. and Mildred J. (Bailey) Sweeney, and grandson of Job Sweeney, a pioneer settler of Casey County who moved from Madison County. The ancestors came from Virginia. Some first cousins of E. B. Sweeney were prominent ministers of the Christian Church, including Z. J. and George E. Sweeney of Columbus, Indiana. Mr. Sweeney's father served as sheriff of Casey County for twenty-four years, and his grandfather, Job Sweeney, was County Court clerk for a long period. E. B. Sweeney became deputy sheriff under his father, and extended his acquaintance until he knew every man in Casey County. He was himself a candidate on the democratic ticket for County Court clerk.

For ten years Mr. Sweeney was a traveling salesman for a Lexington wholesale grocery house, and in 1907 he and J. D. Shelby, a grandson of ex-Governor Isaac Shelby, established a wholesale grocery business at Junction City, Kentucky. After three years the business was sold to the Cumberland Grocery Company, but Mr. Sweeney retained stock in the new organization and was local manager three years. He then acquired a half interest with his brother-in-law, G. Z. Falconer, in the G. Z. Falconer Company, wholesale dealers in woodenware and paper at Lexington. This was his business until he acquired the broom factory.

Mr. Sweeney is also interested in the Barwick Coal Company at Barwick in Perry County, where the company has an output of six cars daily. He was one of the original stockholders in the Kentucky Steel Products Company, a flourishing and prominent industry of Lexington. Mr. Sweeney is a democrat, is a Knight Templar Mason, a member of the Woodmen of the World, belongs to the Lexington Board of Commerce and is an elder in the Central Christian Church. Though a native Kentuckian, he attended only one horse race. His favorite method of spending his vacations is fishing and hunting. Mr. Sweeney married Elizabeth Hood, of Garrard County, and they have two daughters, Mildred and Mary.

CLAUDE W. TRAPP, a graduate in medicine, has devoted practically all his professional career to his specialty as an oculist, and for over a quarter of a century has been the leading representative of that profession in Lexington.

Doctor Trapp was born in Lexington. His father, Joseph D. Trapp, came from Alsace, France, and is remembered as proprietor of a printing plant and a publisher of books and pamphlets at Lexington, a business he continued until his death, at the age of forty. Joseph D. Trapp married Hester Chinn, a daughter of the distinguished Dr. Joseph B. Chinn, a Lexington citizen whose record is briefly stated on other pages of this publication. The mother of Doctor Trapp was born and reared in Lexington, and died when past sixty years of age.

Claude W. Trapp received his literary education in Transylvania University and took his medical course in the University of Louisville with the class of 1891. For four years he was assistant to the noted Louisville oculist, Dr. William Pheatham, and then returned to Lexington and has been in active practice for twenty-six years. He is a member of all the medical societies and is oculist on the staff of both Lexington hospitals.

Doctor Trapp married Rebecca Allen Redd, a daughter of Oliver Redd. Several members of this prominent Kentucky family receive more particular attention in another article in this history. Mrs. Trapp died in 1919, the mother of three children. Catherine is the wife of Capt. Alden H. Waitt, of the Regular Army. Marie is Mrs. J. W. Brooks, of Fayette County. Francis J., who is a civil engineer at Lexington, married Hattie L. Wheeler. Doctor Trapp is a member of the Elks and Country Club and has always been fond of outdoor sports, his favorite diversions being tennis and golf.

RALEIGH DAVIESS BRYANT. Not only is farming the oldest occupation of man, but it is now recognized as the most important of the basic industries, and a number of the foremost men of the country are proud of the fact that their lives have been spent in agricultural activities, for they realize that in such they have been useful citizens. One of the men of Daviess County who is deserving of special mention in this connection is Raleigh Daviess Bryant, one of the prosperous farmers on the Leitchfield Road, not far from Owensboro.

He was born on his present property, known as the "Brookside Farm," three miles from Owensboro, November 26, 1858, a son of Samuel and Harriet (Phelon) Bryant. Samuel Bryant was born December 13, 1822, in Shelby County, Kentucky, a son of Raleigh D. Bryant, a native of Warsaw, North Wales, to which locality his father, Samuel Bryant, had moved from Ireland. The family came to the American Colonies in 1774, locating in Maryland, removal later being made to Shelby County, Kentucky, where Samuel Bryant died in 1858, at the extreme old age of ninety-six years. Raleigh D. Bryant, grandfather of Raleigh Daviess Bryant, his namesake, was the eldest son of Samuel Bryant, and was married while still living in Maryland to Ruth Griffith, a daughter of Caleb Griffith, a brother of Joshua Griffith, who was a pioneer of Daviess County, to which he moved in 1823, and lived here until his death in 1865, when seventy-six years of age. Upon coming to this county Raleigh D. Bryant settled near the Macedonia Church, about a mile from what is now the Oak Ridge station on the Illinois Central Railroad. Two sons were born to him, Caleb Griffith Bryant and Samuel Bryant, and one daughter, Jane, who married J. H. Williams and settled near the Pleasant Grove Church. Caleb Griffith Bryant died unmarried.

Samuel Bryant settled on the farm now occupied by his son in 1857, and that year was married to Harriet Phelon, a daughter of John M. and Rebecca (Holt) Phelon. Mrs. Bryant was born in Shelby County, Kentucky, but was brought when still a child by her parents to Daviess County, Kentucky. Her death occurred June 20, 1889, when she was sixty-four years old, her husband surviving her until June 20, 1898, when he too passed away.

Raleigh Daviess Bryant was the only son of his parents, and was reared on the farm where he was born. His parents gave him excellent educational advantages and he is a cultured man, thoroughly abreast of the times. From his youth he has devoted himself to farming, and his success as an agriculturalist has been marked.

On January 5, 1882, Mr. Bryant was united in marriage with Emma Taylor, who was born in Daviess County, Kentucky, March 13, 1859, a daughter of Jefferson and Louisa (Carlin) Taylor. Jefferson Taylor was born in Jefferson County, Kentucky, and was a cousin of Zachary Taylor, who became President of the United States in 1849. After coming to Daviess County, Jefferson Taylor operated a flour-mill on Panther Creek near Habit. Mr. and Mrs. Bryant became the parents of the following children: Hortense, who married Dr. J. A. Kirk, of Owensboro; Hugh M., who was engaged with his father in operating the homestead, died December 1, 1917, when he was thirty-two years of age; William E., who is engaged in an insurance business at Owensboro; Harriet Louise, who was one of the popular educators of Daviess County, is now in the office of the Kentucky State Board of Examiners at Frankfort, and is a lady of unusual attainments and mental development; Samuel J., who is on his father's farm; Ruth, who is a teacher in a commercial school, is also unusually intellectual; and James R., who is attending Purdue University, taking a course in mechanical engineering. Samuel J. Bryant is a veteran of the great war, having served as motor mechanic in the Three Hundred and Twenty-seventh Artillery, Eighty-first Division. He went overseas and served in France with his organization from August, 1918, until February, 1919, when he was returned to the United States and honorably discharged. Fortunately he came back in safety after having served his country as a brave and gallant soldier, and because of the fact that he risked his life for it, will hold his native land all the dearer the remainder of his life.

In his political faith Mr. Bryant is a republican, but has limited his public service to casting his vote for the candidates of his party. He and all of his family are members of the Baptist Church. In view of the poor quality of articles manufactured today, it is interesting to note that Mr. Bryant has in his possession a coat of Fuller's cloth which was made for his great-grandfather in Warsaw, Wales, 150 years ago, and brought by him to the American Colonies in 1774. This garment has been handed down to the eldest son in each generation, and is still in fairly good condition. Mr. Bryant also owns a razor hone which belonged to Samuel Bryant, and one which has been handed down in the Griffith family. These heirlooms are highly valued in the Bryant household because of family associations, but they are of interest to outsiders because of their quality and workmanship, both of which reflect rather discreditably upon modern production.

JAMES WILLIAM JOHNSON has been a well known figure in business, professional and public affairs at Henderson for a quarter of a century. He is a successful lawyer and a man who has achieved much from meager opportunities.

He was born on a farm in LaRue County, Kentucky, January 24, 1872, a son of Warner and Elizabeth (DeSpain) Johnson. His father was born in Taylor County, Kentucky, in November, 1844, of Scotch descent and of North Carolina ancestry. The mother was born in LaRue County in June, 1846. Warner Johnson spent all his active life as a farmer. After his marriage he settled on a farm in LaRue County, in 1880 moved to Daviess County, and came to Henderson County in 1890, where he and his wife are still living. He is a democrat in politics, and the family church connection is Baptist.

One of twelve children, James W. Johnson, spent his early life on a farm and had a public school education. Since he was sixteen he has been solving his own problems and paying his own way. Mr. Johnson has done a great deal of hard work in his time, as a farm hand, in the lumber woods and in other lines of employment. Coming to Henderson in 1893, he continued to follow different lines, though most of his work was as a carpenter. In 1902 he was elected magistrate for the Fifth District, and filled that office capably four years. Governor Beckham appointed him police judge in 1907, to fill an unexpired term, and in 1909 he was elected to a full term of four years. He was police judge altogether six years. In 1913 Judge Johnson was elected mayor of Henderson, and handled the affairs of the municipality with a rare degree of good judgment and efficiency four years. He is now representing his home constituency of Henderson County in the State Legislature, having been elected in 1917 and re-elected without opposition in 1919.

Mr. Johnson improved his leisure hours for a period of years in the study of law, was admitted to the bar in June, 1902, and in connection with other duties has always looked after an extensive clientele. He is a democrat and active in the interest of the party.

RICHARD DOWNING NORWOOD has for thirty years occupied a place of prominence among the wholesale merchants of Lexington. He is one of the seven owners and proprietors of Tunis & Company, wholesale grocers, and is also a director of the Lexington Dry Goods Company.

Mr. Norwood was born in Fayette County April 20, 1867, son of Maj. Edward M. and Priscilla Webb

L. W. Bethune

(Downing) Norwood. His grandfather was Rev. Francis Norwood, a Congregational minister. Maj. Edward M. Norwood was born in Massachusetts, was educated in medicine, graduated from Columbia College of New York, and in the Civil war became surgeon with the First Tennessee Regiment of the Federal Army, holding the rank of major. While his regiment was camped on the old Downing farm two miles north of Lexington, on Georgetown Pike, he met Priscilla Webb Downing, and they were married in 1864. When he went back to his regiment in Big Stone Gap, Tennessee, he was shortly afterward stricken with blood poison, and his wife joined him at Kingston, Tennessee, and nursed him through his illness, until he was able to report for active duty. Major Norwood after the war settled on his wife's portion of the old Downing farm on the Newtown Pike and added to that estate until he owned about 500 acres. He became a prominent breeder of trotting horses and was always deeply interested in public affairs, voting as an independent democrat. Major Norwood's mother was a Choate, being a cousin of the great lawyer Rufus Choate.

Some of the interesting particulars concerning the ancestry of Priscilla Webb Downing are found in the Kentucky State Historical Register of May, 1908. A Francis Downing came from England, County Essex, to Virginia as early as 1624. A Pennsylvania branch of the family was represented by Thomas Downing, a Quaker, at Downingtown, Pennsylvania. Emanuel Downing was a London lawyer, and his second wife was Lucy, daughter of Governor Winthrop of the Massachusetts Colony. Emanuel settled at Salem, was an active influence in the early affairs of Harvard College, and his home later became the residence of Simon Bradstreet, the last colonial governor, whose wife was Ann, a daughter of Emanuel Downing. A son of Emanuel, George Downing, was born at Boston in 1623 and was a scout master in Cromwell's army. Cromwell made him ambassador to the Hague, where he was retained by Charles II after the Restoration. Charles II made him a baronet in 1663. This George Downing became secretary of the treasury of England, and built the houses on Downing Street named in his honor, which were deeded to the Crown and have since been the official residence of the Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury.

The Downings of Central Kentucky are descended from Francis Downing, who on coming from Yorkshire, England, settled in Baltimore County, Maryland, and after the Revolutionary war, about 1783, came to Kentucky and died in Fayette County in March, 1814, at the age of ninety. Several of his sons were American soldiers during the Revolution. One of these sons, William, was a soldier and in 1791 located at Limestone (Maysville) and subsequently settled on Todd's Road, Fayette County, five miles from Lexington, where he died in 1835.

Priscilla Webb Downing was a daughter of Richard Downing, who in 1814 married Mary Russell, and they occupied the old Downing home on Georgetown Pike. Richard Downing was a brother of Joseph Lee Downing (1785-1861), who in 1809 married Molly Ann Richardson, a daughter of Marquis Richardson of near Mount Sterling. Joseph Lee Downing owned the magnificent stock farm called "McGrathiana," which adjoined the old Downing farm where his father lived and died. The father of Richard and Joseph Lee was Samuel Downing, who served in the Revolutionary war from 1777 to 1780 and who married Priscilla Webb. He is buried on the old Downing home three miles from Lexington. Samuel Downing was a brother to Richard W. Downing, who was a surgeon in the American forces during the Revolution and who married in Hartford County, Maryland, Margaret Webb. He came to Lexington about 1790 and enjoyed an enviable prominence as a physician. He died in 1812, there being an account of his death in the Lexington Gazette of August 30, 1812. He owned extensive tracts of land and was a trustee of Transylvania Seminary.

Major Norwood died in 1912, at the age of seventy-three, and his widow survived him until March 19, 1920. The old farm is still kept in the family, its present owners being the firm of Norwood, King & Worthington. Major Norwood and wife had five children: Frank R., a bachelor living at Lexington; Richard D.; Mary B., wife of B. E. King, of Lexington; Adeline S., Mrs. William Worthington, wife of a Lexington attorney; and Nellie, Mrs. P. P. Bradley, of Lexington.

Richard Downing Norwood was liberally educated, spending two years in Transylvania University. At the age of seventeen and for five years thereafter he was employed by the Lexington Roller Mills Company. For a year he was superintendent of the Ice Company, and in 1890 became one of the constituent members of the wholesale grocery firm of Curry, Tunis & Norwood. Later the business was incorporated, using the same name, and on March 1st, 1920, it again became a co-partnership, under the style of Tunis & Company.

Mr. Norwood has also played an active part in civic affairs and has aided liberally in institutions that expressed the moral ideals of the community. For two years he was an alderman, in 1912 was elected a member of the School Board, and is now serving his third term and for the past four years has been president of the board. He is vice president of the Y. M. C. A. of Lexington, and a member of the Masonic Order.

Mr. Norwood married Naunerle Campbell, of Stanford, Kentucky. They have one daughter, Dorothy, Mrs. John Laurie Calhoun, of Cincinnati.

JUDGE LEONARD W. BETHURUM is a brother of Circuit Judge B. J. Bethurum of the Twenty-eighth Judicial District, and until the elevation of his brother to the bench they were associated in law practice at Mount Vernon. L. W. Bethurum has been one of the leading attorneys of Rock Castle County for a quarter of a century, is a former county judge, and has been a citizen of distinctively progressive trend in matters of education and all other public improvements of his section of the state.

He was born in Rock Castle County May 27, 1872, of Irish ancestry. His great-grandfather was a native of Pennsylvania and the founder of the family in Rock Castle County in pioneer times. His grandfather, B. K. Bethurum, was born near Mount Vernon in 1810 and spent practically all his life on a farm near there. He died in 1898. He was a republican and held the offices of county judge, county attorney and sheriff. David P. Bethurum, father of L. W. and Judge Bethurum, was born at Mount Vernon in 1844, and is still living in that community after half a century of activity as a farmer. He was a union soldier in the Nineteenth Kentucky Infantry and spent six months in a Confederate prison in Texas. He also has to his credit one term as county judge, so that three successive generations of this family have held that office. David P. Bethurum married Mary Moore, who was born in Rock Castle County in 1851 and died in 1907.

L. W. Bethurum, the oldest of his father's sons, attended public schools in Rock Castle County, and acquired his higher education in Valparaiso University at Valparaiso, Indiana, and Washington College at Williamsburg, Kentucky. He graduated in law with the LL. B. degree from the University of Louisville in 1897, and in the same year began his professional career at Mount Vernon. He has had a large practice both in the Civil and Criminal courts, and his activities have been such as to denominate him as a successful lawyer, business man and man of affairs. He organized in 1909 and has since been a director and attorney for the Peoples Bank of Mount Vernon. He was one of the organizers and is a director and stockholder of the Mount Vernon Electric Light Company. Among his property interests is a farm of 300 acres three miles south of Mount Vernon, his office building, a substantial brick structure at Church and Water streets, on the Public Square, and his home on Main Street.

Mr. Bethurum served as county attorney of Rockcastle County from 1902 to 1906, and from 1906 to 1914 held the office of county judge. As a republican in a strong democratic district he received the honor of nomination for Congress to represent the Eighth District in 1906 and 1908, and greatly reduced the normal majorities in those years. In 1911 he was republican nominee for state auditor on the O'Rear ticket.

During the World war, through general consent and the recognition of his qualifications as the ideal man for such duties, Mr. Bethurum was chairman of every committee to lead the county over the top in Liberty Loan, Red Cross and other drives. For many years he has been an active leader in the progressive fight for better schools in Rockcastle County. While he was county judge he gave the full strength of his official and private influence to secure the three new graded schoolhouses in the county, one at Mount Vernon, one at Livingston and one at Brodhead. Mr. Bethurum is a member of the Christian Church, is affiliated with Ashland Lodge No. 640, Free and Accepted Masons, at Mount Vernon, Mount Vernon Chapter No. 140, Royal Arch Masons, Lebanon Commandery No. 24, Knights Templar, Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Louisville, Richmond Lodge No. 581, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, Mount Vernon Lodge No. 320, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and Mount Vernon Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics.

On May 15, 1898, Mr. Bethurum married at Jellico, Tennessee, Miss Ray Jones, daughter of L. S. and Georgia (Williams) Jones. Her father was a merchant at Middlesboro, Kentucky. Mr. Bethurum lost his first wife by death July 6, 1906. Of the three children born to their marriage the first two, Bessie and Mason Lovell, died in childhood. The only survivor is Tevis Ray, a student in Hamilton College at Lexington. In December, 1915, at Louisville, Mr. Bethurum married Miss Mattie Williams, daughter of J. J. and Elizabeth (Miller) Williams. Her father was a merchant and at one time one of the wealthiest citizens of Mount Vernon. Mrs. Bethurum is a graduate of the Louisville High School.

FRED G. STILZ is actively identified with some of Lexington's leading financial and business corporations, being cashier of the Bank of Commerce of Lexington. He has given nearly a quarter of a century, practically all of his active life, to the banking business.

Mr. Stilz was born in Jefferson County, Kentucky, December 20, 1877, son of Jacob F. Stilz, a native of the same county, and grandson of Godfrey Stilz, who was born in Germany and came to the United States at the age of fifteen, and a few years later moved to Kentucky. Jacob Stilz has lived in Fayette County since 1885, and has done an extensive business as a vegetable grower, selling his produce in wholesale lots. He is still living at his home on Newtown Pike, near the City of Lexington, at the age of seventy-five. He is a member of the Official Board of the Central Methodist Episcopal Church. Jacob Stilz married Mary Baringer, of Jefferson County, and she died in 1917.

Fred G. Stilz was educated in the city schools of Lexington, spent two years in the State College, now the State University, and also completed a course in the Lexington Business College.

October 1, 1897, he became office boy or runner with the Phoenix National Bank. His earnest application and the talents brought out by increasing experience gave him advancement from time to time until in 1909 he was made cashier. When the Phoenix was consolidated with the Third National Bank he was acting cashier, and later resigned to assist in the establishment of the Bank of Commerce, which was opened January 2, 1912. He and O. D. Randolph and J. W. Richardson were the promoters of this bank. J. W. Richardson and O. D. Randolph are its vice presidents, while the president is I. W. Mantle. Mr. Stilz has been cashier from the beginning. At the close of its ninth year in business the Bank of Commerce had total resources of nearly $3,400,000. Its capital stock is $300,000, surplus of over $200,000, and deposits of approximately two and a half millions.

Mr. Stilz is also secretary of the People's Savings Fund and Building Association, with offices in the Bank of Commerce, an organization that has furnished special facilities for the building of homes at Lexington. He is secretary and a member of the Board of Directors of the Henry Clay Fire Insurance Company, is a director of the Phoenix Amusement Company, and from the beginning has been a director of the Lafayette Hotel Company. Mr. Stilz also does an extensive business in real estate.

At the age of thirty-nine he married Lucy Vaughn, of Lexington, daughter of J. N. Vaughn and member of one of the well-known old families of Fayette County. Mr. and Mrs. Stilz have one daughter, Mary Ann. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Elks.

ALEXANDER PREWITT PAYNE is one of the outstanding merchants and business men of Lexington, and for a quarter of a century has been identified with the extensive wholesale grocery business now known as Tunis & Company. He entered the service of the old company in 1895 as a bookkeeper. He became a stockholder in 1902, and is now treasurer of the company and one of its seven proprietors.

Mr. Payne is a deacon in the Presbyterian Church. He married Jean Todhunter, also an active church worker. Both Mr. and Mrs. Payne are members of old and prominent Fayette County families.

Mr. Payne is descended from Henry Conyers Payne, who was born December 19, 1787, and died June 5, 1856. In 1808 he married Kitty Lewis, who died in 1828, the mother of the following children: Romulus, born in 1809, and died a bachelor; Remus, born in 1811 and died in 1880, married Mary Talbott, who died in 1843; Lewis D., born in 1813, married Elizabeth Keene; Eliza, born in 1815, married Col. Rodes Estill; Anne Maria, born in 1817, was the wife of Dr. John Jackson; Thomas H., born in 1819, married Maria Viley; Lydia, born in 1822, was the wife of B. B. Taylor; Sallie was born in 1824; Benjamin was born in 1826; and Kitty was born in 1828.

Henry C. Payne, a son of Remus and Mary (Talbott) Payne, was born in Scott County, Kentucky, August 11, 1838. He married Laura Prewitt, daughter of Alexander E. and Martha (Spurr) Prewitt. Her father died in 1877, at the age of sixty-two and her mother died in 1853. Laura Prewitt inherited the old Prewitt homestead of 215 acres. Henry C. Payne was a magistrate in Athens precinct. He and his wife had two sons, Robert T. and Alexander Prewitt, and three daughters, Katie, Mattie P. and Laura.

SILAS SHELBURNE is known as the "old war horse" of the tobacco business in Kentucky. He is the oldest active dealer or warehouseman in the United States, has sold more tobacco than any other dealer either living or dead, and has an unsurpassed acquaintance with tobacco growers and dealers and manufacturers all over the country. Mr. Shelburne is a genial, open-hearted business man, and it would be a serious oversight to omit some direct mention of his name and activities in Kentucky.

He is president of the New Silas Shelburne Tobacco Warehouse Company of Lexington. This business was incorporated in 1912, has a capital of $50,000 and an investment in two warehouses at Lexington totaling $100,000. This company has facilities for handling at one time 650,000 pounds of tobacco in baskets. Mr. Shelburne built his first warehouse at Lexington, in 1905. This warehouse is now included in the Planters Warehouse. He operated it individually for three years, and then took in as partner W. D. McIntire and J. D. Marshall, organizing the Shelburne Tobacco Warehouse Company. This business sold out to the Louisville Warehouse Company in 1912.

Mr. Shelburne started the second tobacco warehouse in Kentucky soon after C. W. Bohmer established the independent market. Mr. Shelburne and Mr. Bohmer were formerly operating in the same city, Richmond, Virginia, where Mr. Shelburne was associated with Feid R. Scott in the tobacco market about a quarter of a century ago. When Richmond declined as a central market Mr. Shelburne came to Lexington, where he has shared the honors with Mr. Bohmer and others in building up a direct market for the growers and in making Lexington one of the greatest tobacco markets in the world. Mr. Shelburne began his operations with a limited capital, but his knowledge of the business enabled him to expand and he has been the principal factor in the notable success of the Lexington market and the New Silas Shelburne Tobacco Warehouse Company.

Mr. Shelburne is known as a man who never feared competition, and the fighting instinct was implanted in him during the three and a half years he served as one of the youngest soldiers under Stonewall Jackson in the Virginia campaigns. Practically from the close of the war he has been in the tobacco business, for more than half a century. He was identified with the old tobacco market when tobacco was sold by sample on the exchanges at Richmond. His father was a personal friend of Stonewall Jackson and as Silas had served his original term of twelve months, for which he enlisted, the father wished him to return home and spoke to General Jackson about it, but the general induced him to let the son stay for three extra months. He went home for a short time but shortly afterward joined a command with the cavalry in the Valley of Virginia, and continued until the surrender of Appomattox. He was made an orderly sergeant of his company at the age of seventeen, and was on the skirmish line when the Confederate forces came within the sight of Washington City. His ancestry were old-line whigs, and were staunch friends of the Union until Virginia seceded.

Mr. Shelburne still carries on an extensive and varied business. During the winters he handles tobacco sales and is a dealer in fertilizer during the early spring months. He has a warehouse at Darlington, South Carolina, and another at Washington, North Carolina, and supervises operations of these two plants in the early part of the tobacco season, so that he is on hand at the opening of the Lexington market.

Mr. Shelburne married at the age of thirty Miss Emily Balmer, who left him two children, Victor B., in charge of the plant at Washington, North Carolina, and Ethel, wife of Dr. D. T. Armistad, of Roanoke, Virginia.

JAMES L. McDONALD. While he began his career as a general merchant, James L. McDonald for many years has largely specialized as a dealer in fencing material and as a fence building contractor, and it is doubtful if any citizen in Kentucky has furnished material for or constructed more miles of fence than this popular Lexington citizen.

Mr. McDonald was born in Clark County, Kentucky, March 3, 1849, son of Hugh and Eliza (Berry) McDonald. His mother was a member of the prominent Berry family of Kentucky, several references to whom are made on other pages of this publication. The grandfather, Frank McDonald, came from Scotland and for many years lived on a farm near Pine Grove in Clark County. He had three sons, Hugh, Thomas and Nathan. Nathan served as a local magistrate, and he and his brother lived on portions of the old homestead in Clark County. Their father, Frank, was waylaid and killed while acting as sheriff of Clark County. Thomas died on the old homestead at the age of sixty-five. Hugh McDonald had a farm at the point where the three counties of Bourbon, Clark and Fayette joined, his home being in Clark County. He died at the age of fifty-six and his wife, Eliza, died in 1859. They had a family of four sons and one daughter: Jennie, who died in childhood; Milton, who lived on a portion of the old farm in Clark County and died at Louisville; James L.; Frank, who had a farm near Pine Grove and died when a young man, leaving a widow and one child; and Nathan G., of Lexington, who formerly was a farmer and merchant at Chilesburg in Fayette County.

James L. McDonald and his brother Nathan established a general store at Chilesburg in 1881, and continued in business there for ten or twelve years. Moving to Lexington, James L. McDonald formed a partnership with P. H. Eastin to handle fencing materials and do a business as fencing contractors, and they were associated for fifteen years. Mr. McDonald had become interested in the fence material business while at Chilesburg, and for thirty-five years has been a dealer in wire fencing and a general line of fence material. One of his fence building contracts was for the L. & E. Railroad Company, and involved a sum of $23,000. Every season he kept a large force of men busy doing this work. Mr. McDonald is also well remembered for his proficient work as an auctioneer. He has cried many sales of farm property, and his services were in especial demand at stock sales.

While he has never been in politics he served four years on the Lexington School Board while the board was erecting some of the important city school buildings. Mr. McDonald is a member of the Lake Ellerslee Fishing Club and his favorite recreations are fishing and hunting.

At the age of nineteen he married Miss Mollie Hildreth, who died leaving one child, Lula, now Mrs. C. P. Wiggins, of Lexington. The second wife of Mr. McDonald was Jennie Grimes, of Lexington, who is a leader in all the activities of the Central Christian Church. They have one son, Embry.

EZRA LAFAYETTE MILES. Among the real developers of Daviess County and its agricultural interests, more than passing mention is due Ezra Lafayette Miles, who has the distinction of having cleared more land and prepared it for cultivation than any other man in the county. Mr. Miles' life pursuit has been farming, and in it his industry and perseverance have combined to win for him well-merited success, as well as the commendation and esteem of those among whom he has made his home for so many years.

Mr. Miles, who now resides near Stanley, was born in Crawford County, Indiana, February 14, 1858. His parents, Hezekiah and Josephine (Strickland) Miles, were natives of Indiana and in 1869 came to Daviess County, where they spent the rest of their lives in agricultural operations, the father dying in 1875, at the age of fifty-two years, and the mother passing away when forty-two years of age. They were the parents of four sons and one daughter.

Ezra Lafayette Miles, or Lafe Miles, as he is more familiarly and cordially known to his neighbors and friends, was reared on the farm and from early youth knew the necessity of working hard for his livelihood. He was only seventeen years of age when his father died, and from that time to the present has fought the battles of life for himself. He had but limited educational advantages, but was born with a strong physique and a clear and intelligent mind, and by dint of hard work and good management, aided by his capable and faithful wife, has made a success in life as a farmer.

When he began his career as an agriculturist Mr. Miles farmed for the first two years on shares, following which he became a renter, which was his status up to 1903. At that time he purchased his present farm, consisting of 808 acres. He sold one half of this tract and owns all his remaining 404 acres, and this he has brought to a high state of development, with modern buildings and up-to-date improvements to add to its value. He has been an extensive raiser of hay, corn and tobacco, and has also found the raising of hogs a profitable department of his work. In 1916 Mr. Miles' residence was destroyed by fire, and this was at once replaced by his present handsome home of tile brick, situated two miles west of Stanley on the Laketown Road. Mr. Miles is a republican in his political allegiance, but has never sought office, having been too busily engaged in his agricultural operations to enter the political arena as a seeker for personal preferment. He takes an interest in civic affairs, however, and has always been found supporting worthy movements and measures with his time, ability and means. Mr. and Mrs. Miles and their children are faithful members of the Methodist Church.

In 1882 Mr. Miles was united in marriage with Miss Sarah Catherine Sheffer, who was born in Union County, Kentucky, daughter of James David and Sarah Catherine (Wilson) Sheffer. Mrs. Miles' parents died when she was a child, and she was reared in the home of relatives. To Mr. and Mrs. Miles have been born nine children: Stella, who is the wife of Edward W. Fuqua, a prosperous general merchant of Stanley; Amelia, who is the wife of I. G. Dunn, a leading general merchant of Henderson; James W., who is successfully engaged in merchandising at Henderson; Lula, who is the wife of E. W. Pfeifer, an agriculturist of Daviess County; John Preston, who is a well-known businessman and merchant at Madisonville, Kentucky; Georgia, who is the wife of Walker Gregory, now a farmer of Daviess County, who served in the United States Army during the World war, going overseas with the Eighty-fourth Division, seeing active service in France, and returning to the United States, where he was honorably discharged in August, 1919; Kathleen, who is the wife of Charles A. Saalwaechter, a well-known merchant of Henderson; Susie Fountain, who is a popular school-teacher in the rural districts of Shelby County, Kentucky; and Donnie Eunice, wife of William Dawson and resides at Owensboro.

E. STANLER has practiced his profession as an architect and engineer at Lexington for the past thirteen years. His professional service has extended all over Central Kentucky and even to outside states, and it is claimed for him that he has been architect for more school buildings and churches in Central Kentucky than any other member of his profession.

Mr. Stanler was born at Walton in Boone County November 12, 1869. His father was a contractor and builder, and thus Mr. Stanler grew up in an atmosphere of the profession and business which he has made a life-long pursuit. He began as a building contractor, drawing his own plans, and for the past eighteen years has specialized as an architect and engineer, the first five years being spent at Paris. His favorite work and the line in which his reputation is most widely extended is as an architect of school and church edifices. Numerous examples of his work outside Central Kentucky are found in Tennessee and even in Georgia. Some of the finest residences of Lexington were built by him.

Mr. Stanler is a member of the Calvary Baptist Church. In his old home community he married Miss Pearl Byrd. Their two children are Jennie Louise and Marion Edward, the former a student in Transylvania University.

JAMES PRYOR, manager at Lexington for the Liggett & Myers Tobacco Company's interests since 1916, entered the service of the American Tobacco Company at Louisville as a clerk in early life, and has been identified with the tobacco business in Kentucky and the middle west for twenty-five years.

The Liggett & Myers Company, formerly a part of the Tobacco Trust and since 1911 one of the four elements or constituent companies of the Trust, has been one of the chief organizations buying and handling tobacco at Lexington since 1911. In 1916, the year Mr. Pryor took charge of the company's interests at Lexington, the present redrying plant was built, a portion of the plant being a four-story building 300 by 100 feet and another a two-story building 250 by 200 feet. There are also separate storage houses. The redrying plant has a daily capacity of 300,000 pounds, and there is storage for 20,000 hogsheads. The company has an investment at Lexington of about half a million dollars, has 500 employes during the season, and an average pay roll per week of $6,000. All the plant facilities are for redrying and storing the tobacco bought from the local markets for manufacturing by the Liggett & Myers Company. During 1920 this company bought about 12,000,000 pounds in the Lexington market. The company has other plants, at Paris, Winchester and Louisville, and has some fifty buyers operating at all the Kentucky markets.

Mr. Pryor is a son of the late Judge William S. Pryor, one of the most distinguished of Kentucky jurists. William S. Pryor was born near Newcastle, Henry County, April 1, 1825, son of Samuel Pryor and grandson of John Pryor. John Pryor was one of the first settlers and land owners near Newcastle, coming from Virginia. At his homestead was held the first court ever convened in Henry County. Samuel Pryor twice held the office of sheriff of Henry County. He married Nancy Samuels, whose father, William Samuels, was prominent in local politics. Judge Pryor was reared on a farm but was early distinguished by a thirst for knowledge and soon excelled his teachers in the local schools. He began the study of law in 1843 with his uncle, Judge James Pryor at Covington and qualified and was admitted to the bar by special act of the Legislature before reaching his majority. He practiced at Newcastle and was soon accorded distinction among some of the eminent members of the Kentucky bar of that generation. In 1866 he was elected judge of the Eleventh District Court, and in September, 1871, was appointed to fill a vacancy on the Appellate bench. In 1872 he was regularly elected to the Appellate Court and was re-elected in 1880 and again in 1888. He was defeated at his fourth candidacy in 1896, during the republican landslide. For four terms he was chief justice of the Appellate Court, and his great knowledge of the law, his judicial temperament and his personal character made him one of the outstanding jurists of his time. After retiring from the bench he resumed private practice until 1909, and his last years were spent in his beautiful country home near Newcastle. He developed a fine farm in Henry County, was a stockman and president of the Eminence Agricultural Association. February 8, 1848, Judge Pryor married Miss Mary C. Brinker, who died in 1855, leaving two children, Samuel and Joanna. January 31, 1856, Judge Pryor married Miss Apphia Beasley, who died in February, 1895. Her son Joseph, now deceased, was for six years a circuit judge at Louisville.

James Pryor, fifth son of William S. and Apphia Pryor, was born at Newcastle, Kentucky, and after completing his education entered the service of the Continental Tobacco Company at Louisville, when he was twenty-one years of age. Later he was associated with the American Tobacco Company and for several years was in the tobacco business in West Virginia. Mr. Pryor is a member of the Lexington Board of Commerce, the Lexington Club and Country Club. He married Miss Ida Hieatt, of Henry County.

FRED W. HEMPHILL early initiated his association with the newspaper business, and that he has "run true to form" as prescribed in journalistic annals is shown in the fact that he has had no inclination permanently to withdraw himself from this interesting service of the "fourth estate." He has made a record of consecutive advancement in the newspaper field in Kentucky and is now editor and general manager of the Corbin Times, a weekly paper which has foremost rank in Whitley County and which is a specially vital and influential exponent of the varied interests of the fine little city of Corbin, as well as those of Whitley County and this section of the state in general. The Times has its modern office on Main Street at Corbin, its equipment including Mergenthaler linotype machines, cylinder and job presses of the best type, folding machines, and all other accessories and supplies of the thoroughly modern newspaper and job printing plant. The plant was equipped at a cost of $10,000, and under the vigorous regime of Mr. Hemphill the Times has extended its circulation and influence most effectively, his progressive policies and effective editorial work having made the paper one of the best in this part of the state. The Times was founded in 1907, is a staunch advocate of the principles of the republican party, and has powerful influence in the molding of popular sentiment and the direction of popular action in Whitley and adjacent counties.

Mr. Hemphill's loyalty to and deep interest in Kentucky have primary basis on the fact that he can claim the old Blue Grass state as the place of his nativity. His grandfather, Thomas Hemphill, became a pioneer farmer in Knox County, this state, where he acquired large tracts of land and became an extensive exponent of farm industry in Brush Creek, where he passed the remainder of his life and here he died prior to the birth of the subject of this sketch. Specially valuable coal and timber land represents a portion of his old estate in Knox County. Fred W. Hemphill was born at Barbourville, judicial center of Knox County, Kentucky, on the 14th of October, 1889, and is a son of A. M. and America Ellen (Hembree) Hemphill, both natives of the Brush Creek district of Knox County, where the former was born in 1847 and the latter in 1852. A. M. Hemphill was reared on his father's old estate in Knox County, received good educational advantages, as gauged by the standards of the locality and period, and in adult years held rank as one of the substantial and successful farmers of his native county. Later he served a number of years as storekeeper and gauger in the United States internal-revenue department for the Eighth Kentucky District, his residence having been continued in Knox County until the close of his life, though after his retirement from active affairs he died in a hospital in the City of Lexington in 1919. He was a stalwart republican, was influential in public affairs in Knox County and there served ten years as deputy sheriff. He was long and actively affiliated with the Masonic fraternity, was regular in his attendance at the meetings of the various Masonic bodies with which he was identified, and was an appreciative student of the history and teachings of the time-honored fraternity. He was an earnest member of the Baptist Church, as is also his widow, who now resides in the home of her son Fred W., immediate subject of this review. Of the children the eldest is James L., who is general foreman in the shops of the Frisco Railroad at Madill, Oklahoma; Joseph is engaged in the brokerage business in the City of Havana, Cuba; Millie is the wife of I. D. Nash and resides at Berea, Kentucky; Mary, who died at Williamsburg, Whitley County, was the wife of A. T. Reeder, who is still a resident of that place; Amanda is the wife of L. G. Wesley, superintendent of the public schools of Georgetown, Kentucky; John W., an electrical engineer by vocation, resides in the City of San Francisco, California; Artemus H., a member of the United States army, is stationed with his command at Del Rio, Texas, at the time of this writing, in the summer of 1921, and was with his command in France and Belgium at the time of the World war, besides having been with the allied Army of Occupation in Germany after the signing of the historic armistice, he having been assigned to duty as an assistant to the quartermaster general of the American Expeditionary Forces and his service overseas having covered a period of twenty-six months; William died at the age of three years; Fred W., of this sketch, was the next in order of birth; and Thomas died at the age of one year.

The rural schools of his native county were the medium through which Fred W. Hemphill gained his early education, which was supplemented by his attending St. Mary's College, in Marion County, where he continued his studies until 1909, after which he was for two years associated with the Consolidated Coal Company at Jenkins, Letcher County. He was sixteen years of age when he gained his initial experience in connection with the profound mysteries of the printing and newspaper business, and the fascination of journalism has worked its way with him, as at intervals he has been identified with newspaper work at Barbourville, Middlesboro, Georgetown, Somerset, Bowling Green and other places in Kentucky. For some time he was assistant editor of the Mountain Advocate at Barbourville, and in 1920 he assumed his present dual office, that of editor and general manager of the Corbin Times. He is a vigorous advocate of the principles and policies for which the republican party stands sponsor, and has made the Times a vehicle for the expression of his political views. He is affiliated with Mountain Lodge No. 187, Free and Accepted Masons, at Barbourville; Barbourville Chapter No. 137, Royal Arch Masons; London Council No. 60, Royal and Select Masters, at London, Laurel County; Somerset Commandery No. 31, Knights Templars, at Somerset, Pulaski County; Kentucky Consistory, Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite, in which he has received the thirty-second degree; and Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine, which likewise has headquarters in the City of Louisville. By virtue of his service in connection with the World war he is an appreciative member of Deaton-Smith Post No. 69, American Legion, at Barbourville. He holds membership in the International Typographical Union, the railroad department of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the Corbin Shrine Club in his home city. He is secretary of the building-fund committee which is preparing for the erection of a Masonic temple at Corbin, at a cost of $60,000, and in this connection he is exemplifying both his civic progressiveness and his deep interest in the Masonic fraternity.

On the 14th of August, 1918, Mr. Hemphill entered service in the United States military forces preparing for active duty in the World war. He was sent to the mechanical training school at Indianapolis, Indiana, and on the 26th of the following September he met with an accident that resulted in the fracturing of the bones of his right leg. His injury incapacitated him for further active army service, and he was discharged from both the hospital and the United States Army on the 21st of December, 1918.

ZACHARY THOMAS PERKINS. One of the most attractive and valuable farms in Daviess County is located at the village of Maceo, its owner and proprietor being Zachary Thomas Perkins, a lifelong resident of that vicinity and a man whose enterprise has brought him all the rewards in farming which would satisfy an ambitious business man in any other calling.

He was born on a farm near Maceo November 1, 1869. That section of Daviess County has been the home of the Perkins family since the time of his grandfather, Thomas Perkins, who settled here at a very early date. Gibson Taylor Perkins, his father, was born in Daviess County, spent his active life as a farmer and died in 1873, at the age of thirty-three. Gibson T. Perkins married Margaret Ann Wilhoite, who was born in Oldham County, Kentucky, daughter of Zachary Wilhoite, a farmer. She was the mother of three children by her first marriage. Her second husband was the late John Kirby, by whom she had one child. She is still living at the age of eighty and unusually active for her years.

Zachary T. Perkins grew up on the home farm and except for a brief period of merchandising has devoted all his energies and time to a systematic business of farming and stock raising. He has the reputation of being very thorough in everything he undertakes. One of the evidences of his prosperity is a highly attractive and commodious farm residence built in 1910, one of the best homes in the Maceo community.

In 1895 Mr. Perkins married Miss Mary Thompson. Her father, Jacob Thompson, was born in Shelby County, Kentucky, and married a Miss Wright, a native of Daviess County, where Mrs. Perkins was born. Mr. Perkins is a member of the Christian Church and Mrs. Perkins is a Methodist. They have six children, Sarah Elizabeth, Gibson Thompson, Thomas Jacob, Margaret Ann, Silas Wright and Mary Olivia.

JOHN M. GOODE. His success through many years in the breeding and training of winning thoroughbreds on the racing track gives John M. Goode a place of interesting prominence among Kentucky horsemen, and he is widely and favorably known among all followers of the track.

Mr. Goode, whose home is in Lexington, was born in Jessamine County, Kentucky, and represents some old and prominent Kentucky families. He is a son of George W. and Fanny (Lyons) Goode, the former a native of Clark and the latter of Woodford County. The grandfather was Walter Goode, a Virginian, who spent his active life on a farm in Clark County, Kentucky, and for many years carried on an extensive business as a livestock trader and as a drover to eastern markets. George W. Goode as a young man helped drive livestock over the mountains to Philadelphia and Baltimore. During the war between the states he served as a captain in the Kentucky Cavalry under Frank L. Woolford. Captain Goode at one time was a merchant at Keene in Jessamine County, and subsequently became one of the larger farmers in that county. He represented the county in the State Legislature, was an influential democrat, was a member and deacon in the Christian Church at South Elkhorn, and he and his wife both died in the same year, he at the age of seventy-nine. The old farm in Jessamine County has since been sold.

John M. Goode is the youngest of nine children, and five are still living. His brother V. W. Goode was in the real estate and insurance business at Lexington and died unmarried. The only living brother is George Goode, of Lexington. The three living sisters, all at Nicholasville, are Mrs. O. F. Troutman, Mrs. W. T. Crutcher and Mrs. H. L. Scott.

John M. Goode spent his early life on the farm but for the past twelve years his time and energies have been fully taken up with his special profession in the handling of thoroughbred running horses. He keeps and trains horses for others, and for several years has had his stable at many of the leading running tracks in the country. Mr. Goode is owner of Sands of Pleasure, of the same breeding as the famous Man o' War. This horse won the Camden handicap, and holds the record for the Lexington mile and a quarter track. Mr. Goode formerly owned Floro Fina, which won many handicaps, including the Camden handicap, and also won races in Canada. She was sold for $8,500 a few years ago.

At the age of twenty-five Mr. Goode married Margaret Gordon, daughter of Rev. John Gordon and granddaughter of Rev. Neal M. Gordon, who was a son of John Gordon. Rev. Neal M. Gordon was for thirty years pastor of the old Ebenezer Church in Jessamine County. Rev. John Gordon, a son of Neal M. and Catherine (Smith) Gordon, died at the age of thirty-six and was pastor for several years at Eminence, Kentucky. Catherine (Smith) Gordon was a daughter of James Smith, one of the old Circuit riding ministers of Illinois. Lincoln knew this pioneer Illinois minister and his family very well, and it is thought probable that the preaching of James Smith had an important influence on Lincoln's religious beliefs. James Smith died while a United States consul at Edinburgh, Scotland, and probably was appointed to that post through the influence of Lincoln. Mrs. Goode's mother was Maggie Moore, of Fayette County, now living with Mr. and Mrs. Goode. She is a direct descendant of Pocahontas, her mother, Margaret Randolph, being a daughter of John Howard Randolph of Virginia. Mr. and Mrs. Goode have two children, Elizabeth Moore and John Gordon.

DAVID MANOR WALLACE, whose home is three miles south of Lexington, has confined the efforts of his active career largely to farming and the breeding of thoroughbred horses. His name is widely known in standard circles. Mr. Wallace is descended from some of the very distinguished characters in the early history of Kentucky, and some reference to his ancestry has an appropriate place in this sketch.

Judge Caleb Wallace, who was born in 1742, came to Kentucky from Virginia. On October 1, 1782, he had been made a member of a commission of the State of Virginia to adjudicate western accounts. He left Virginia soon after the news reached the East of the catastrophe at Blue Licks and the death of Stephen Trigg. Accompanying him was his father, Samuel, also his brother Andrew and his brother-in-law, Colonel Henry Pawling. By April 12, 1783, the duties of the commission having been finished, he and the other commissioners returned to Virginia to give an accounting. Caleb Wallace also took his seat in the General Assembly of Virginia to represent Lincoln County, Kentucky, then a portion of the Old Dominion. While there he was active in the legislation which resulted in the establishment of Transylvania College at Lexington. Prior to that he had taken part in the establishment of two Presbyterian colleges in Virginia. Not long afterward a vacancy occurred in the Supreme Court of the Territory of Kentucky, and he was chosen as the successor of Colonel Floyd. In November, 1783, he sat in a session of this court at Crow's Station, near Danville.

During the winter of 1782-83 Judge Wallace worshipped with the Cane Run congregation of the Presbyterian Church, the first church of that denomination in Kentucky. He remained at Trigg Station for several years, but about 1786 moved to South Elkhorn Street in what was then Fayette, but is now Woodford County. In 1787 he sat in the Danville Convention of the Presbyterian Church as a member from Fayette County and assisted in founding the Woodford Church, having been active in the movement for the creation of Woodford County. He stood unmoved by the great Christian revival of 1801 due to the preaching of Alexander Campbell and Barton W. Stone. Judge Caleb Wallace, whose influence and activities have been carefully scrutinized by early students of Kentucky history, died in 1814. He was a graduate of Princeton College with the class of 1770, and had entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church in 1771.

Capt. Samuel Wallace, son of Judge Caleb Wallace, and the captain's son Caleb lived all their lives in Woodford County. Caleb Manor Wallace, son of Caleb, Sr., was born in Woodford County and died in 1868. He married Miss Anna Oldham, who was born in Madison County, daughter of David Dodge and Susanna Felt (Chenault) Oldham and granddaughter of Abner Oldham. Mrs. Anna Wallace, who is still living, was an only daughter, and grew up in an atmosphere of luxury and culture, graduating from Henry Female College at Newcastle in 1855. Her only brother, W. A. Oldham, became a minister of the Christian Church and for ten years was president of Christian College at Columbia, Missouri, and died while in a pastorate at Carthage, Missouri. Anna Oldham while a student at Newcastle met Caleb Manor Wallace. All her married life has been spent in Fayette County. Her father's old home on Richland Pike was erected in 1855, and is now owned by Conley Congleton. This place is ten miles south of Lexington, on the Richmond Pike. A portion of the Oldham farm was inherited by Mrs. Wallace, but her father later bought the Rodes farm, five miles from Lexington, on the Richmond Pike, where he died at the age of seventy-seven. On this farm Caleb Manor Wallace lived out his life and since 1897 Mrs. Wallace has lived at Lexington. She is the mother of four children: David Manor; Henry Buford Wallace, who was a farmer and died March 15, 1913, at the age of fifty; Susie, wife of Waller Marshall, deputy sheriff of Lexington; and Anna, wife of R. L. Nash, a well known horseman. Mrs. Anna Wallace resides with Mr. and Mrs. Marshall.

David Manor Wallace was born on Jack's Creek Pike, near the old Governor Shelby farm in Fayette County, November 26, 1860, and was about seven years of age when his father died. He remained at home with his mother until he married, at the age of thirty-two, Miss Lizzie Williams, daughter of Elijah M. Williams, of Fayette County. His life has been spent in farming, and for the past ten years his efforts have been specialized in the breeding of trotting horses. His home is the old Winckliffe farm, near the Reservoir, three miles south of Lexington. He has lived there for the past nine years, and on this farm have been bred and foaled some notable horses, though the training has been in the hands of other parties. He makes a practice of selling his stock young. Two great names in the world of trotting horses are David Axworthy, with a record of 2:11½ as a two-year-old in 1920, and Myleaf, with a five-year-old record of 2:10½, both of which were foaled on his farm.

Mr. Wallace has kept out of politics, though usually voting as a democrat. He and Mrs. Wallace have one daughter, Susan, a member of the class of 1921 at the Lexington High School.

BEN MYERS since January, 1917, has been Lexington manager for the Standard Oil Company, but has been in the service of that corporation continuously for nearly thirty years. From his offices are controlled the sale and distribution of the Standard Oil Company's products over Fayette County. The distributing facilities include two White trucks, each with 600 gallons capacity and one of 300 gallons, also three tank wagons. There are about twenty employees connected with the Lexington office. The amount of heavy oils consigned to the Lexington branch each year is about fifty cars, while from 120 to 150 tank cars of gas and kerosene are consigned here, a portion of which is reshipped outside the county.

Mr. Myers, one of the old and trusted men in the Standard Oil employ, was born at Carlisle, Kentucky, October 1, 1870. His father, D. W. Myers, was born in Nicholas County, son of David Benjamin Myers. Ben Myers grew up on the home farm, was educated in public schools, and in early life became a teamster. In September, 1893, he was appointed sub-agent at Carlisle for the Standard Oil Company, and remained agent there thirteen months, was at Mount Sterling five years, and for twelve or thirteen years was a traveling salesman in Eastern Kentucky Territory. For five years he operated with headquarters at Jackson, Mississippi, but under his old superintendent at Covington. Mr. Myers gives his complete time and interests to his business at Lexington, where he is a popular citizen, a member of the Rotary Club, the First Baptist Church and the United Commercial Travelers. He married in Clark County Miss Mamie T. Tucker, daughter of W. H. Tucker, of Winchester.

WILLIAM FRANKLIN ROBINSON for thirty years has been one of the farm leaders in Daviess County, a man of progress and action, making his efforts count toward the general welfare as well as to his own good and prosperity.

Mr. Robinson, whose home is in the Maceo community, was born in Union County, Kentucky, July 28, 1868. He was nine years of age when his parents moved to Daviess County, and he grew up on a farm and acquired a common school education. Farming has been his steady vocation, though for several years he profitably operated a tile factory at Maceo. He began life with only his ambition and the ability of his hands, and has commanded success by frugal management and industry.

His parents were William S. and Alexena (Waller) Robinson. The name Robinson is of Scotch origin. His grandfather, Jesse Robinson, married a Miss Jones, of Welsh ancestry. William S. Robinson was born in Shelby County, Kentucky, and for three years served in the Confederate army. His wife, Alexana Waller, was born at Richmond, Virginia, a daughter of Dabney and Sarah (Cluff) Waller, natives of that state and early settlers in Jefferson County, Kentucky. Soon after his marriage William S. Robinson removed to Union County and in 1877 established his family in Daviess County, where he lived on a farm the rest of his life. He was a good citizen, commanded the respect of his community, and both he and his wife were very devout Baptists. He was a staunch democrat. He died at the age of eighty-one and his widow is still living, an octogenarian, and her life has been in utmost harmony with her professions as a Christian. The children of William S. Robinson were: Waller, deceased; Elvira; John M., deceased; Luther J., deceased; Erwin L., deceased; G. W.; William F. and O. N. Robinson.

William Franklin Robinson in 1889 married Miss Carrie Mitchusson, who died in 1904. She was the mother of two children, Robert M. and Joseph Alvira. In 1908 Mr. Robinson married Miss Florence Hadly, and they have one daughter, Bessie Allen. Mr. and Mrs. Robinson are active members in the Baptist Church. Politically he is a democrat, and he is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner and a member of the Modern Woodmen of America. He has done his work well, has been unassuming as a citizen, and his home has been a center of generous hospitality and cordial welcome to the many friends of the family.

W. G. STUCK is master mechanic and superintendent of the ice delivery department of the Lexington Utilities Company and the Kentucky Traction & Terminal Company. He is a thorough mechanical and electrical engineer, a man who knows and is master of his business, but also an unassuming gentleman without undue conceit over his responsibilities.

Mr. Stuck has been a resident of Lexington for ten years. On January 1, 1911, he began his duties as master mechanic and since July 1, 1917, has also been superintendent of the ice delivery department. The mechanical shops of the Kentucky Traction & Terminal Company employ about thirty-five men, and there are complete facilities for the rebuilding as well as repair of all the cars used by the company. There is also equipment for the repairing and building new ice wagons. The ice delivery department of which Mr. Stuck is superintendent employs eighty men in the summer season and eighteen throughout the year.

Mr. Stuck was born fourteen miles from Detroit, in Wayne County, Michigan, August 2, 1874. His father, George W. Stuck, had a long and active career as a building contractor and is now living at Ann Arbor, Michigan, at the age of eighty-eight. W. G. Stuck had a common school education, and at the age of sixteen was employed on a steam motor between Ann Arbor and Ypsilanti. At the age of twenty he began doing electrical work as a shopman and motorman, going to Detroit as a motorman on the old Pingree line for one year. From 1896 to 1899 he was again employed at steam engineering, and then returned to the Interurban between Detroit and Ann Arbor as a motorman one year, after which he was night shop foreman, first at Dearborn and then at Ypsilanti. During 1900-01 he was engaged in the erection of power houses on the Interurban lines of the Toledo, Fremont & Norwalk Road, now the Lake Shore Electric. In 1901 he returned to the shop at Ypsilanti as shop foreman, and after two years was general shop foreman until 1907. His next work was at Canton, Ohio, as master mechanic for the Electric Light & Railway Company, and in July, 1908, he was made master mechanic of the Michigan United Railways, a third rail system with headquarters at Jackson. This was his last position before he came to Lexington to take up his present line of work. When he came to Lexington the company had all its rolling stock built outside, and under his supervision have been installed the facilities for building outright cars and other equipment. His work has won him high praise from his superior officials.

Mr. Stuck married Miss Lillian H. Woodruff of Scott County, Kentucky. He is an active Mason, is now serving his second term as worshipful master of Devotion Lodge No. 160, and has been a representative to the Grand Lodge. He is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner.

TRACY WALLACE, M. D. While he has given complete allegiance to his duties and responsibilities as a physician and surgeon at Irvine for the past fourteen years, Doctor Wallace is a good business man, interested in politics, like his distinguished brother James A., present state treasurer, and his individual activities have done much to advance the prestige of the family name in Estill County.

Doctor Wallace was born at Irvine, September 5, 1879. His grandfather was a native of Virginia, born in 1800, and in early life moved to Madison County, Kentucky, where he owned and operated extensive tracts of agricultural land and was a breeder and trainer of race horses. He died in Madison County about 1842. His son, Andrew Wallace, who was born in 1832, was about ten years of age when his father died, and he then moved with his mother to Irvine, where he was reared. He learned the trade of wagon and cabinet maker, and as a young man enlisted in the Union army with the Fourteenth Kentucky Infantry and served all through that struggle. Following the war he continued the work of his trade, also served as jailer of Estill County, and died as one of the honored and respected citizens of Irvine in 1902. He was a republican, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and a Mason. Andrew Wallace married Ellen Tracy, who was born at Stanton in Powell County, Kentucky, in 1843, and has now attained the age of seventy-eight. Two of her brothers were Confederate soldiers, Solomon being killed in the battle of Bull Run and the other at the battle of Shiloh. Her own family consisted of eight children: Edward Brooks, a stair builder living at Cincinnati; Coleman C., an attorney living at Richmond, Kentucky; James A., who is the present state treasurer, living at Frankfort; Henry Gardner, a carpenter, who died at Irvine at the age of fifty-two; Thomas Q., a merchant at Irvine; Katy, wife of Estill Payne, formerly a railroad man, now a merchant at Blackwell, Oklahoma; Dr. Tracy Wallace; and Daniel F., a farmer who died at Irvine at the age of thirty-five.

Dr. Tracy Wallace attended public school at Irvine, spent one year in the Academy at the Kentucky State University at Lexington, and then entered the Hospital College of Medicine at Louisville, where he was graduated M. D. in 1907. He at once returned to his native town, and since then has had all the practice he could well attend to in medicine and surgery. His offices are in the Farmers Bank Building on Main Street, and he is a stockholder and vice president of the Farmers Bank. Since 1913 he has been a member of the United States Pension Board, is present county health officer, and is a member of the County, State and American Medical associations. During the World war besides being financially and personally interested in the success of the various drives he was a member of the Volunteer Medical Corps.

Doctor Wallace owns a modern home at the north end of Main Street and is also a property owner at Ravenna, Kentucky, where he has half a dozen dwellings, a business building, and a half interest in the theater. He is a republican in politics, and was county treasurer during the year 1914, and has been a member of the graded school board of Irvine. He has served as treasurer of Irvine Lodge No. 173, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

In 1910, at Irvine, Doctor Wallace married Miss Bertha May Rader, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Rader, the latter now deceased. Her father is a farmer at Charleston, West Virginia. The two daughters of Doctor and Mrs. Wallace are Virginia, born April 27, 1911, and Louise, born September 10, 1916.

CHARLES LESLIE MEDLEY, M. D., a retired physician of Daviess County, now engaged in farming in the vicinity of Sutherland, is one of the most highly esteemed citizens of this part of Kentucky. He was born on a farm near Elizabethtown, Hardin County, Kentucky, August 24, 1869. He is a son of Joseph and Rosa (Hayden) Medley, who were natives of Kentucky, he having been born in Hardin County and she in Daviess County. Joseph Medley was a son of Joseph Medley, a native of Virginia and an early settler of Hardin County, Kentucky, where he followed farming until his death. His wife was a Miss O'Bryan. Joseph and Rosa (Hayden) Medley were married in Daviess County, but settled in Hardin County, where he followed farming and lived to be seventy-seven years of age. His first wife died in young womanhood, after bearing her husband three children, and he later was married to Rosa Riney of Hardin County, and by his second marriage he had five children. In religious faith he was a Catholic, and in politics adhered to the democratic party.

Charles Leslie Medley was reared on the farm in Hardin County, where he attended the public schools and afterward Cecelian College, from which he was graduated. Coming then to Daviess County, he was engaged in farming in partnership with a brother for a few years, and then began the study of medicine in the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville, Kentucky, from which institution he received his degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1896. On July 2, 1896, Doctor Medley came to Rome, Daviess County, where he resided and successfully practiced medicine for sixteen years, during which period he was a member of the Daviess County and the Kentucky State Medical societies. In 1912 Doctor Medley retired from the practice of medicine and moved from Rome to his present farm of 420 acres, which he has developed into one of the best farms of the county, erecting on it splendid barns and a beautiful frame residence. Besides carrying on a general farming business he has bought and sold cattle and other live stock, and in all of his endeavors he has been attended with a gratifying success.

In 1808 Doctor Medley was married to Miss Katie (Catherine) Bryan, a native of Daviess County, and they have two sons: Lawrence Hubert and Roy Bernard. Like his father Doctor Medley is a Catholic and a democrat.

LEXINGTON UTILITIES COMPANY with the Kentucky Traction and Terminal Company, comprise a corporate entity that operates a large part of the electric lines over Central Kentucky radiating out of Lexington, and also other industries dependent upon electric power. The Lexington Utilities Company operates power and lighting plants, ice plants and cold storage, while the Kentucky Traction and Terminal Company is the managing corporation for local street and interurban lines. These corporations employ between 250 and 300 persons, with a monthly payroll of $275,000. The Traction Company has 93.79 miles of trackage, with 85 cars, and in 1920 these cars carried 6,673,649 passengers and the rolling stock traveled 1,565,885 miles. The Kentucky Traction and Terminal Company operates the local transportation systems in Lexington, Frankfort, Winchester, Paris and Georgetown, and the interurban service between Lexington, Versailles, Frankfort, Paris, Georgetown and Nicholasville. The 9,000 kilowatt power plant of the Utility Company not only supplies current for the car lines but power and lighting service to local companies at Paris, Georgetown, Frankfort, Versailles, Midway, Tyrone, Stamping Ground, Forks of Elkhorn, Winchester and Mount Sterling. The Utilities Company owns the Lexington Gas Plant, which is leased to the Central Kentucky Natural Gas Company. The ice plant has a capacity of over 200 tons daily production, with a 5,000 ton modern cold storage system. The distributing end of this business is conducted by the Lexington Ice Company, which distributes in excess of 50,000 tons of ice annually.

The ownership of these utilities is vested in the Kentucky Securities Corporation, the holding company, with headquarters at Philadelphia, the president being P. M. Chandler and the vice president F. W. Bacon. The executive officials in Kentucky are Thomas D. Murray, secretary; J. Will Stoll, treasurer, and J. P. Pope, general manager.

In 1889 a group of independently managed utility companies, but all under the same ownership, supplied service to Lexington and vicinity. They were the Passenger & Belt Railway Company, the Belt Electric Line Company, the Central Electric Company and the Hercules Ice Company. These were merged into the Lexington Railway Company, but later this corporation was dissolved and by the acquisition of the Blue Grass Traction Company, the Central Kentucky Traction Company to Nicholasville and the Versailles lines, a new corporation known as the Lexington & Interurban Railways Company was formed, and subsequently the transportation features were concentrated under one corporation, while the power and other utilities became the Lexington Utilities Company.

The first secretary of the corporation was Jacob S. Keller, who was succeeded by F. V. Bartlett, and since 1893 T. D. Murray has been the secretary.

Mr. Murray was born at Lexington in September, 1859, a son of Patrick and Bee (Devlin) Murray. His parents were born and married in Ireland. His father had come to America as a child, went back to Ireland and was married at the age of eighteen. They came direct to Kentucky before the days of railroads, and spent the rest of their lives in that city. Patrick Murray for many years was connected with the old Gas Company. He was an active democrat. He died at the age of eighty-six and his wife at eighty-four, and at their deaths they were the oldest members of St. Paul's Catholic Church.

T. D. Murray attended St. Paul's School and the State University, and his early business career was connected with the Adams Express Company, the Louisville and Nashville Railroad as cashier, was agent of the Baltimore & Ohio Express and the United States Express Company, and subsequently joined the force operating the Hercules Ice Company and became superintendent. In 1893 he was secretary of the Passenger & Belt Railroad Company, which built a belt line about Lexington. He was also secretary of the Belt Electric Line Company, successor to the old horse line street railway company, and was secretary of the Central Electric Company, which supplied light and power, and secretary of the Hercules Ice Company. When these institutions were consolidated he became secretary of the resulting corporations, and has been giving his time and efforts to this work for thirty years or more. Mr. Murray has long enjoyed the confidence not only of the owners of these utilities but also of the public which they serve, and is a man of methodical business methods, has trained and inspired the personnel of his office with his own ideas, and has every detail of his business well under hand. He has never married. He is a member of the Catholic Church.

JOHN L. BUCKLEY is joint owner with James C. Stone of the Central & Planters Tobacco Warehouse Company of Lexington. For a number of years he has been one of the prominent men in the handling of the great tobacco crop of Central Kentucky, and some of the interesting developments in the history of the business within the last twenty years have been promoted by him.

Mr. Buckley was born in Mason County, Kentucky, August 25, 1878, a son of Thomas and Elizabeth (Weimer) Buckley, the former a native of Mason and the latter of Bracken County. In 1885 the family moved to Fayette County, on the South Elkhorn, and six years later to a farm in Bourbon County, where Thomas Buckley lived until his death, at the age of seventy-five. His widow is still living at Lexington.

On the old farm, since sold, John L. Buckley grew to manhood. He was one of a family of two sons and five daughters. His brother, B. L. Buckley, is a resident of Lexington. After two years in Georgetown College John L. Buckley returned and took charge of the home farm, and subsequently became its proprietor. He began dealing in tobacco at Georgetown at the age of twenty-three, and remained there four years, building up one of the leading businesses of the kind in that section of the state. He then removed to Lexington and became warehouse manager for the Lexington Tobacco Warehouse Company, and after a year was made vice president of the company. His present partner, J. C. Stone, was president of the company. He continued with that business until its liquidation, and in 1918 he and Mr. Stone bought the Planters and the Central warehouses, which have since been conducted by the Central and Planters Tobacco Warehouse Company. Through this organization a large part of the crop of the Burley district has been handled and marketed. The firm are also extensively interested in the production of tobacco, operating a farm of 475 acres with tobacco as the chief crop. Mr. Buckley and Mr. Stone were also members of the syndicate which bought and developed Ashland Park, the old home of Henry Clay, and they have been connected with a number of transactions involving some of the largest farm properties in Central Kentucky, including the Mary Moore farm in Scott County, the Solomon Van Meter Farm, the Will Watts farm near Athens, the Kingston Stud farm on Russell Cave Pike.

In 1910 Mr. Buckley married Miss May Elizabeth Carrick, daughter of Robert A. and Betty Carrick, farmers near Mount Horeb. Mr. and Mrs. Buckley have two children, Dorothy G. and Amelia Carrick. Mr. Buckley is a member of the Lexington Club.

EDMUND R. ACKERMAN is one of the popular young citizens and business men of Lexington, which city has been his home since 1910. He is secretary and treasurer of Louis des Cognets & Company, dealers in building material and coal and contractors.

Mr. Ackerman was born at Alderson, West Virginia, June 11, 1890. His father, A. M. Ackerman, was for a number of years a railroad man with home at Jacksonville, Florida, and Edmund R. grew up in that southern city, was educated there, and was an office employe of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad.

Mr. Ackerman came to Lexington May 13, 1910, and married Sidney D. Williams. Her father, Sidney Williams, was founder of the Lexington Laundry and identified with that industry until his death. Mrs. Ackerman still holds an interest in the company. Deciding to remain in Lexington, Mr. Ackerman was an employe in the local offices of the Southern Railway, and in 1913 joined Louis des Cognets & Company as a clerk, and since 1918 has been secretary and treasurer of the corporation and has largely handled its business details and office affairs. The company does an extensive business in coal, building material, except lumber, and has a large force and facilities engaged in handling building work. During the building season the company employs from sixty to seventy men, and about half as many at all times.

Mr. Ackerman is a member of the Kiwanis Club and the Board of Commerce. He and Mrs. Ackerman have one daughter, Katherine R.

REZIN MCKEE SCOBEE. Among those who are prominently identified with the lumber industry of Clark County is found Rezin McKee Scobee, in charge of a large lumber and planing mill business at Winchester. Mr. Scobee has devoted thirty years of his business life to the development of this enterprise, which in its importance and prosperity stands as a monument to his business sagacity, good management and unflinching industry. He was born on Mount Sterling Pike, nine miles from Winchester in Clark County, March 8, 1870, his parents being Rice Pendleton and Martha (Chorn) Scobee.

Robert Scobee, the grandfather of Rezin M., was born in Kentucky, of Scotch-Irish stock, and as a young man settled in Clark County, where he spent the rest of his life in agricultural pursuits and died at the age of sixty-five years. He was the father of four sons: Rice P.; R. A.; R. S. (present police judge) and J. W., all being residents of Winchester. Rice Pendleton Scobee was born in Clark County, in 1838, and was engaged in farming until 1890, at which time, with his son Rezin M. he founded the present lumber business. He still has an interest therein, but has not been actively connected with business affairs for the past fifteen years. Although he has reached the age of seventy-two years, he is alert in both mind and body and attends to the daily routine of his affairs with the energy and regularity of those many years his junior. A democrat in politics, he has always taken an intelligent interest in community matters, and at one time served in the capacity of mayor of Winchester and gave his city an excellent administration. His religious connection is with the Primitive Baptist Church. Mr. Scobee married Martha Chorn, daughter of Joseph and Martha Jane (Thomson) Chorn, the former family of Montgomery County and the latter of Clark County. Mrs. Scobee's mother dying in her infancy, her father subsequently removed to Kansas City, Missouri, where his death occurred, and Mrs. Scobee was reared by her grandmother Thomson. She passed away in April, 1919, at the age of sixty-seven years. There were four sons and one daughter in the family of Mr. and Mrs. Scobee: James Chorn, of Winchester, a thresherman who also engaged in other lines of machine work; Rezin McKee; Robert Fletcher, who is identified with the lumber company at Winchester; Nancy, the widow of D. H. Bratton and living with her father; and Columbus Thomson, who met an accidental death at the age of fourteen years while engaged in cleaning his rifle.

Rezin McKee Scobee was educated in the public schools, and as a young man spent two years in a country store at Thomson Station. He then, in 1890, came with his father to Winchester, where for thirty years he has been identified with the lumber business and planing mill. This enterprise was incorporated in 1898 as R. P. Scobee & Son Company, and represents an investment of $100,000. The concern caters to fine mill work, and each year the business has shown a gratifying advance. Mr. Scobee has an excellent reputation in business circles, and is a director in the City National Bank. He has investments in oil lands, from which he receives royalties, and is otherwise identified with important commercial affairs. His only fraternal connection is with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in which he has numerous friends, as he has also in other avenues of city activity.

Mr. Scobee was united in marriage in 1897 with Miss Mary French Tracy, who was born in Clark County, daughter of B. A. Tracy, of Winchester, and to this union there have been born three daughters: Martha McKee, a student at Stuart Hall, Staunton, Virginia; Mary Tracy; and Elizabeth Stuart, who died at the age of two years. Mrs. Scobee is prominent in social and literary circles of Winchester, and is active in the Fortnightly Club, a literary body.

ROBERT LEE CLARK, of Daviess County, in which he was born December 4, 1879, is one of the best and most favorably known citizens and business men of this region. Mr. Clark comes of a highly respected Kentucky family. His father, Frank W. Clark, was born near Fairfield, Nelson County, Kentucky, in 1834, and was a son of Basil and Susan (Rapier) Clark. Basil Clark came of an old Virginia family of English origin, and his wife was of French extraction. He is believed to have been born in Nelson County, Kentucky, and there he became a wealthy planter and slaveholder. About the time of the outbreak of the war between the North and the South he sold his possessions and, going to Louisville, Kentucky, invested his money in a wholesale drug business, buying an interest in an established firm of that city, but owing to misrepresentations on the part of his associates he suffered a heavy financial loss. With his son, Frank W. Clark, he then moved to Marion, Kentucky, where the former conducted a retail drug store during the trying days of the war, and suffered a heavy loss on account of goods furnished the Federal troops, for which he did not receive any remuneration, nor has the Government ever allowed his claim.

About the time of the close of the war Frank W. Clark and his father came to Daviess County, and here he, a man of education, a graduate of Saint Mary's College, received due appreciation and became an influential citizen and lived a useful life, dying at the age of seventy-six years, in 1910. For many years in addition to farming he followed the saw-mill and threshing business with fair success, and established a tile yard near Panther Creek on the Calhoun Road, in the vicinity of Moseleyville, in 1895. For fifteen years he served as a magistrate, and it is said of him that seldom did he hold open court. A great lover of peace, he always tried, and generally succeeded, to get litigants to settle their differences without going to law and trial. For years he was a leader in public affairs, and was a pioneer and strong advocate of good roads, promoting and helping to build the first macadamized road in Daviess County. He was a devout Catholic, and to his influence and support is due in large part the founding of Saint Martin's

JAMES B. SPEED

Church, as well as its early growth. In politics he was a staunch democrat.

Frank W. Clark was twice married. His first wife was Susan E. Smith, and his second was Mary Berry, who bore him ten children, six sons, of whom two are deceased, and four daughters. The eldest son, Charles R., resides at Cannelton, Indiana, where he is engaged in an ice business. Robert L., Joseph E. and Henry Clark, the other living sons, conduct the tiling business established by their father, under the name of the Clark Manufacturing Company. The company manufactures drain and building tile, and has two factories, one near Moseleyville and one at Ashleyburg, the latter being managed by Joseph E. Clark. The brothers also have farm lands and interests.

Robert Lee Clark was educated in the public schools of his native county and Gethsemane College. He is a Catholic in church faith, and a democrat in politics, although not a partisan. In fraternal matters he maintains membership with the Knights of Columbus.

In 1906 Robert Lee Clark was united in marriage with Teresa Bumm, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Bumm, who came to Daviess County from Indiana, where Mrs. Clark was born. Mr. and Mrs. Clark have had seven children born to them, two of whom died in infancy. Their living children are: Martin, Bernedette, Sylvester, Magdalene and Aloysius.

JAMES BRECKENRIDGE SPEED was a Union soldier in a Kentucky regiment, and from the close of the Civil war until his death in 1912 was closely and prominently identified with the commercial affairs of Louisville, where his name should be one of those most distinguished in his generation.

He represented an old and prominent family in Kentucky, lived in this state most of his life, but was born at Boonville, Missouri, January 4, 1844. His parents were William P. and Mary Ellen (Shallcross) Speed. His maternal grandfather, Capt. John Shallcross, was at one time owner and captain of steamboats on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. The paternal grandfather of the late Mr. Speed was Judge John Speed, of Jefferson County, Kentucky. He was one of the well-known and influential citizens of Louisville in early days, and several of his sons became men of national distinction, one of whom was Hon. James Speed, at one time United States attorney-general; another was Maj. Philip Speed, and still another was Joshua F. Speed, frequently mentioned in all the biographies of Abraham Lincoln as one of his closest friends.

When James Breckenridge Speed was a small boy his mother died and he was reared by his paternal aunt, Mrs. Lucy Speed Breckenridge, widow of James D. Breckenridge, who was a Kentucky representative in Congress from 1821 to 1823. Mr. Speed therefore grew up at Louisville, attended the schools of that city, and when quite young went to work as clerk in a banking house. From Louisville he went to Chicago, and was employed in a bank in that city when the Civil war broke out. Seeking active service in the Union army he returned to Kentucky and became adjutant of the Twenty-seventh Kentucky Infantry. He did his duty as a soldier until the close of the war in 1865.

He was then twenty-one years of age, and at once took up his business career at Louisville. In later years he became known for his official interest in a number of leading business corporations, but the business in which he was longest engaged was represented by J. B. Speed & Company, dealers in lime, cement and building material. He was head of this firm at the time of his death, which occurred July 7, 1912. He had at different times served as president and executive officer of the Louisville Cement Company, the Louisville Street Railway Company, the Ohio Valley Telephone Company, and also as a director in banks and other corporations.

Mr. Speed had the distinction of erecting the first building in the United States exclusively devoted and equipped for telephone purposes. This was at Louisville.

In 1867 James B. Speed married Cora Coffin, daughter of George W. Coffin, of Cincinnati. His two children by this marriage are William S., whose career as a Louisville citizen is noted elsewhere, and Olive, who became the wife of F. M. Sackett, of Louisville.

July 3, 1906, Mr. Speed married Miss Hattie Bishop, who survives him and resides at 505 West Ormsby Street. She was born in Louisville, youngest of the eight children of William and Jane (Fletcher) Bishop. Her father was born in Snowhill, Maryland, and her mother in England.

WILLIAM S. SPEED is a Louisville business man and head of several manufacturing, coal and other corporations that have their headquarters in Kentucky's metropolis. Mr. Speed has lived in Louisville all his life, is widely and favorably known in business and social affairs, and is a son of the late James Breckenridge Speed.

William S. Speed was born at Louisville September 10, 1873. He was educated in the Louisville High School, and in 1895 graduated from Rose Polytechnic Institute at Terre Haute, Indiana. He has been out of college therefore a quarter of a century, and that measures his active participation in the business affairs of his home city. He became an active associate of his father in the cement industry, and was first vice president and general manager of the Louisville Cement Company. In 1912, following the death of his father, he became president of this corporation and also president of the North Jellico Coal Company and also the Taylor Coal Company, now the Beaver Dam Coal Company. Mr. Speed is now president of the J. B. Speed Salt Company and vice president of the Pioneer Coal Company.

He has not been a seeker for the honors of any public office. Socially he is a member of the Pendennis Club, the Audubon Country Club, Louisville Country Club, American Society of Mechanical Engineers, and his recreations are golf and automobiling.

November 16, 1904, Mr. Speed married Miss Virginia Perrin, a native of San Francisco, California. They have two daughters, Alice H. and Virginia H.

WILLIAM COPPIN has been actively associated with one business in Covington for a period of forty-five years, entering it when the proprietor was his brother, the late John R. Coppin, and making his services count in its development until today the John R. Coppin Company, of which he is vice president, conducts one of the largest dry goods establishments in Kentucky.

Mr. Coppin represents an old and prominent family of Cincinnati, in which city he was born October 3, 1863. His grandfather, Joseph Coppin, was born in Norwich, England, in 1791, and as a child was brought to the United States. He was one of the boy marchers in the procession through the streets of New York City at the time of President George Washington's funeral. Later he moved to Cincinnati, became a leading builder of boats for river traffic, and died in that city in 1884, at the age of ninety-three. His son William Coppin, Sr., was born in Cincinnati December 14, 1821, was reared and married in his native city, and for many years was a carpenter and builder. In 1894, on retiring from business, he located at Covington, where his death occurred June 26, 1905. He was an old school and staunch democrat in politics, and was affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. William Coppin, Sr., married Mary Roberts, who was born in England May 27, 1828, and died August 24, 1921, at the age of ninety-three. Her father, John Roberts, came to the United States with his family in 1829, locating at Cincinnati, and did an extensive business as a contractor for large stone buildings, erecting a number of business structures on Broadway and other streets in Cincinnati. He lived in that city until his death. John Roberts married a Miss Buckley, who also died in Cincinnati. Mrs. William Coppin, Sr., was reared and educated in Cincinnati. She became the mother of nine children: Edwin, who was in the real estate business, died at Cincinnati January 4, 1904; John R., founder of the John R. Coppin Company at Covington, died at that city December 21, 1913; Joseph, a stone cutter by trade, died at Cincinnati, July 17, 1918; Miss Lizzie Belle, a resident of Covington; Mrs. Florence Teagle, of Cincinnati; Emma, who died at Covington, July 24, 1915; William; George, who died at Cincinnati, August 27, 1883, and Lena, who died young.

William Coppin grew up in Cincinnati and left school at the age of thirteen, since which time his energies have been fully devoted to business. Mr. Coppin has never married. For nine months he was employed by his brother Edwin in the real estate office. He then became an employee of his brother John R. in the dry goods store established by him in 1873. John R. Coppin started a mercantile career in a very small way, his first store being at 607 Madison Avenue. He had all the talents of a thorough business man and merchant, and long before his death had the satisfaction of seeing his business known as one of the leading stores of Kentucky. His able associate and lieutenant was his younger brother William, who assumed increasing responsibilities in the business, and since 1906 has been vice president of the company. In 1880 the store was removed to 530 Madison Avenue, and continued growth brought it to its present quarters at Seventh Street and Madison Avenue, to the Coppin Building, a seven-story structure, part of which is leased to sixty-four office tenants, while three floors and basement are occupied by the store. Each of these floors are 50x200 feet, with an L-shaped part 50x70 feet. During the last four years the business has more than quadrupled, increasing from an annual turnover of about two hundred thousand dollars to a volume of a million dollars. The officers of the company are: Frank F. Thorpe, president; William Coppin, vice president; William Macklin, secretary; and Eugene Sterne, treasurer.

Mr. Coppin is also president of the Suburban Perpetual Building Association of Covington, a member of the Industrial Club, and his time, influence and purse were generously associated with all the movements for raising funds and promoting other patriotic objects in Kenton County during the World war period. Mr. Coppin is an independent in politics.

JAMES BROWN FRENCH. After a useful life devoted to agricultural pursuits James Brown French, familiarly known as "Doctor" French, of Daviess County, passed to his last reward, leaving behind him a record for kindly deeds, charitable impulses nobly carried out and an honorable life.

James Brown French was born in Hardin county, Kentucky, November 21, 1856, a son of John and Irene (Goodwin) French. His father was a farmer by occupation and "Doctor" French was reared on the homestead and taught farming in all of its essentials. He attended the district schools and in his youth studied medicine, although he never practiced it, and because of his being qualified to enter the profession he was known all over the neighborhood as "Doctor."

On September 23, 1892, Mr. French was united in marriage with Miss Lydia Bell Igleheart, a native of Daviess County, and a daughter of John L. and Amanda (Burns) Igleheart, also natives of Daviess County. The paternal grandfather of Mrs. French was William D. Igleheart, who was born in Maryland, from whence he came to Kentucky in 1800, and settled in Daviess County. He was of Holland lineage, as the American progenitor of the family came from that country to the American Colonies at an early day and located at Baltimore, Maryland.

At the time of his marriage Mr. French settled on a farm near Handyville, Daviess County, and there he resided and was successfully engaged in farming until his death, which occurred December 18, 1918. Mr. and Mrs. French became the parents of three children, namely: Orian, who is deceased, Irene and John.

JOHN WILLIAM MENZIES, JR. While a regularly qualified lawyer and member of the Kenton County Bar, John William Menzies, Jr., has given practically all his time and attention to his official duties with the United States District Court at Covington. For a number of years he has been clerk of the Federal Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky.

His father was the late John William Menzies, one of the eminent members of the Kentucky bench and bar in the nineteenth century. Born in Bourbon County in 1819, he removed to Boone County at the age of twelve, attended the University of Virginia, and as a young man located at Covington, where he began his career as a lawyer. In early life he was affiliated with the old whig party, later becoming a democrat, though during the Civil war he was a staunch Union man. He represented the Sixth Kentucky District in Congress during Lincoln's first administration. After his term in Congress he resumed private practice at Covington and then was elected chancery judge, an office to which he gave his painstaking and careful administration for a period of twenty-eight years. For two years after retiring from the bench he continued his law practice, and he died while on a visit to Falmouth in Pendleton County in 1897. He was affiliated with the Presbyterian Church. His first wife was a Miss Butler, and by that union there is one surviving daughter, Fannie Hawkins, now living at Springfield, Missouri. Her husband was Capt. X. Hawkins, who served as a captain of cavalry in the Confederate army under General Morgan, and after the war removed to Springfield, Missouri, where he was engaged in the lumber business until his death in 1917. Judge Menzies married for his second wife Samuella Peniston, who was born in Boone County, Kentucky, in 1832, and died at Fort Mitchell, Kentucky, in 1908. She was the mother of eight children, John William, Jr., being the youngest; the oldest, Lillie, is the wife of A. K. Barber, law librarian at Helena, Montana; Sallie, wife of L. T. Applegate, an attorney and active member of the Covington bar; Ann, librarian of the Carnegie Public Library at Covington, is the widow of Joseph Spears, a farmer who died in Bourbon County; the fourth of the family was Finnell Whitley, a graduate of Hanover College, Indiana, who died at the early age of twenty-two; Katherine is the wife of Isaac Kinsey, a retired business man still retaining connections with the Willys-Overland Company of Toledo, their home being at Winterhaven, Florida; Elizabeth is the wife of John G. Simrall, a well known insurance and real estate man at Covington; Nellie, the seventh and next to the youngest, is the wife of F. D. Van Wrinkle, president of the Post-Glover Electric Company and a resident of Fort Mitchell.

John William Menzies, Jr., was born in Pendleton County, Kentucky, November 28, 1874, was educated in the grammar and high schools of Covington, but at the age of sixteen left school to enter the employ of Post & Company, manufacturers of railroad and electrical supplies. He remained with that house two years, for another two years was at the head of the testing department of the Dayton Manufacturing Company at Dayton, Ohio, and for five years was at Cincinnati as chief clerk for Louis Hood, superintendent of the Kentucky Central Division of the Louisville & Nashville Railway Company. For another year he was solicitor for the Central of Georgia Railway at Cincinnati.

Though he had some very heavy duties while with these railroad corporations Mr. Menzies began and carried on successfully the study of law by attending night classes in the McDonald Institute at Cincinnati.

He was graduated in 1900 and soon afterward admitted to the Kenton County bar. About that time he became deputy clerk and commissioner under Joseph C. Finnell in the Federal courts for the Eastern Kentucky District. He was appointed deputy November 1, 1901, and about ten years later, on the death of Mr. Finnell on March 2, 1911, he was honored by Federal District Judge A. M. J. Cochran with appointment as Mr. Finnell's successor, his long experience and service admirably qualifying him for the line of duties with which he was already familiar. For ten years Mr. Menzies has been clerk of the Federal District Court, with offices in the Federal Building at Covington.

He is a member of the Kenton County Bar Association, the Kentucky Bar Association and the American Bar Association, is a republican, has served as a deacon in the Southern Presbyterian Church, is past junior warden of Colonel Clay Lodge No. 159, Free and Accepted Masons, at Covington, a member of Indra Consistory No. 2 of the Scottish Rite and Oleika Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Lexington. He is a member of the Industrial Club of Covington and in 1920 resigned after twelve years of official service in the Fort Mitchell Country Club, of which he is still a member. He was associated with Covington and Kenton County citizens in promoting the objects of the Government during the World war, taking an active part in several of the drives for funds.

Mr. Menzies owns a modern home at 119 Iris Road, at Fort Mitchell. He married at Covington December 21, 1915, Miss Ollie Mitchell, daughter of Thomas and Laura (Mun) Mitchell. Her parents are deceased. Her father was chief deputy United States Marshal for the Eastern District of Kentucky. Mrs. Menzies completed her education in the College of Richmond, Kentucky. They have three children: John William III, who died in infancy; Elizabeth Mitchell, born May 26, 1918; and John Whitley Menzies, born February 16, 1920. Mr. Menzies is a great-great-grandson of Col. W. Whitley, the early settler of Kentucky and famous Indian fighter and for whom his second son, John Whitley, was named.

JOHN B. O'NEAL took up the law as a profession worthy of all the talents and energy he could concentrate upon it. With rare gifts as a speaker and orator, doubtless part of his inheritance from Irish ancestry, he has refrained from using them to his own advantage in politics, and is one of the comparatively few lawyers who have practiced thirty years or more and have no political record. However, Mr. O'Neal's services have been in great demand as a speaker upon patriotic and civic occasions, and while never a candidate he has more than once been a real leader in public movements in his part of the state around Covington.

Mr. O'Neal was born in Grant County, Kentucky, March 28, 1864. The O'Neals have been in Kentucky for at least a century. Their original home was Ireland, where one of the family headed an insurrection against the established government, and when it failed he sought refuge in Colonial Virginia. The grandfather of the Covington lawyer was George O'Neal, who was born in Shelby County, Kentucky, but spent most of his life as a farmer and planter in Boone County, where he died in 1872. He married Sarah Sleet, a native of Boone County, who died there in 1870. Their children included besides the late Weden O'Neal, Dr. W. S., a physician and surgeon, who died at Lancaster, Kentucky; Ben, for many years a farmer in Boone County, now living in Ohio; John, a retired farmer of Boone County; and George, in the insurance business at New Richmond, Ohio.

Weden O'Neal was born in Boone County in 1839 and died at the home of his son John in Kenton County in 1906. He was reared in Boone County, but during the Civil war moved to Grant County. He was a Union man, and was all through the war as a soldier and officer of the northern armies. He entered the service as a captain and at the age of twenty-six was made colonel commanding the Fifty-fifth Kentucky Infantry, and was with that regiment in all its battles and campaigns. He moved in 1861 to Grant County, where he owned several stores. Before the war he attended old Transylvania College at Lexington, and when the war was over studied law, and in 1870 moved to Covington, where he engaged in practice until he retired about 1897, on account of ill health. He was one of the eminent members of the Kentucky bar during the last half of the nineteenth century, and he was leading counsel in the trial of many criminal cases. He was noted for his oratory both in the courtroom and as a speaker in political campaigns. He was a stalwart republican, and a member of the Christian Church and the Masonic fraternity. Weden O'Neal married Carolina Fenley, who was born at Crittenden in Grant County, Kentucky, in 1842, and died at Covington in 1903. The Fenley family were a mixture of Scotch-Irish and English, and was represented by military service in the Revolutionary war. Her father was Capt. John Fenley, who was born in Culpeper County, Virginia, in 1800, and as a youth of eighteen crossed the Alleghanies to Kentucky and located at what is now Crittenden in Grant County. He was a planter and slave holder there and died in 1863. Of the three children of Weden O'Neal, John B. is the oldest; George was a merchant, lived at Winton Place, Cincinnati, but died in Indiana in 1895; and Zue Lou is the wife of George B. Ranshaw, one of the most talented members of the Christian Church, now engaged in community organization work at Rome, New York.

John B. O'Neal was about six years of age when his father moved to Covington, and he attended the public schools of that city, finishing his junior year in high school. He studied law in his father's office, was admitted to practice in 1886, and from that year to the present a growing clientage has absorbed his time and made him one of the busiest attorneys of Northern Kentucky. His offices are in the Cohen Building.

Mr. O'Neal has a beautiful country home, located on Dudley Pike, eight miles south of Covington. Besides his residence he has thirty acres of well kept ground, and also owns other land nearby.

Among those who contributed to Covington's war record no one local citizen worked harder and more effectively than Mr. O'Neal. He spoke all over the county in behalf of the various drives, almost giving up his law practice to devote himself to the needs of the Government. He suggested and helped carry out many of the prompt measures by which the outcrop of sedition was suppressed, and had an active share in the disagreeable but essential service of prosecuting cases of slackers and other traitors, some of whom are serving in Federal prison.

In 1903 Mr. O'Neal married Miss Stella McDonnell at Cincinnati. She is a daughter of Bernard and Annie McDonnell, now deceased, both natives of Ireland. Her father was a carriage maker at Cincinnati. Mrs. O'Neal shares in the intellectual as well as the domestic life of Mr. O'Neal, and is one of the best educated women of Covington. She attended a private school and also a convent in Brown County, Ohio.

MATTHEW LAWLER HARBESON, judge of the Common Law and Equity Division of the Kenton Circuit Court, was admitted to the Kentucky bar a little more than thirty years ago, was for a number of years associated in practice with the late Governor Goebel, whom he succeeded in the State Senate, and for sixteen years has presided on the bench at Covington in his present capacity.

Judge Harbeson represents a family that was established in Kentucky about the time the first state in the western wilderness was carved. He came soon after 1790, the pioneer being his great-grandfather. He settled either in Mason or Fleming County. The Harbesons have been in America since Colonial days, and they originated in County Antrim, Ireland. The grandfather of Judge Harbeson was Benjamin Harbeson, a native of Fleming County, who spent his life there as a farmer.

The late John M. Harbeson, father of Judge Harbeson, was born near Washington, Mason County, Kentucky, February 11, 1834. He was reared in Mason and Fleming counties, married in the latter county, and until after the Civil war held the office of Circuit Court clerk. In 1869 he removed to Augusta, and for many years was a prominent figure in banking and business affairs, being associated with the Allen-Harbeson Company Bank at Augusta until his death on September 2, 1901. He did much good as a citizen of his community, though a man of liberal views in politics and a democrat without partisanship. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity. John M. Harbeson married Frances Anne Metcalfe, who was born in Mason County in 1836 and died at Augusta April 5, 1915. They were the parents of five children: Mary Lawler, of Augusta, widow of George Doniphan, for many years an attorney at Augusta; Benjamin, cashier of the First National Bank of Augusta; successor to the old Allen-Harbeson Company Bank which his father helped establish; Anna Belle, wife of James W. Fitzgerald, an official of the Home Tobacco Warehouse Company of Maysville, Kentucky; Matthew L.; and Georgie Bruce, a teacher of music living at Augusta.

Matthew Lawler Harbeson was born at Flemingsburg, Fleming County, Kentucky, February 9, 1869, and supplemented his advantages in the common schools by attending the celebrated old Augusta College, in which he completed the junior year. In 1887, at the age of eighteen, he entered the Cincinnati Law School and received his LL. B. degree in the spring of 1889. After qualifying as a young attorney he entered the law office of the late William Goebel of Covington, and was associated with the practice of Governor Goebel until the latter's assassination in February, 1900. In March of that year he was elected to the State Senate to succeed Mr. Goebel, serving the extra summer session of 1900. In November, 1901, he was an unsuccessful candidate in the democratic primaries for nomination for the United States Senate, his competitor being Joseph L. Rhinock.

Judge Harbeson had a general law practice at Covington until he was elevated to the bench. In November, 1905, he was again elected a member of the State Senate, serving during the session of 1905-06. It was at the close of the session that Governor Beckham appointed him judge of the Common Law and Equity Division of the Kenton Circuit Court. He was elected in 1908 for a short term, and in 1909 was re-elected for a full six year term, and again given a similar honor in 1915, his present term on the bench expiring in January, 1922. Judge Harbeson is one of the most popular lawyers and public officials in Northern Kentucky, and has had no opposition by either the democrats or republicans in his contest for the judgeship.

During the World war Judge Harbeson was colonel for the First Ward in all the Bond and Red Cross drives, and he gladly accepted every opportunity presented to further the cause of the Government. He is a member of the Kenton County and Kentucky State Bar Associations, and is affiliated with Myrtle Lodge No. 5, Knights of Pythias, and with Covington Lodge No. 314 of the Elks.

Judge Harbeson's residence is at 408 Riverside Drive, the house and grounds overlooking the valley of the Ohio River. On June 15, 1891, at Augusta, Kentucky, he married Miss Alice Gibbons, daughter of W. A. and Virginia (Morgan) Gibbons, who make their home with Judge and Mrs. Harbeson. Her father is a retired tobacconist. Mrs. Harbeson is a woman of education and culture, having completed her education in Miss Blades' private school at Augusta.

WILLIAM WILSON, as assistant state tax commissioner of Kentucky, is one of the best known public officials in the northern part of the state. He has been a resident of Covington for nearly twenty years, and has had a large and varied experience in public affairs both affecting the city and county and the larger district over which his present supervision extends.

Mr. Wilson was born in Grant County, Kentucky, September 20, 1879. Grant County has been the home of the family for more than a century. His paternal ancestors were English and Colonial settlers in Virginia. A native of Virginia, his great-grandfather, Jesse Wilson, came over the mountains in pioneer times and was one of the early settlers in Grant County, Kentucky, where he followed farming and planting until his death. The grandfather, James H. Wilson, was born in 1807 and died in 1891, having lived all his life in the same house in Grant County. He farmed on a large scale, was a man of high standing in his community, and he married Harriet Simpson, also a lifelong resident of Grant County, where she was born in 1826 and died in 1904.

H. C. Wilson, father of William Wilson of Covington, is still living in Grant County, where he was born in 1849. During his younger years he engaged in farming on an extensive scale. For ten years he was storekeeper and gauger in the United States internal revenue service, and after retiring from that office he resumed his place on the farm where he was born, and he still owns and operates that old property, which has been in the family for considerably more than a century. He also served ten years as constable in Grant County, is a republican in politics, and a very active supporter of the Christian Church. H. C. Wilson married Anna Jones, who was born in Scott County, Kentucky, in 1859. William is their oldest child. Blaine, the second, lives at Covington and is connected with the Andrews Steel Company at Newport, Kentucky. Nannie is the wife of Charles Gray, a farmer in Grant County. Jesse Grant, the youngest, is a locomotive engineer with the Baltimore & Ohio Railway, living at Covington.

William Wilson grew up on his father's farm in Grant County and had the advantages of the rural schools. When he was nineteen he became a teacher, and for four years he was busy teaching in the country districts of his native county. Leaving the farm and school, he came to Kentucky in 1902 and for five years was a Pullman car conductor. Since then all his time and energies have been taken up with official duties. For four years he was private secretary to John J. Craig, then mayor of Covington. For another two years he was cashier of the Covington Waterworks Department, and for four years court deputy in the sheriff's office. In 1918 the state tax commissioner appointed him assistant, supervising the assessments made by the county tax commissioners for the district comprising the counties of Kenton, Campbell, Bracken, Mason, Harrison, Grant, Pendleton, Boone, Gallatin, Carroll, Trimble, Owen, Oldham and Henry. His offices are in the City Building of Covington.

Mr. Wilson is one of the prominent members of the Tribe of Ben Hur in Kentucky, has represented the state at two Supreme Conventions, and for six years has been chairman of the Canvassing Committee of the Supreme Convention. He is also a member of Covington Lodge No. 314 of the Elks, is a republican in politics and a member, deacon and trustee of the First Christian Church of Covington. Mr. Wilson has been a member of the Industrial Club of Covington for the past four years, is a director in the East and West Kentucky Oil and Gas Company, and during the World war was a member of the Kenton County Council of Defense and active in all the local work done by patriotic citizens here.

His home is a modern residence at 717 West Southern Avenue. On May 29, 1901, he married at Union in Boone County, Kentucky, Miss Luella H. Hogan. Her parents, John W. and Frances (Surface) Hogan, reside at Erlanger in Kenton County, her father being a retired farmer.

HARRY MARTYN BRENNAN. The name of Harry Martyn Brennan has in recent years been associated with some of the largest constructive business enterprises in the City of Louisville. As a business man his work continues the honorable record made by his father, the late Thomas Brennan, who as an inventor and manufacturer brought special fame to Louisville and for years was a manufacturer of machinery that helped to lighten the burden of the world's agricultural class.

Thomas Brennan was born in Ireland, in Queens County, January 8, 1839, and was a child when his parents came to America and established a home at Louisville. He acquired his education in Louisville, and even as a young man gave proof of his remarkable inventive genius. Many patents were awarded him. He was the first to build a successful sawmill with an iron rack and pinion attachment. He and three other men were employed to construct the first locomotive engine for the Louisville & Nashville Railway Company. It was Thomas Brennan who really perfected and made successful the seed drilling machine by devising a combination of rubber tubing and an iron shoe which would permit such machines to be operated successfully over irregular surfaces. For many years he was a manufacturer of sawmill and agricultural machinery, and his special types of machines were exhibited all over the United States and at many State and World fairs. They were awarded twenty-seven first medals of honor and diplomas, some of his awards coming from the World's Fair of Chicago in 1893. Thomas Brennan retired from business in 1897. His principal recreation was travel. As early as 1879 he began spending summers at Petoskey, Michigan, and was there every summer until 1897. In later years he usually spent the winter months in Florida. He was one of the men who first exploited the commercial advantages of the famous Hot Springs of Arkansas, visiting that locality in the early '70s before it had been reached by a railroad. He established the first hardware store in the City of Hot Springs. He was a staunch democrat in politics. Thomas Brennan died February 27, 1914.

He married Anna Virginia Bruce, who was born at St. Helier, on the Isle of Jersey, January 25, 1843, and died May 13, 1908. Her father was Dr. Napoleon Gubbins Bruce. Thomas Brennan and wife had nine children, seven sons and two daughters, eight of whom are still living: Harry Martyn, Albert A., May B., Thomas, J., of Minneapolis, Dr. Robert E., of New York City, Dr. John A. O., of Louisville, N. Bruce, of Louisville, and Beulah.

Harry Martyn Brennan was born at Louisville and as a youth, showing some of his father's inclination towards mechanics, was given every opportunity to develop such talents. After attending the public schools of Louisville he entered the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at Boston, and after graduating in 1886 returned to Louisville and became a business associate of his father in the firm of Brennan & Company, conducting the Southwestern Agricultural Works at Louisville. This industry they continued until 1900, when the plant was sold to the American Seeding Machine Company. From 1901 to 1906 Mr. Brennan busied himself with his public duties as chairman of the Board of Public Safety of Louisville, and from 1906 to 1908 was gas inspector of the city. In January, 1909, he organized the Arctic Ice Company, and was president of the corporation until 1915, when the business was sold to the Merchants Ice & Cold Storage Company. Since then Mr. Brennan has been associated with the well known capitalist, Frank Fehr. He served as first vice president of the Central Consumers Company, was also associated with the Metropolitan Realty Company, and in January, 1920, he and Mr. Fehr and others organized the Frank Fehr Cold Storage Company, a corporation with a capital of $1,600,000. At the present writing this company has under construction the largest cold storage plant in the United States, completely equipped in every department with electrical facilities for refrigeration and for most expeditious handling of goods. Mr. Brennan is now president of this corporation. Socially he is a member of the Pendennis Club and Louisville Lodge No. 8 of the Elks, and in politics is a democrat.

BENJAMIN M. VASTINE, commissioner of public works for the city of Covington, had special qualifications for this post of responsibility due to earlier official connections with the Department of Public Works and also as the result of a successful business he has built up as a contractor.

Mr. Vastine was born in Covington February 24, 1878, a son of John M. Vastine, who was born in Pennsylvania in 1855, and grandson of Benjamin M. Vastine, who brought his son John to Covington when the latter was a boy. John M. Vastine was reared and educated in the Kentucky city and was a widely known and successful newspaper man. He had charge of the Kentucky News Bureau of the Cincinnati Enquirer for a number of years. He was a democrat in politics, and died at Covington in 1893. His wife was Margaret Wanke, who was born in 1855 and died at Covington in 1891. She left two children, Benjamin M. and Odella. The latter is the wife of Joseph Papke, owner and operator of a chain of meat markets in Detroit, Michigan.

Benjamin M. Vastine was about thirteen years old when his mother died, and at that time he left the public schools to go to work as an apprentice in a saddlery manufacturing company in Cincinnati. After two years with that concern he changed his occupation and went to work in the rolling mills at Covington, went through the grades of apprentice and journeyman roller, and altogether spent thirteen years in the mills.

Mr. Vastine from 1907 to 1911 was assistant superintendent of public works for the city of Covington. On retiring from that office he used his capital, experience and wide acquaintance to establish a business as a general contractor, with facilities for the construction of roads, sewers and other public works. This business is still continued under the firm name of Vastine & Lowry, with offices at 515 West Sixth Street. In the modern road building plan in Kentucky, Vastine & Lowry have handled several important contracts. In 1916 the firm completed a contract for the construction of roads and streets at Maysville, Kentucky, to the value of ninety thousand dollars. In 1915 they handled a forty thousand dollar contract on the West Covington Highway. A number of other contracts might be enumerated, including one now in process of being carried out, a portion of the Dixie Highway in Kenton and Boone counties, this contract having been awarded to Vastine & Lowry for ninety thousand dollars.

Mr. Vastine was elected commissioner of public works for the city of Covington in November, 1919, and his official term of two years began in January, 1920. Among other business interests Mr. Vastine is owner of a farm in Boone County. He was a man of action during the war period in behalf of all patriotic causes in Kenton County, furnishing a generous share of his own means to assist in winning the war, and assuming duties of a particularly onerous nature as secretary of Local Draft Board No. 2 for the county. He is a republican in politics and is affiliated with Covington Lodge

No. 314 of the Elks. He owns a modern residence at 515 West Sixth Street. In 1902, at Covington, he married Miss Frances Kordenbrock, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Kordenbrock, the latter of whom died in Covington. The father, living with Mr. and Mrs. Vastine, is a retired machinist. REV. LOUIS HERBERTH, the scholarly and beloved pastor of Saint Martin's Catholic Church of Daviess County, was born in Wurzburg, Bavaria, Germany, August 23, 1866, a son of John and Catherine (Rauch) Herberth, who lived and died in Germany. Their son grew to manhood in his native land, and received a classical education there. His theological and philosophical training was obtained at the University of Louvain, Belgium, and June 29, 1892, he was ordained a priest by Bishop Van D. Vyver of Richmond, Virginia, who was then sojourning at Louvain.

In September, 1892, Reverend Herberth arrived in the United States, and his first work in this country was performed as assistant pastor of Saint Mary's Catholic Church at Louisville, Kentucky. After about two years spent in that parish he was for a brief period assistant pastor at Handerson and New Haven, Kentucky, and then returned to Louisville. From there he was sent to Paynesville, Kentucky. While at the latter city his health failed him and he was forced to seek a colder and more bracing climate, and from May to November, 1895, he was assistant pastor at Saint Michael's Catholic Church of Cleveland, Ohio. With improved health, Reverend Herberth then returned to Kentucky, and from November, 1895, to July, 1896, was assistant pastor of Saint Stephen's Church at Owensboro, where he remained until he left to assume the duties, July 25, 1896, of resident pastor of Saint Martin's Church, and has continued to discharge them ever since with dignified efficiency. His work is far-reaching in its influence for material, educational and spiritual good.

Saint Martin's Church is situated in a rich agricultural section, one mile south of Rome in Daviess County, and was established as a mission in 1871. It was attended by priests from Stanley and Owensboro for twenty years, among them being Reverends Croghaw, Vantroostenbargh, Abell, Pike and Riley. The last named priest, Rev. John H. Riley, became the first resident priest of the parish in November, 1891, and served as such until May, 1896. The first church house, a small frame structure, gave way to the present edifice, for which ground was broken July 25, 1893. This latter building has been improved and beautified under the administration of Reverend Herberth, and made one of modern convenience and excellent equipment, and lighted with electricity generated by machinery installed by Father Herberth. The parish house and many improvements have been provided through the energy and wisdom of the present pastor, and he has succeeded in making Saint Martin's Church a place of attractive beauty as a place of worship. Here eighty-five families receive spiritual guidance, and the needs of the rising generation are further provided for by a parish school which was established in 1912. A school building was erected and Sisters procured as teachers of it, and for the latter a suitable home was built. The attendance at the school increased to such an extent, the pupils in 1919 numbering 125, that in 1920 it was deemed necessary to erect a new school building of brick, and modern in construction and equipment. The school is under the supervision of four sisters.

In addition to the work at Saint Martin's Church Reverend Herberth attends mission churches at Calhoun and Ashbyburg, Kentucky. He has been and is a very busy man, thoroughly absorbed with his work, and possessed by a deep pride in his parish. He loves his people, and is in return loved by them. His popularity extends beyond his parishioners to others in the county, and by all he is held in the highest esteem as a priest, as a loyal and patriotic citizen, and as a true and generous friend.

ALLEN DENNIS SULLIVAN. Dentistry is recognized today as one of the most important branches of the surgical art. Trained and skillful dental surgeons capable of using all the facilities of the new science do as much for the health and welfare of humanity as any other group or class of professional men. Allen Dennis Sullivan, a doctor of dental surgery at Covington, has achieved especially high rank in his profession. He is associated in practice with his son, who had an interesting and honorable experience in the dental corps of the American army abroad during the period of the World war and for nearly a year afterward with the Army of Occupation.

The Sullivan family has lived in Kentucky well upwards of a century. John Dennis Sullivan, grandfather of Doctor Sullivan of Covington, was born in Ireland, and came to America when a young man with a brother and a cousin. He located at Frankfort, where he was overseer of public works. He died at the capital city during the cholera epidemic in the early fifties. He married Miss Redmon, of Anderson County, who died at Frankfort. His son, also named John Dennis Sullivan, was born at Frankfort March 8, 1846, and was reared and married in Anderson County. He actively engaged in farming and dealing in live stock, and later was in business as a general merchant at Ninevah, near Lawrenceburg, Kentucky, where he died December 3, 1902. He was a republican in politics and a very active supporter of the Christian Church and a member of the Masonic fraternity. He married Nancy J. Spears, who was born in Anderson County March 5, 1850. She and her youngest daughter, Miss Lizzie Mae, still own and operate the general store at Ninevah. Allen Dennis Sullivan is her oldest child. The daughter Sallie is the wife of E. L. Gillis, registrar of the Kentucky State University, living at Lexington. Lura E. is the wife of H. J. McBrayer, who lives at Ninevah and operates one of the largest farms in that section. The fourth child is Miss Lizzie Mae, at home with her mother.

Dr. Allen Dennis Sullivan was born at Glensboro in Anderson County, March 1, 1868, attended the rural schools of that section, took normal work in the Glensboro Academy, and was only sixteen when he qualified and began his work as a country school teacher in Anderson County. After three years he became a commercial salesman, and for a long period of years traveled over Southern Ohio and Northern Kentucky representing a wholesale tea and coffee house. He made many friends as a commercial traveler, was successful in the work, but desiring a more settled occupation he entered in 1900 the Ohio College of Dental Surgery, then a department of the University of Cincinnati, and pursued his studies until graduating with the degree D.D.S. in 1903. While in college he became a member of the Beta Chapter of the Phi Alpha Chi college fraternity. Doctor Sullivan began his practice at Covington and since 1911 his son Dr. John E. Sullivan has been his partner. They both represent the acme of skill and knowledge in their profession and have all the facilities for its adequate practice. They occupy well equipped offices at 405-406-415-416 in the First National Bank Building.

Dr. A. D. Sullivan is a republican, and for many years has been actively identified with the Madison Avenue Christian Church, serving as deacon, and for the past twelve years as an elder. Doctor Sullivan is one of the most prominent Masons in Kentucky, and his son Dr. John E. shares with him the honors of Masonry, being considered one of the best posted Scottish Rite Masons of the state. Dr. A. D. Sullivan is a past master of Latonia Lodge No. 746, Free and Accepted Masons, is past high priest of Covington

Chapter No. 35, Royal Arch Masons, a member of Kenton Council No. 13, Royal and Select Masters, Covington Commandery No. 7, Knights Templar, Indra Consistory No. 2 of the Scottish Rite at Covington, has attained the thirty-third, honorary, degree of the Scottish Rite, is venerable master of Delta Lodge of Perfection No. 2 at Covington, a member of Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Louisville, and Keturah Chapter No. 50 of the Eastern Star at Latonia. Doctor Sullivan is a member of the Industrial Club at Covington, and has been a director of the Covington Young Men's Christian Association for about twenty years. He was closely associated with the local organizations handling the sale of Liberty Bonds, War Stamps and promoting other objects of the Government, and he was one of the very generous contributors of his personal means in the same direction. He is now a member of the Citizens Patriotic League. Doctor Sullivan resides at 1345 Scott Street, where he owns the modern St. Louis Apartment Building.

November 5, 1890, he married Miss Sarah E. Wood. They were married in the Latonia Hotel at Covington, the home of the bride, her father, William H. Wood, being owner of that hotel. Her father, now deceased, was a lumberman and operated saw mills and flour mills in Ohio and West Virginia. Her mother was Sophronia (McCarley) Wood, also deceased. Mrs. Sullivan completed her education in the Rio Grande College of Gallia County, Ohio.

Their only child, Dr. John E. Sullivan, was born at Harrisburg, Ohio, August 30, 1891, but from early infancy has lived in Covington, where he attended the grammar and high schools and later entered the dental department of the Ohio University of Cincinnati, graduating D.D.S. in 1911. Since then he has been actively associated with his father except for the period of the World war.

In July, 1917, he was commissioned a first lieutenant in the Dental Corps, saw home service, and on August 29, 1918, sailed from Hoboken, New Jersey, landing at Brest September 6, 1918. He was with Base Hospital No. 62 at Mars-Sur-Allier until March 5, 1919, and then was ordered with a detachment of medical men to go to Berlin for work in Russian prison camps. On reaching Coblenz, Germany, the order was countermanded and he was assigned to duty with the Four Hundred and Fifteenth Motor Supply Train of the Third Army Corps. Doctor Sullivan had the unusual honor of holding a dental clinic in the reception hall of Mendelssohn's old home at Horchheim, Germany, and was stationed there three months. He was then assigned to duty with the Twenty-fourth Balloon Company, stationed at Bonefeld, Germany, for one month, after which he was reassigned to the Four Hundred and Fifteenth Motor Supply Train on July 7, 1919. July 15th he left Coblenz, and reached the shores of the United States August 1, 1919, and was mustered out at Camp Taylor, August 25, 1919. Dr. J. E. Sullivan is a member of the Latonia Christian Church. He is affiliated with Latonia Lodge No. 746, Free and Accepted Masons, Covington Chapter No. 35, Royal Arch Masons, Kenton Council No. 13, Royal and Select Masters, Covington Commandery No. 7, Knights Templar, Indra Consistory No. 2 of the Scottish Rite and Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine. He is also a member of the Covington Rotary Club, of which he is a director.

On April 24, 1914, at Latonia, he married Miss Anne Wandelohr Holmes, daughter of William Webster and Elizabeth Love (Wandelohr) Holmes, who reside at Meridian Station, Kentucky. Her father is a farmer.

WILLIAM EDGAR HUNTER is one of the prominent railway men whose official duties make them residents of Covington. He has been in the mechanical department of railroading for over twenty years, and is master mechanic of the Cincinnati Terminal and Kentucky Division shops at Covington of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company.

Mr. Hunter was born in Laurens County, South Carolina, January 12, 1874. His grandfather, John Hunter, was a native of England and as a young man settled in Laurens County, South Carolina, where he married and where he followed agriculture, living there the rest of his life. His son, William Hunter, was born in Laurens County in 1838, spent all his life there, and died in 1888. He was for four years a Confederate soldier, was in Lee's army of Northern Virginia, and participated in many of the battles around Richmond. At Bull Run he was wounded, sustaining a broken wrist. Aside from his war service his energies were devoted to farming, and he provided for his family wisely and well and was one of the influential citizens of his community. He was a democrat and a member of the Baptist Church. William Hunter married Louisa Dial, who was born in Laurens County in 1840 and died there in 1915. Their children were: John, a farmer in Laurens County; Lizzie, wife of Charles D. Bass, a Baptist minister at Kilmarnock, Virginia; and William E. The mother by her first marriage, to William Nelson, a native of Laurens County, and who died of measles and pneumonia while a Confederate soldier in 1864, had three other children: Thaddeus Nelson, a merchant of Laurens County, who died in 1920; Mary, deceased, whose husband, James W. Boyd, is a farmer and contractor at Spartanburg, South Carolina; and Emma, wife of J. M. Leake, a contractor and builder in Laurens County.

William Edgar Hunter lived the life of a South Carolina farm boy until after completing his education. His education was thorough and liberal in scope, beginning with the rural schools, followed by the grade schools of Spartanburg and Wofford College of that city. On leaving college in 1894 he was a teacher for two years in his native county, and for another two years gained considerable experience in the contracting and building business with his brother-in-law, J. M. Leake. Having made a definite choice of a mechanical vocation, Mr. Hunter served a four years' apprenticeship as a machinist in the shops of the Southern Railway at Knoxville, Tennessee. After working at his trade a few years he became identified with the Louisville and Nashville Railway Company in 1903 at Blue Ridge, Georgia, as a machinist. He was promoted in 1905 to roundhouse foreman at Blue Ridge, and in 1906 was transferred with similar duties to Montgomery, Alabama. He was there until March, 1910, when he was transferred to Etowah, Tennessee, as general foreman of the Louisville & Nashville shops, and in May, 1911, was made master mechanic. He continued at Etowah as master mechanic until March, 1919, when he came to Covington as master mechanic of the Louisville & Nashville and the Cincinnati Terminal and Kentucky Division shops. Under his jurisdiction as master mechanic are 1,900 skilled mechanics, engineers and firemen. His offices are at the roundhouse and shops at Twenty-fourth Street and the Louisville & Nashville Railway.

Mr. Hunter is first vice president of the Cincinnati Railroad Club. He has always been a public spirited factor in every community where he has lived. While at Etowah he served as city commissioner two years and two years as mayor. During the World war he was performing an essentially patriotic service as a railroad man, but he voluntarily accepted the chairmanship of nearly every committee for patriotic purposes in Etowah and was appointed one of the Four-minute Speakers there. He is a democrat, a trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is affiliated with Golden Rule Lodge No. 345, Free and Accepted Masons, at Covington, Sycamore Camp, Woodmen of the World, at Knoxville, and Unaka Council of the Royal Arcanum at Knoxville.

Mr. Hunter owns a modern home at 1910 Garrard

Street. He married at Knoxville, Tennessee, in 1904, Miss Ophelia Hornbeck. Mrs. Hunter was born in Texas and died of the influenza in February, 1920. Three children survive her: Edward, born June 26, 1905, a student in the Covington High School; Dial, born March 22, 1907; and Allen, born October 3, 1908.

SHELBY M. KORB. While one of the substantial business men of Covington, where he has had his home for the past eight years, Shelby M. Korb has accepted many opportunities to satisfy an ambition for experience and adventure. He is doubtless one of the most widely traveled men in Kentucky, having spent four years in the United States Navy, and in his business experience he has been over the entire United States.

Mr. Korb was born at Richmond, Virginia, March 13, 1882. His great-grandfather Korb came from Germany and settled in Virginia. His grandfather, Shelby Korb, was a native of Virginia, and spent practically all his life in Ashland, that state, where he was a merchant and where he died in 1883. He was a Confederate soldier during the Civil war. Peter M. Korb, father of the Covington business man, was born near Richmond in 1847, served as a drummer boy in the Confederate army and lived out his life at the Virginia capital, where he developed an extensive mercantile business and where he died in February, 1908. He was a staunch democrat and an active worker in the Baptist Church. Peter M. Korb married Miss Victoria Day, who was born at Richmond in 1857, and is still living in that city. She is the mother of six children: Shelby M.; Willie N., who conducts a large mercantile business at Richmond; Mary L., wife of J. M. Higgins, a carpenter and builder at Highland Springs, Virginia; Michael A., chief clerk in a wholesale house at Richmond; Moseley S.; and Esther O., wife of J. Vick, an employe of the American Express Company at Richmond.

Shelby M. Korb when only nine years of age went to work in his father's store, and by the time he finished his public school education at the age of seventeen he had a sound experience in the fundamentals of mercantile practice. The following four years he was city salesman for a wholesale confectionery house at Richmond.

Mr. Korb at the age of twenty-one enlisted in the United States Navy and was in the service four years; becoming a quartermaster. During that time he made six trips to Europe, three trips to South America and two trips to Africa. After his honorable discharge he returned to Richmond in 1907, was employed for a brief time as a street railway motorman, then conducted a restaurant until 1909, and during the next three years satisfied his desire to see the United States by traveling and working at different vocations until he had covered the entire country from coast to coast and from the lakes to the Gulf.

Mr. Korb located at Covington March 4, 1912, and after a brief employment with a restaurant established a business of his own at 824 Madison Avenue. Later he sold this and opened another popular restaurant at 716 Madison Avenue. He continued in this business until 1918. Being an ex-navy man, he volunteered for service during the World war, and his application was accepted and he reported for duty on the Atlantic seaboard the day the armistice was signed. After his return to Covington Mr. Korb engaged in the confectionery and storage business at 523 Madison Avenue. He discontinued the confectionery line in September, 1919, and has since used the three floors of the building at 523 Madison Avenue, handling furniture on the ground floor and using the two upper floors for the storage of furniture and merchandise.

Mr. Korb is a republican voter, a member of the Baptist Church, and is affiliated with Covington Lodge No. 109, Free and Accepted Masons, Covington Chapter No. 35, Royal Arch Masons, Covington Commandery

No. 7, Knights Templar, Indra Consistory No. 2 of the Scottish Rite, and Ritzpah Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Madisonville. He is also a member of Rosebud Chapter No. 39 of the Eastern Star at Covington, and of Kishmer Grotto No. 1 of Kentucky.

His home is at the northwest corner of Ninth Street and Madison Avenue. Mr. Korb was married at Covington, March 4, 1912, to a daughter of Fountain and Ella (Ragan) Perry. Her mother is still living at Covington, while her father, who was a stationary engineer, died in 1920. Mr. and Mrs. Korb have two children, Virginia, born in 1914, and Clarissa, born in 1920.

SUMME & RATERMANN COMPANY. To supply and insure a pure milk service for Covington has been the aim and achievement of the Summe & Ratermann Dairy Company, now a corporation under the laws of Kentucky, and a business that has had a consecutive history for over thirty years as the Latonia Springs Dairy.

The president and one of the founders of the business is J. Herman Summe, who was born in Hanover, Germany, in 1852, and came to the United States in 1884, after acquiring a good education in his native land. For a time he was employed in mills at Cincinnati, but since 1886 has been a resident of Covington, and almost continuously since that time has been in the dairy business. He and his brother-in-law, August Ratermann, have owned the Latonia Springs Dairy for the past thirty years. This dairy is located at the famous summer resort of Latonia Springs. The business has a herd of high class dairy cows, averaging forty in number.

J. Herman Summe is an independent democrat and a member of the Catholic Church. He married Elizabeth Wessling at Cincinnati. She was also born in Hanover, Germany. Their two children are August J., who is engaged in the dairy business at Kansas City, Missouri; and Frank B.

Frank B. Summe, treasurer of the Summe & Ratermann Dairy Company, was born near the Two Mile House on Madison Pike near Covington January 6, 1889. He was educated in the parochial schools of Kenton County and attended St. Joseph High School at Covington until seventeen. Since then he has been actively engaged in the dairy business with his father, and in 1913 became an official in the Summe & Ratermann Dairy Company. This business was established under that name in 1910 and was incorporated in 1915. A complete list of officers of the company is: J. Herman Summe, president; August Summe, vice president; Joseph B. Mrs. Summe is a thoroughly educated and cultured woman, moving in the best social circles of the city. They are the parents of three young children: Paul, born April 20, 1906; John, born July 15, 1918; and Frank, born in August, 1920.

H. M. PAGE. While he has other associations, H. M. Page is the fountain and source of enterprise and management for the H. M. Page Log and Lumber Company, whose headquarters are at Lexington, Kentucky. This is a big Kentucky industry, specializing in high grade veneer logs and lumber of all kinds, and is probably the largest operating organization of that kind in the state.

The company was incorporated in April, 1913, with their capital stock of $25,000. Mr. Page has had a long and active experience in building, contracting and lumbering. The president of the company is L. M. Moore, a member of the Hendricks-Moore Lumber Company; the first vice president of the company was L. Gay Strode, who subsequently retired. Mr. H. M. Page has since been vice president and also general manager and treasurer, while his son, Henry L. Page, is secretary. This company does an extensive business manufacturing in the timber districts of Eastern Kentucky, operates sawmills, at times as high as nine or ten mills, and owns much land and stumpage. The company has a capacity of about 20,000,000 feet annually. In the handling of veneer logs it is said that this company is the largest dealer south of the Ohio River. Most of the timber worked up by the company is white oak, black walnut, ash and poplar. During the last seven or eight years the company has cleared a large amount of land and has also taken steps to make this land available for farm settlement. Their business is entirely wholesale and employs between 100 and 150 men.

H. M. Page was born on the waters of Stories Branch, about three miles east of Grange City in Fleming County, Kentucky, September 14, 1874. His grandfather, Allen Page, came to Kentucky from Virginia. His father, James William Page, married Elizabeth Kissick, daughter of William and Rosa Kissick, who came from Ireland to Kentucky. James William Page was also a lumberman and logger, and at one time brought down extensive quantities of logs to mills located on Licking River. He lived most of his time at the old Kissick farm, which was inherited by his wife and which was afterwards purchased by H. M. Page. It has been in the family for over 100 years. H. M. Page was left motherless at the age of two years and had to shift largely for himself after he arrived at the age of seven years old, and at the age of twelve he began fishing and trapping along the waters of Stories Branch and Fox Creek in Fleming County. With his earnings he went to Illinois, where he worked on a farm for $20 a month. Then returning to the old Kissick farm, he lived with his father, being the only housekeeper for three or four years, and in 1902 he went to Kansas City, Missouri, and became a building contractor, doing a general line of building work in Kansas City, in the State of Kansas, and even in Colorado. He laid the foundation of his business career while in the West, remaining there until 1909, and from 1909 to 1913 he was a building contractor with headquarters at Lexington, Kentucky. During that time he erected many buildings in the City of Lexington and the surrounding country, through Central Kentucky and even as far east as the Blue Ridge Mountains in Virginia.

Mr. Page has been prominent in lumbermen's organizations. He is a York and Scottish Rite Mason, and has received all the degrees of both rites, including the Shrine. He was made a Master Mason at No. 680 at Pine Grove, Kentucky, and is a member of Indra Consistory No. 2 at Covington, Kentucky, Lexington Chapter No. 1 at Lexington, Kentucky, Washington Council No. 1 at Lexington, Webb Commandery No. 2, Knights Templar, Lexington, has attended the National Conclaves of the Knights Templar, and is also a member in high standing in the orders of the Knights of Pythias, Modern Woodmen of America, Royal Neighbors of America, United Commercial Travelers of America, the Iowa Traveling Men's Association, Order of the Eastern Star, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Mr. Page, being a lumberman, yields to a special fascination for the life of great woods and the open country, and has always enjoyed hunting excursions and keeps a complete equipment of hunting paraphernalia. Many of his hunting experiences have been in the woods of Northern Wisconsin, and in 1920 he was accompanied by his son.

Henry L., who was fifteen years old and who killed a very large fourteen-prong buck, which weighed 244 pounds. This hunting trip was taken at Long Lake, Forest County, Wisconsin. Mr. Page has used all kinds of guns, but his choice is the double-barrel Parker shotgun, and he is noted as the fastest in loading and shooting a double-barrel shotgun in the country and at the same time an expert marksman.

Mr. Page and his wife are members of the Broadway Christian Church at Lexington, Kentucky. His first wife was Lizza A. Rankins, whom he married at Poplar Plains, Kentucky, in 1901. Their home was at Olivet, Osage County, Kansas. Their house took fire and burned, resulting in the tragic death of their two little daughters, Bessie Rose, aged five, and Ella Fenton, aged three. These children were buried at Olivet, Kansas, but subsequently were removed to a cemetery at Mount Sterling, Kentucky. From the injuries and anguish of this tragedy Mrs. Page died in 1902. Subsequently he married Miss Willie B. Shrout of Winchester, Kentucky. They have three children, Henry L., Ruth M. and James Thomas, Henry L. being now secretary of his father's company. Mr. Page deserves much credit for the great showing he has made, considering the very poor chances that he had in the beginning, and he has always been liked by his employees for the reason that when he appears at the works he is always jolly and has a kind word for all and has done wonders in handling the mountain people. However, he has always dealt no other way but fair and honest with one and all, and he is generally known among his employees as "Old Honesty." Mr. Page is forty-six years of age and does not know the effects of strong drinks. He also was never known to chew tobacco or smoke, was never on a floor to dance in his life, and has always striven to do something for others as well as for himself. He carries life insurance to the amount of about $90,000 for the benefit of his family.

That was a period when many important problems beset the educational authorities, and Mr. Pflueger was instrumental in solving many of them and promoting the efficiency of the schools. Both as a lawyer and private citizen he gave loyal aid and support to all community projects and patriotic campaigns during the World war.

FRANK R. EVANS has been a figure in banking circles in Covington for the past twenty years, though at the beginning his duties were only those of a messenger boy. For the past four years he has been cashier of one of the oldest and strongest banks of Northern Kentucky, the Liberty National Bank.

This bank was chartered as a national bank in 1871, and at the close of the year's business in 1920 its total resources aggregated over $3,330,000. Its deposits at that time were more than $2,440,000. The bank has a capital stock of $350,000 and surplus of $100,000. The officers and directors comprise many of the prominent business leaders of Covington. The chairman of the board is Richard P. Ernst, George E. Engel is president, T. S. Hamilton and Polk Laffoon, vice presidents, and Frank R. Evans, cashier.

Mr. Evans was born at Covington September 22, 1881. His family has been in Covington for sixty years. His grandfather, Rhys C. Evans, was born in Wales in 1819, and came to America and established a home at Cincinnati about 1850. In 1861 he removed to Covington. He was a retail jeweler in Cincinnati, and continued the same business at Covington, where he built up one of the handsomest stores of its kind in that section of the state. During the Civil war he was a member of the Home Guards. Rhys C. Evans died at Covington in 1886. His son and business successor was Ivor J. Evans, who was born at Cincinnati in 1856 and lived at Covington from the age of five years. He early became associated with his father in business, and after the father's death continued the jewelry store until his death in 1911. He was elected as a republican to the Covington School Board, and gave valuable service in that capacity. He was one of the very active members of the Methodist Episcopal Church and fraternally was a member of Colonel Clay Lodge No. 159, Free and Accepted Masons, Indra Consistory No. 2 of the Scottish Rite, and was past chancellor commander of Friendship Lodge No. 20, Knights of Pythias. Ivor J. Evans married Hattie G. Bowen, who was born in Covington in 1855, and is still living at her home at Fort Mitchell. Frank R. Evans, who is unmarried, also lives at Fort Mitchell. He is the oldest of three children: His sister, Miss Mattie B., living with her mother. The other daughter, Retta W., is the wife of C. W. Boebinger, a professor of art at the Ohio Mechanics Institute at Cincinnati.

Frank R. Evans attended public school at Covington, continuing his work in high school through the junior year. Leaving school in 1900, he was for a brief period employed in his father's jewelry store, but in August of that year became a messenger with the First National Bank of Covington. Diligent, attentive to his duties, eager to rise in the financial world, he made the routine of banking service an opportunity for advancement, and remained with the First National Bank until he was an assistant cashier. In 1917 he was chosen cashier of the Liberty National Bank. Mr. Evans is also a director in the Citizens Building Association. During the period of the World war and since he has been treasurer of the Kenton County Chapter of the Red Cross, and both as a banker and private citizen he threw all his influence toward the success of the cause. He was eligible for service under the second draft, and was registered but was not called prior to the signing of the armistice.

Mr. Evans is treasurer of the Covington Public Library and secretary of the Children's Home at Covington. He is prominent in Masonry, is past master of Colonel Clay Lodge No. 159, Free and Accepted Masons, a member of Covington Chapter No. 35, Royal Arch Masons, Covington Commandery No. 7, Knights Templar, Indra Consistory No. 2 of the Scottish Rite, in which he has received the K. C. C. H., honorary, degree, and is a member of Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Louisville. He is treasurer of the Masonic bodies of which he is a member at Covington. In politics he votes as a republican. He is a member of the Industrial Club and the Fort Mitchell Country Club.

NELSON ASBURY JETT, M. D. About the time the World war came to an end Doctor Jett removed to Covington, where he has since enjoyed an exceptionally busy practice as a physician and surgeon. He had practiced prior to that at Brooksville, and in that section of Kentucky has a great many friends who esteem his abilities as a physician and also his work at an earlier age as a successful teacher.

Doctor Jett was born at Bratton in Robertson County, Kentucky, December 31, 1876. His grandfather, Samuel Jett, was a native of Virginia and married Sarah Walker when she was thirteen years of age. She was also born in Virginia. Immediately after their marriage they came to Kentucky and settled on a pioneer farm in Bracken County, where they lived out their lives. Samuel Jett was a farmer and also a distiller, and he saw service as a soldier in the War of 1812. His son Daniel Harrison Jett was born at Bratton, which was then in Bracken County, on August 5, 1848. He was reared and married in Bracken County, and for many years carried on his operations as a farmer on an extensive and successful scale. He is now living retired at Brooksville. He is a republican in his political affiliations, and an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Daniel H. Jett married Martha Jane Insko, who was born at Bratton, Kentucky, in 1852. To their marriage were born ten children: Lucy, wife of Ben Moreland, a farmer at Neave in Bracken County; Theodore, a farmer in Oakland in Bracken County; Nimrod, a merchant at Milford, Kentucky; Dr. Nelson A.; Joseph, who is connected with a bank at Brooksville; Eliza, wife of Ell England, a farmer at Brooksville; Elliott, a merchant at Foster, Kentucky; Charles, an automobile dealer at Brooksville; Florence, who died in June, 1920, at Milford, where her husband, Grant Jacobs, is a carpenter and builder; and Amanda, wife of John Tilton, a Methodist minister living at Cold Springs, Kentucky.

Nelson Asbury Jett grew up in a rural section of Virginia, attended the country schools of Robertson County, and later the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio. At the age of twenty-one he began teaching, and altogether he spent seven years in that profession. His work as a teacher was done in Robertson, Bracken and Harrison counties. He had finished his work in the National Normal University in 1900, and in 1903 he entered the Hospital College of Medicine at Louisville, from which he graduated M. D. in 1906. Doctor Jett is a thorough student of his profession, and he supplemented his own experience by taking post-graduate work in 1913 in the Chicago Polyclinic and in 1919 attended the Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat College of Chicago. After graduating he practiced three months at Milford, then for three years lived at Powersville, and for nearly ten years had a busy country practice with home at Brooksville. Doctor Jett moved to Covington in December, 1918, and his abilities soon earned for him a commendable position in his new home. His offices are at 1047 Madison Avenue. He is a member of the Kenton-Campbell Counties Medical Society, the State Medical Association and the Academy of Medicine of Cincinnati.

Doctor Jett is a democrat, is a member of the Official Board of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is affiliated with Golden Rule Lodge No. 345, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, at Covington, Brooksville Chapter, Royal Arch Masons, Junior Order United American Mechanics, Jefferson Council No. 11, Daughters of America, and Old Kentucky Lodge No. 1359, Loyal Order of Moose, at Covington. In his home locality of Brooksville Doctor Jett was counted one of the most loyal and useful factors in promoting patriotic objects during the World war period.

His residence is at 114 East Tenth Street. He married in 1899 Miss Edna Tilton, of Mount Olivet, Kentucky, daughter of W. H. and Elvira (Bratton) Tilton. Her mother still lives at Mount Olivet. Her father was a farmer. Doctor and Mrs. Jett have three children: Naomi, born September 26, 1903, a student in the Covington High School; Ruth, born April 19, 1905, also in high school; and Lucile, born May 18, 1910, is in grammar school.

Griffin Kelly, who has three times represented his home people in the State Legislature, is one of the prominent farmers of Daviess County and has spent practically all his life in the community of Maceo. In a modest way he has made an enviable success at agriculture, and while he was able to perform some good service in the Legislature in behalf of the farm interests he also showed a rare breadth of mind and judgment in all matters affecting the common weal of the state.

Mr. Kelly was born on a farm near Yelbington, August 10, 1869, son of Joseph and Harriet Courtney (Jones) Kelly. His grandfather Kelly was a native of Culpeper County, Virginia, and an early settler in Kentucky. The maternal grandfather was also a native of Virginia, his wife's maiden name being Lumpkins. Joseph Kelly was born in Shelby County, Kentucky, and his wife in Daviess County. After their marriage they lived on a farm near Masonville, and then permanently settled near Maceo in Daviess County. Joseph Kelly, who died in 1872 at the age of sixty-seven, married for his first wife a Miss Smith, by whom he had five children. His second wife was many years his junior and survived him until 1899. They were Baptists and they reared their ten children in the faith of their church.

Griffin Kelly, youngest of his mother's children, was only three years old when his father died, and he grew up on the farm with his widowed mother and gave her a full measure of filial devotion and duty until her death. He acquired a common school education, and as a boy, youth and mature man has busied himself with farm pursuits. Of this vocation he has made a decided success and has earned ample prosperity for himself and family.

He was happily married in 1897 to Miss Mattie Lou Street. She was born in Daviess County, daughter of William and Martha Ann (Tinsley) Street. Mr. and Mrs. Kelly have five children. They are active members of the Baptist Church. Mr. Kelly is a Knights Templar Mason and has always been affiliated with the democratic party.

Three times he yielded to the pressure of his friends, particularly the farmers of Daviess County, and became a candidate for the Legislature, being successful on each occasion. He was first elected in 1913, and in 1917 was chosen for a second term and reelected in 1919. Each term of service has brought him additional experience and increased prestige in the Legislature, and he has given diligent attention and study to all matters affecting the legislative program and the best interests of his constituency.

Emison Shaw, one of the best known and most prominent farmers and a leading citizen of Daviess County, residing near the village of Sorgho, is a native son of Kentucky, born on a farm five miles east of Henderson in Henderson County December 6, 1851, his parents being John L. and Tabitha Belle (Smith) Shaw.

Dr. William Shaw, the great-grandfather of Emison Shaw, was born in Scotland and on immigrating to the United States settled in Maryland, where he became a prominent physician and large planter in Prince George County. His son Levi Shaw was born in Maryland and spent some years at Washington, District of Columbia, where was born Levi's son John L. Shaw, the father of Emison Shaw. John L. Shaw was an unmarried man when he came to Kentucky from Maryland, and for a time after his arrival worked at the trade of carriage maker at Henderson, he having learned that vocation in his youth. He was married in Henderson County and for a short time afterward lived on a farm there, but in 1852 came to Daviess County and settled at Sorgho, where he became a successful farmer and the owner of a good deal of slave labor, which he freed about the time of the Civil war. He spent the rest of his life on the farm in successful and energetic operations and died at the age of sixty-seven years, November 19, 1875, after a busy and useful life and firm in the esteem of his fellow-citizens. The mother of Emison Shaw was born in Henderson County, a daughter of Daniel Smith, a native of Virginia and a Revolutionary soldier under General Greene. He came to Kentucky after the winning of American independence and located in Henderson County, where he resided ever afterward. His wife was Miss Leah Aidlott. The mother of Emison Shaw was born in 1818, and died in Daviess County in 1882. She and her husband had two sons who grew to maturity, one of whom died at the age of twenty-one years while attending medical college. Mr. and Mrs. Shaw were highly respected Christian people, the mother a Baptist and the father a Methodist. He was a stanch democrat in politics. The parents lie buried on the home farm near Sorgho, which is now owned by their son.

Emison Shaw was reared on the home place and farming has been his life pursuit. He received his education in the public schools and at Rockville, Maryland, where he was a fellow student with Woodrow Wilson, who was to later become President of the United States. On May 5, 1879, Mr. Shaw married Miss Elizabeth Stowers, a native of Daviess County and a daughter of Harrison Stowers, a pioneer of the county, who came from Ohio County and was of Scotch lineage. Mr. and Mrs. Shaw became the parents of the following children: William F., educated at Logan College, studied law at Columbia College, Washington, District of Columbia, and practiced law at Owensboro until forced by ill health to retire from his calling, since which time he has been his father's assistant on the home farm; Elizabeth Belle, the wife of John Kirk, of Owensboro; Mary, the wife of J. O. Lewis, who taught in the Owensboro schools for several years and is now identified with the Anglo-American Milling Company of Owensboro; and Margaret, the wife of G. Ivan Barnes, inspector of vocational schools in Kentucky under the direction and control of the State and Federal governments.

Mr. Shaw has never sought political honors. While he is a democrat in politics, he has never been active as a worker in his party. He and his wife are members of the Baptist Church and reared their children in that faith. Mr. Shaw is a Master Mason and a past master of his Blue Lodge. He owns and operates a splendid farm of 430 acres, which is well improved, and his success as a farmer and stock raiser has been a gratifying one. As has already been shown, he comes of old and prominent Kentucky families, but his richest heritage came from the noble and honorable lives of his parents, both of whom possessed sterling qualities of heart and mind. His mother was the historian of her family and possessed much valuable information in regard thereto, which, it is to be regretted, was lost after her death. Mr. Shaw in citizenship, personal manner and conduct of life has well emulated the splendid example of his parents and forefathers.

JOHN FRANKLIN CRAWFORD, M. D. A physician and surgeon at Clay, son of an old time Kentucky doctor, Doctor Crawford is a proficient surgeon, one of the best qualified men in Kentucky medical circles, and has had an extremely busy career since locating at Clay.

He was born at Marion in Crittenden County, Kentucky, March 26, 1878, son of Dr. John Willis and Elizabeth (Paidon) Crawford. His parents were born in Livingston County of old Kentucky families. The Crawfords are Scotch-Irish while the Paidons were Scotch. Dr. John W. Crawford was a graduate of Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia and for forty years devoted his time and energies without thought of himself to the labors and responsibilities of his work as a physician at Marion. He was greatly beloved by his patients and a prominent citizen in the community. He always voted as a democrat, was a Master Mason and he and his wife were members of the Methodist Church. He died at the age of seventy-two and his wife at sixty-eight. They reared three sons and five daughters in their home at Marion.

John Franklin Crawford had the example of his honored father always before him as an incentive to the choice of a professional career. He was liberally educated, attending high school at Marion, acquiring his Bachelor of Science degree from Blandville College and has the A. B. degree from Clinton College. He took his first course in medicine at Columbian University, and in 1901 received his medical diploma from the University of Louisville. Doctor Crawford after graduating settled at the old Crawford homestead at Hampton, Livingston County, and practiced in that rural community for about seven years. On July 4, 1907, he removed to Clay. During the World war he offered his professional services to the Government, but was advised to stay at home, since his service was already an essential one to the prosecution of the war, as he was physician and surgeon for the West Kentucky Coal Company, with the responsibility of looking after the health and welfare of a large number of miners employed by that company at Clay. Doctor Crawford, in 1918 did post-graduate work for several months at the University of Louisville. He is a member of the Webster County and Kentucky State Medical Societies.

Fraternally he is affiliated with the Masonic Order and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a democrat and a member of the Methodist Church. He served one term as mayor of Clay, and for years has been on the County Board of Health.

In 1905 he married Miss Annie P. Bridgers, of Louisville. They have one daughter, Mary Douglass Crawford.

JOSIAH STODDARD JOHNSTON, who died October 4, 1913, won many distinctions in the course of a long life. He was a lawyer, journalist, an officer in the Confederate army, was secretary of state of Kentucky, an editor and historian. While this article is dedicated to him, it is appropriate to note briefly his relationship with other great names that belong to Kentucky history.

The Johnston family is of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and the original seat of the family was County Dumfries, Scotland. An ancestor of the Johnstons of Kentucky was Capt. Archibald Johnston, who served as an officer in the Revolutionary army. A son of this soldier was Dr. John Johnston, who was born at Salisbury, Connecticut, where he married and where some of his children were born. In 1790 Dr. John Johnston came west and settled in Mason County, Kentucky, where he performed the service of a country doctor.

The oldest son of Dr. John Johnston by his first marriage was Josiah Stoddard Johnston, who was born in Connecticut November 24, 1784, and was a child when taken to Kentucky. He graduated from the old Transylvania in 1805 and soon afterward moved to the territory of Louisiana and won rapid success at the bar of that territory. He was elected to the Territorial Legislature, served as district judge from 1812 to 1821, and in 1820 was elected to Congress as a Clay democrat and in 1823 was elected to fill a vacancy in the United States Senate. He was re-elected to that body in 1825 and for a third term in 1831. He lost his life in a steamboat explosion on Red River May 19, 1833. He gave an independent support to the administration of John Q. Adams, and was a close personal and political associate of Henry Clay, for whom he acted as second in the duel with John Randolph.

The youngest son of Dr. John Johnston was Albert Sidney Johnston, who was born in Mason County, Kentucky, February 3, 1803. This native Kentuckian and illustrious soldier is referred to here only to indicate his relationship to the family. A son of Gen. Albert S. Johnston was the late William Preston Johnston, who was born at Louisville, and after the war, in which he served as a Confederate officer, practiced law in that city for a time. In 1880 he became president of the Louisiana State University, and a few years later became president of Lane University.

An older brother of Gen. A. S. Johnston and another son of Dr. John Johnston was John Harris Johnston, who in early manhood followed his half brother to Louisiana and at Alexandria became a lawyer and planter, served as probate judge, was speaker of the Louisiana House of Representatives, in 1829-30, and at the time of his death, in 1838, was parish judge, an office corresponding to that of circuit judge in Kentucky. Judge Johnston was a very handsome and agreeable man esteemed for his amiability, probity and intelligence. He married Eliza Davidson. Her father, Dr. Richard Davidson, was a Virginian, an early settler in Kentucky, was a graduate of Transylvania

Alfred Hamilton Jr.

University in 1803 and after some service as an army surgeon he practiced at New Orleans, where his daughter Eliza was born. The wife of Dr. Richard Davidson was a daughter of John Pintard, of New York, who served in the Revolutionary army, was a graduate of Princeton College, and widely known for his great learning. Judge Johnston survived his wife several years, and at his death he left three small children, John Pintard, Josiah Stoddard and Harris Hancock. These boys were reared by their mother's sister, the wife of Col. George Hancock, in Jefferson County, Kentucky. This aunt did a mother's part by them.

Of the Johnstons it could be said that they never possessed great wealth, extensive and powerful connections or any very special popular talents beyond vigorous intellects, moral elevation and a desire to be useful to themselves and to the world.

The late J. Stoddard Johnston of Louisville was a son of John Harris and Eliza Ellen (Davidson) Johnston, a nephew of Albert S. Johnston, the soldier, and also of his namesake, the Louisiana judge and senator. He was born in New Orleans February 10, 1833, but was reared and spent most of his life in Kentucky. Besides the home advantages given him by his loving aunt, Mrs. Hancock, he attended the classical school of Samuel V. Womack at Shelbyville and also the Western Military Institute at Georgetown, one of the instructors in this school being James G. Blaine. In September, 1850, he entered the sophomore class of Yale College, graduating in 1853. The class of 1853 at Yale had a number of men later distinguished in National affairs. In 1854 Mr. Johnston completed his law course at Louisville. Instead of practicing law he was a cotton planter in Arkansas from 1855 to 1859, and prosecuted that industry so competently as to lay the basis of a considerable fortune. With this he bought a beautiful farm in Scott County, Kentucky, and was happily engaged in farming and his domestic life there from 1859 to 1862.

Colonel Johnston was of a naturally pacific temper, and the strong ties of his domestic establishment made him averse to active participation in behalf of the Southern Confederacy with which his heart and interests were allied, until it was evident that only a continued struggle could bring a solution of the difficulties between the North and South. It was in 1862 that he joined the army, where his merit as a soldier and particularly his business efficiency won him speedy recognition. General Bragg assigned him duties on his personal staff, and with the rank of major and assistant adjutant general he served with that commander at Perryville and Murfreesboro and until June, 1863. He enjoyed General Bragg's confidence and used his influence with great tact and fidelity, particularly in the controversies that arose between his chief and General Breckenridge. Such was his tact that he kept the friendship and esteem of both parties. After resigning his place on the staff of General Bragg he became a staff officer under General Buckner, with whom he remained until after the battle of Chickamauga, and in December, 1863, became chief of staff to General Breckenridge. He was in the front of the battles at Newmarket, Second Cold Harbor, Vicksburg, Monocacy and at Winchester on September 19, 1864. While frequently mentioned in the official reports for gallantry on the field, his abilities particularly shone in the administrative department of the army. As chief of staff to General Breckenridge he used his large powers with singular discretion and fidelity, and there was not an officer in the army more trusted. With all his splendid and unselfish service he continued without change of rank practically to the end of the war. When General Bragg was called to Richmond as special counsellor to President Davis, the general, always mindful of the services of his young staff officer, offered him the rank of lieutenant colonel on his staff, an offer that was declined. When General Breckenridge was called to Richmond as secretary of war, Major Johnston remained in the field. In the closing days of the war he accompanied the Kentucky troops as far south as Charlotte, North Carolina, when on the advice of President Davis and General Breckenridge he returned to Greensboro and on May 1, 1865, gave his parole. Just in the closing days of the war he received the tardy appointment to the rank of lieutenant colonel. To the end of his life Colonel Johnston remained one of the distinguished and popular figures among Confederate veterans all over the South.

After the war he returned to Arkansas and practiced law at Helena during 1866-67. He then located at Frankfort, Kentucky, and from 1867 until 1886 was editor of the Frankfort Yeoman. Both personally and as an editor he played a prominent role in democratic politics in his home state. He aided in the organization and from 1870 to 1886 was president of the Kentucky Press Association. In 1871 he was appointed adjutant general of the state, and from 1875 to 1879 was Secretary of State of Kentucky. He was also candidate for governor in 1875. Much of his influence in politics was exercised during the long period from 1868 to 1888, when he was either secretary or chairman, holding the latter office the greater part of the time, of the Democratic State Committee. Colonel Johnston was a delegate to the national conventions of the party in 1884 and 1888.

From 1889 his home was in Louisville, and during the period 1903 to 1908 he was associate editor of the Louisville Courier Journal. His later years were largely devoted to research and writing along historical lines, and also to scientific pursuits. Colonel Johnston's name as an author will long be associated with his important work known as "A Memorial History of Louisville," which he compiled in 1896. He was also author of the "First Explorations of Kentucky," published in 1898, and the "Confederate History of Kentucky" in the same year. Colonel Johnston was president of the Yale Alumni Association of Kentucky from 1890 to 1902, and from 1893 until his death was vice president of the Filson Club.

June 13, 1854, being then a young law graduate, Colonel Johnston married Eliza Johnson. Her father was George W. Johnson, of Scott County, Kentucky, who served as provisional governor of Kentucky under the Confederate regime, and who was killed in the battle of Shiloh. Colonel Johnston survived his wife by a number of years. Of their five children he was survived by George W. Johnston, Harris H. Johnston and J. Stoddard Johnston, Jr.

C. E. HEARIN. Of banking officials in Kentucky two of the best known, though from a small country bank and rural district, are Mrs. C. E. Hearin, vice president, and C. E. Hearin, cashier, of the Farmers National Bank of Clay in Webster County. Mrs. Hearin is one of the few women who are acknowledged masters of bank management and banking in general, and has the unique distinction of being the first woman ever elected a state vice president of the American Bankers Association.

Both have been identified with the Farmers National Bank of Clay since it was organized in November, 1907. This bank is one of the few in the state having the distinction of being on the honor roll, having a capital and surplus each of $25,000.00. The officers are J. B. Mitchell, president; C. J. Hammack and Mrs. C. E. Hearin, vice president; C. E. Hearin, cashier; and Albina Hearin, assistant cashier.

Cordis E. Hearin was born on a farm in Webster County January 10, 1879, son of Charner Ellis and Ann Elizabeth (Russell) Hearin. His parents were also native Kentuckians, and both were highly respected members of the community in which they lived in Webster County. His father spent his active life as a farmer and died at the age of seventy-three while his mother died at fifty-two. Both were Baptists and the father was a democrat.

Cordis E. Hearin was one of a family of seven sons and three daughters, and his early years were spent on the farm. He attended public schools, the Ohio Valley College at Sturgis, Kentucky, and for three years was a student in the Southern Normal at Bowling Green. He graduated in 1900 with the Bachelor of Science degree. Mr. Hearin began his career at the age of seventeen as a teacher, and for ten years was identified with school work. He was principal of the schools at Slaughterville and Clay.

He acquired his early banking experience in the First National Bank of Sebree, where he spent a year before he took the lead in organizing the Farmers National Bank at Clay.

Mr. Hearin is a democrat, is affiliated with the Masons, Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias, and he and Mrs. Hearin are active in the Baptist Church. For seven years he was superintendent of its Sunday school.

In 1904 Mr. Hearin married Miss Albina Campbell, who was born in Webster County, daughter of Samuel Campbell of Dixon. Mrs. Hearin has been an enthusiastic student of all subjects connected with banking, and has attended many of the state and national banking conventions. It was in 1920 that she was elected vice president for Kentucky of the American Bankers Association, while in 1919 she was elected vice president of the National Bank Department of the Kentucky State Bankers Association. Mr. Hearin in 1920 was chosen one of the nine members of the executive committee of the Kentucky State Bankers Association.

GEORGE WASHINGTON WHITE, M. D. A life-long resident of Webster County, Doctor White has practiced medicine more than thirty years, is a banker, farm owner and a citizen who has worked earnestly for the general welfare of his community. His home for the past twenty years has been at Clay.

He was born on a farm near Tilden in Webster County September 29, 1856, a son of William and Elizabeth (McClendon) White. His father, a native of North Carolina, was two years of age when his parents, Larkin White and wife, moved West by the means of emigration then customary and settled near Zion in Henderson County, Kentucky. William White grew up there, but married a Webster County girl, Elizabeth McClendon being a daughter of Joel McClendon, who settled in Webster County from Virginia. William White after his marriage settled on a farm in Webster County, where Mrs. White died at the age of forty, when her son Doctor White was three years of age. She was the mother of a large family, named Larkin, Sarah, William, Robert R., Nancy, John R., Jessie S., George W. and David T. William White married for his second wife Sarah Williams, but had no children by that union. William White, who died at the age of eighty-five, studied and practiced medicine for about four years in his early life, but had no great liking for the profession, and after being injured when thrown from a horse he devoted his energies entirely to farming and was a thoroughgoing and very successful agriculturist, being interested in both the scientific and practical side of the vocation. He was also active in public affairs but never sought office, was a democrat and a member of the Methodist Church.

Doctor White grew up on his father's farm and had a common school education. He graduated from the well known private school of that day, the Providence Male and Female College, and for four years was employed in teaching school in Webster County. In 1885 he graduated from the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville, and began his practice at Free Union, a community in which he remained for sixteen years.

Since 1901 his home has been at Clay. Doctor White took some post graduate courses at the Chicago Polyclinic, and is a member in good standing of the Ohio Valley, Webster County, and Kentucky State Medical associations.

For many years he has combined the supervision of some farming interests with his professional career. He helped organize the Webster County Bank, and has been president of that substantial institution since 1902. A democrat, exercising at different times considerable influence in local affairs, he has been a staunch friend of education, and for eighteen years was a member of the local school board and was on the board when the Clay Graded School was built. He is a Methodist and is a Master Mason and Odd Fellow.

In 1890 Doctor White married Mary E. Porter, a native of Tennessee, though reared in Kentucky. She died in 1899, a short time before Doctor White moved to Clay. She was the mother of two sons, Jesse L. and Thomas Carroll, the former a pharmacist and the younger a practicing dentist at Clay. Thomas C. White during the World war was enrolled in the army as a dentist and performed professional duties at various army camps.

ARTHUR DWIGHT ALLEN, whose father was an active associate with William B. Belknap, spent some of his earlier business years with the Belknap Hardware Company, and more recently has been identified with the extensive business interests of the Mengel Company. He is therefore well known in Louisville commercial affairs and in civic organizations.

Mr. Allen was born at Pewee Valley, Jefferson County, Kentucky, May 25, 1879, being a son of Charles James Fox and Carrie (Belknap) Allen. His father, a native of Boston, attended the old Boston Latin School, competing with Philip Brooks and others for the school prizes so eagerly sought for in those times. He was a graduate of Yale University and of the Harvard Law School, and soon afterward came to St. Louis to practice law. During the Civil war he was commissioned paymaster of the Army of the Cumberland, with the rank of major in the Union army. After his marriage he established his home at Louisville and became associated with his wife's father, William B. Belknap, who organized the Belknap Hardware Company, and with Mr. William R. Belknap and Col. Morris B. Belknap, had an important share in making this one of the leading commercial institutions in the Ohio Valley. He retired from active business about ten years before his death to enjoy his books and country place.

Arthur Dwight Allen is the youngest of a family of four sons and one daughter. He was educated in the Manual Training High School of Louisville and private schools, and graduated from Yale University in 1901. MILTON BOARD, M. D., is a Kentucky physician and surgeon whose experience and attainments in many years have made him a specialist in heart and nervous disease and World war.

Doctor Board was born at Hardinsburg, Breckenridge County, Kentucky, October 4, 1870, a son of Judge Milton and Sue L. (Moorman) Board. His parents were also born in Breckenridge County, his father on November 20, 1828, and his mother March 5, 1834. His mother is still living. His father, who died December 29, 1912, was educated in the public schools of Breckenridge County and attended a private school conducted by Richard Knott, and was a fellow pupil of Proctor Knott, a son of Richard and afterward famous as Kentucky's great orator and statesman. After leaving school Milton Board, Sr., became a farmer, but later practiced law with great success. For a number of terms he held the office of county superintendent of schools, was one term sheriff of his county, served several terms as county judge and also is county attorney, and was a man of great influence and leadership in the county until his death. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Dr. Milton Board, second in a family of five children, two of whom died in infancy, was reared in Hardinsburg, attended public school there, was a pupil in the Breckenridge Normal College, and in 1893 graduated in medicine from the University of Louisville. For about ten years he practiced in his native town, until 1904, when he was appointed superintendent of the Western Kentucky Asylum for the Insane. He continued his duties with that institution until 1906, when he resigned to accept an appointment as a member of the Kentucky State Board of Control. He served on the board during the administrations of Governor J. C. W. Beckham and Governor Augustus Willson. In 1908 Doctor Board established a private sanatorium in Louisville, Kentucky, for the treatment of mental and nervous diseases, and continued the active head of that institution until September, 1916. On August 30, 1917, he was appointed major in the Medical Corps, U. S. A., and chief of the Department of Mental and Nervous Diseases at Camp Zachary Taylor, Kentucky. He was mustered out in September, 1919, with the rank of lieutenant colonel. Subsequently he was commissioned a surgeon in the U. S. public health service and assigned to duty with the Kentucky State Board of Health. On January 1, 1921, he was ordered to active duty in the office of the surgeon general of the Public Health Service, Mental and Nervous Department, at Washington.

Under Governor A. O. Stanley, Doctor Board was medical director of the Workmen's Compensation Board. Since 1910 he has been professor of psychiatry in the University of Louisville. He is a member of the Jefferson County Medical Society, a member and former president of the Kentucky State Medical Association and the Southern Medical Association, and is a member of the Council on Health and Public Instruction of the American Medical Association and a Fellow of that association. He is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and in politics is a democrat.

On May 15, 1895, Doctor Board married Isabel Miller, a native of Hardinsburg, Kentucky. Four children were born to their marriage: Mary Agnes, wife of John L. Dodd; Robert C.; Frank M., who died in infancy, and Isabel.

JOHN S. GLENN, SR., is founder and president of the Glenn Equipment Company, rebuilders and manufacturers of equipment and supplies for railroads and other purposes, constituting one of the large and important industries at Covington. Mr. Glenn learned his business in railway machine shops, and had a long experience in mechanical departments of railroads before starting his present business.

He was born at Cincinnati January 23, 1864. His father, John S. Glenn, Jr., was born in County Galway, Ireland, a young man, after getting his education in the United States about 1859, and after a number of years he was superintendent of a cider and vinegar plant in that city, and then took up street contracting. In 1882 he removed to Ludlow, where he continued in the street contracting business many years. He died at Ludlow in 1916. Soon after coming to the United States he enlisted and served as a Union soldier in the Civil war. He was one of the staunch and useful citizens of Ludlow, and enjoyed the highest esteem. He was a democrat and a Catholic. Nicholas Glenn married at Cincinnati Miss Bride Mahon. She was also a native of County Galway, where she was born in 1841. Her death occurred at Ludlow in 1918. The children of these parents were ten in number: Mary, of Columbus, Ohio, widow of William Burns, who made a business of pasturing and stabling horses and who died at Ludlow; John S.; Edward and Nicholas, both of whom died in childhood; Winifred, who died at Ludlow at the age of forty-four, wife of Thomas Rohan, who is road foreman of engines for the Southern Railway Company at Ludlow; Patrick, a boiler maker who died at Ludlow at the age of thirty-eight; Nicholas, a railway fireman for the Southern Railway living at Ludlow; Edward, who was a professional ball player and was killed in an accident in the Southern Railway shops at Ludlow in 1914; Hannah, wife of John O'Connell, a railroad machinist living at Ludlow; and Andrew, proprietor of a hotel at Ludlow.

John S. Glenn acquired a practical education in the parochial schools of Cincinnati and the public schools of Ludlow. Leaving school at the age of seventeen, he began his six years' apprenticeship as a boiler maker, and followed that trade both at Ludlow and Cincinnati. In 1897 he went with the Big Four Railway, at first as a journeyman in the boiler department and for three years had charge of the boiler shops at Indianapolis. Mr. Glenn for nine years was superintendent of the Cincinnati Equipment Company, a concern specializing in railway equipment. Following that he was for three years president of the Cincinnati Locomotive & Car Works at Covington.

In 1916 he established the Glenn Equipment Company. The company's plant, at Thirty-second Street and the Louisville & Nashville Railway, comprises shops and facilities for manufacture, repair and handling of large machinery. The company builds outright much railroad equipment and general contractors' equipment, and it is the only concern in Kentucky making a specialty of buying old locomotives, rebuilding them and selling back to railway companies. Mr. Glenn is president of the company and has been fortunate in enlisting the cooperation of three of his oldest sons, each competent in some special department of the business. His son John S., Jr., is secretary and treasurer of the company, his son Donald is shop superintendent, and his son Edward is general foreman.

Mr. Glenn is a property owner in Covington and has a modern home at 1551 Madison Avenue. Two of his sons were soldiers in the World war, and at home he loyally aided every drive for funds and other patriotic purposes. He is a democrat and for two terms was a member of the City Council of West Covington. He is a Catholic and is affiliated with Bishop Carroll Council No. 702, Knights of Columbus.

On February 20, 1884, at Covington he married Miss Mattie McEvoy, daughter of Peter and Mattie (Pollard) McEvoy, now deceased. The father was a foundryman and for a number of years owned and operated a foundry in Cincinnati. Mr. and Mrs. Glenn are the parents of nine children: Addie is the wife of John Reynolds, a boiler maker living at Ludlow; Winifred is still at home; John, Jr., secretary and treasurer of the Glenn Equipment Company, served eleven months in France with the Engineers' Corps; Edward is general foreman of the Glenn Equipment Company. Donald, shop superintendent, was with the colors, spending a year in training at Camp Taylor. The younger children are: Eleanor, a graduate of LaSalette Academy at Covington and at home and now specializing in drawing in the Ohio Mechanic Institute at Cincinnati; James, a student at St. Xavier College of Cincinnati; Anna, attending LaSalette Academy in Covington; and Paul, who is a student in the Cathedral parochial school.

REV. EDWARD LINDSAY POWELL. The city of Louisville esteems Doctor Powell as one of its ablest ministers and church leaders, and his continuous service as pastor of the First Christian Church for thirty-four years has earned for him the love and affection of all people within the scope of influence of that large organization. His services have gained him a high place among the ministers of this denomination.

Edward Lindsay Powell was born in King William County, Virginia, May 8, 1860, a son of Edward T. and Mary Anville (Cave) Powell. His parents were natives of Virginia, of old Colonial stock, his mother being a member of the well known Lindsay family. Edward Turner Powell was for many years in the wholesale grocery business at Norfolk, Virginia. His wife died in 1876.

Rev. Edward L. Powell attended private school at Norfolk and at the age of sixteen entered the Christian University at Canton, Missouri, where he graduated with the B. L. degree in 1881. In the meantime he had spent a year in pastoral work at Lynchburg, Virginia, and after leaving university was ordained in the Christian or Disciples Church and at once returned to his native state and was pastor at Gordonsville and Charlottesville. He first came to Kentucky in the fall of 1882, and was pastor of the Christian Church at Hopkinsville for one year. After another stay of about a year at Norfolk he returned to Kentucky and for three years was pastor of a church at Maysville, and in September, 1887, accepted the call to the First Christian Church at Louisville where his work has been characterized by unceasing devotion to the people and best interests of his congregation for more than a third of a century. Doctor Powell is widely known for his eloquence and has also proved his ability on the administrative side of church affairs.

In 1906 he was president of the American Christian Missionary Society. He has been from its organization a trustee of the Louisville Free Public Library, and has been an honorary member of the Louisville Commercial Club since 1904. He is author of two published works, one entitled Savonarola and the other a volume of sermons, the Victory of Faith.

At Maysville, Kentucky, May 11, 1887, Doctor Powell married Miss Lida Smoot, who was born and reared at Maysville. She died February 16, 1907, nearly twenty years after their marriage. On January 12, 1909, Doctor Powell married Dr. Anna Gordon, who with her husband had been a medical missionary in the Central Province of India.

REV. JOHN B. REITER has for twenty-three years been pastor of Holy Cross parish, Latonia Station in Covington. Personally very modest and self-effacing, the work he has done both constructively and as a leader of his parish stands as a permanent memorial to his great energy and zealous devotion to the labors he undertook when the parish contained only a few Catholic families, whereas today Holy Cross Church is the home of a large and prosperous congregation.

The general location of the parish is that district of the modern City of Covington at one time known as "The Flats," later as Milldale, and in 1899 it became the Town of Latonia, remaining such until it was annexed to Covington. Thirty or forty years ago the few Catholic families living there attended service at St. Augustine Church in Covington. In 1889 permission was granted to erect a church and school for forty odd families at Milldale. The founder of the parish was. Rev. Paul Abeln, pastor of St. Augustine's Church. On December 26, 1889, the name sanctioned for the new parish and church was "Holy Cross Church." After some considerable delay a site was bought on the west side of Longworth Street, between Southern Avenue and Franklin Street, and on August 24, 1890, the cornerstone of the first church was laid with appropriate ceremony. The first Mass was said in the building Christmas day, 1890, and before the pews were installed. On May 3, 1891, the first Holy Cross Church was dedicated by the Rt. Rev. Bishop with a large attendance of clergy and Catholics from adjoining parishes.

The first resident pastor was Rev. B. A. Baumeister, who was appointed in December, 1890, and who completed the work begun by Father Abeln. He was pastor until 1895, remaining during the years of financial and economic depression that began in 1893. He was succeeded by Rev. J. D. Meinzer, who served about two years. Father Reiter is the third resident priest and took charge of the congregation on May 29, 1898.

When he became pastor Father Reiter had seventy-two families in the parish. The community was without any modern improvements, but shortly afterward an era of progress began, with the incorporation of Latonia and the rapid growth of population. The new building boom and increased population soon made the original building and grounds inadequate, and in 1903 a new site for a church and parsonage was acquired at the southeast corner of Thirty-sixth and Church streets. In 1906 plans were selected for the new church, and on November 22, 1906, the cornerstone was laid with imposing ceremonies, at which Rt. Rev. Bishop Maes was the central figure. An account of this ceremony is found in the Catholic Telegraph of November 29, 1906, and from that account the following paragraph is taken to supplement this historical sketch:

"Holy Cross parish was founded in 1890 by Father Abeln. Previous to that time the Catholics of Latonia and Madison Pike had to make the then long and tiresome journey to St. Augustine Church, Covington. By tireless effort and great sacrifice on the part of the pastor and the people the present building, combining church and school, was erected and eventually paid for. When the building boom struck Latonia the church soon grew too small for the increasing number of members. The old families, who had worshipped in it when their seats were store boxes were unable to get pews, and there was nothing else left for Father Reiter to do but build a church if he would hold his people together. Through his foresight the congregation has secured the valuable property opposite the originally purchased piece, and on this, at the corner of Church and Franklin streets, the new church will stand. It will be of steel and stone, practically fireproof, and will have a seating capacity of 950 persons. When completed Latonia will have one of the handsomest places of worship in the Covington diocese."

Just two years later, on November 29, 1908, the handsome church was dedicated, and the same publication contains the following paragraph:

"The consensus of opinion gives to Latonia as handsome a church as is to be found in the diocese. This is, of course, primarily due to the splendid generosity of the people, their zeal, their self-sacrifice, and their tireless effort. On the whole, the congregation is a young one, and besides building a church the majority of the people are also engaged in building their own homes. In consideration of this and the hard times that came in the midst of their labors the parish of Holy Cross well deserves the commendation it receives. But leading the congregation is Father Reiter, than whom there is no truer priest, more devoted pastor of souls. Not for any personal ambition did the pastor of Holy Cross undertake this monumental work.

HOLY CROSS CHURCH, COVINGTON, KY.—ERECTED 1908

HOLY CROSS SCHOOL, COVINGTON, KY.—ERECTED 1915

Over and over again did he say from a sincere heart that he loved the little church to which he had been sent some ten years ago, and well was he satisfied with it. But ever upon his ears beat the cry of the newcomers that there was no place for them in the church, no room for their children in the school, and more than once he beheld members of his flock falling from the practice of their religion on this account. There remained but one thing to be done, and he set to work to do it. He would build a church large enough to accommodate the congregation of the present and for some years to come. Not only would the church be commodious, but it would also be good and beautiful, as befits the temple of God; and then he gave himself up to the project with an energy and diligence that would have been a severe strain upon the endurance of a stronger man. But its completion finds him well, and the prayer of his people is that he may long be spared to them, to continue in the new church the work he so faithfully and justly carried on in the old. With his many other friends The Telegraph congratulates Father Reiter on the successful completion of his notable work in Latonia."

The history of Holy Cross school is practically concurrent with the church. A school was opened in charge of a male teacher in February, 1891, and in August of the same year three Benedictine Sisters took charge of the parochial school. New quarters had to be arranged from time to time. By 1913 the number of children in attendance was 354. The parish was heavily in debt, but with the assistance of a generous unnamed benefactor it became possible to plan an adequate and commodious building, which was completed in the spring of 1915. The new building is a two-story pressed brick structure with stone trimmings, and one of the most complete additions to the school architecture of Covington. At the present time fifteen Sisters of the Order of Saint Benedict are teaching a graded elementary school, high school and commercial course.

HERMAN BERNARD BOSSE. In the great and important industry of the production and supply of milk to the cities of Cincinnati and Covington Herman Bernard Bosse is one of the veteran and most interesting figures. He became a practical dairyman almost when a boy working for his father, and has been identified with some phase of the business continuously for thirty-five years or more, on both sides of the river. He is now proprietor of the H. B. Bosse & Sons Dairy, one of the most important sources of pure milk supply for the City of Covington.

He was born in Cincinnati, June 22, 1871. His grandfather, Bernard Bosse, was born in Hanover, Germany, in 1801, and spent the greater part of his active life in his native country, where for many years he was employed in municipal service as a street commissioner. In 1870 he came to Cincinnati, and thereafter lived practically retired until his death in 1885. His son, Henry Bosse, was born in Hanover, Germany; in September, 1845, lived there until he was twenty-one, acquiring a practical education, and in 1866 came to the United States and located at Cincinnati. He was a brick molder by trade, following that trade when it was nearly altogether hand work. After 1886 he engaged in the dairy business in Cincinnati, and was so employed until his death on February 15, 1892. He became a democrat in politics and was a devout member of the Catholic Church. Henry Bosse married Minnie Ruberg. She was born in Hanover, June 22, 1853, and they grew up as neighbor children, though they were not married until they came to Cincinnati. She is still living in that city. They were the parents of seven children, two of whom died in infancy, while Rosa died at the age of five and Anna at the age of six. Herman B. is the eldest. Katherine is the wife of John Theodore Ruther, proprietor of a dairy depot at Cincinnati. Harry Bosse lives at Cincinnati and is employed by the Ruther milk establishment.

Herman Bernard Bosse was educated in the public and parochial schools of Cincinnati, attending school until the age of fifteen. For two summer vacations he worked in a brick yard. After leaving school he went to work for his father in the dairy business, and did a large share of the detailed labor until the death of his father. For two years more he operated the dairy for his mother and then bought the business. He continued its successful operation until 1912. After selling the business he was chosen secretary of the Milk Producers Association of Hamilton County, Ohio, and for two years he looked after the interests of the dairy-men and producers as their business agent, an experience that gave him a broad and practical insight into every detail of the dairy industry. Following that for a year and a half he was employed by the Fayway Butter Company of Cincinnati, after which he joined the Walnut Hills Dairy Company of Cincinnati, a concern with which he was identified three years, two years of the time as manager. For two years and six months he was inside superintendent for the Summe and Ratermann Dairy Company, owners of the Latonia Springs Dairy.

Mr. Bosse on February 1, 1920, bought Henry Hollman's Covington Dairy, changing the name to H. B. Bosse & Sons. His producing plant is at Latonia, at the corner of Southern and Caroline avenues, and the business is one of the largest among those supplying Covington and vicinity.

Mr. Bosse while living in Ohio served as assessor of Milk Creek Township four years. He is an independent democrat, a member of the Catholic Church, and is affiliated with Bishop Carroll Lodge No. 702, Knights of Columbus. He still owns a modern residence in Cincinnati, on the West Fork Road. During the World war he was identified with local patriotic movements in Hamilton County, Ohio, interesting himself particularly in behalf of the Knights of Columbus, Red Cross and Liberty Loan drives.

In 1893, at Cincinnati, Mr. Bosse married Miss Anna Schaffstall, daughter of Fred and Anna (Dersing) Schaffstall, the latter still living in Cincinnati. Her father was a cafe proprietor and died in Cincinnati. Mr. Bosse had the misfortune to lose his wife by death on July 15, 1900. His three children are all by his first marriage. Edmond, the oldest, born in May, 1896, entered the National Army June 26, 1918, was soon sent overseas to France and served just a year. Since his honorable discharge he has been identified with his father's business. Bernard, the second son, also a member of H. B. Bosse & Sons, was born February 15, 1898, and was awaiting the call to the colors when the armistice was signed. The daughter, Dolores, was born January 18, 1900, and is the wife of Bernard Janson, their home being with Mr. Bosse. Mr. Bosse married Miss Katherine Kopman at Cincinnati in 1905. She is a daughter of Bernard and Augusta (Meyer) Kopman. Her mother is living in Cincinnati, where her father, who was a teamster, died.

FORREST A. POPE found his business vocation early in life and for thirty years has been a student, worker or director of a business in drugs and has given Covington one of the choicest enterprises of its kind. A successful merchant, he has been alive to his responsibilities as a citizen, and is a sterling representative of one of the oldest families of Kenton County.

He was born in this county, at Nicholson, in 1872. His grandfather, Henry Pope, was born in Bavaria, Germany, in 1816, was reared and educated in his native land, and in 1840 came to the United States, landing in Baltimore, and soon afterward settled in Kenton County, Kentucky. He lived out his life there and became a well-to-do farmer. He died January 23, 1889. He was a democrat in his political affiliations and an active supporter of the Baptist Church. Henry Pope married Mary Bird, who was born in Kenton County in 1829 and died there in March, 1916. March 7, 1872, in Kenton County Francis M. Pope married Miss Mary B. Fleming. Her grandfather, James Fleming, Sr., was a native of Scotland and one of the pioneer settlers in Kenton County, where he followed farming. He died while visiting in Cincinnati in 1914. James Fleming, Jr., father of Mrs. Francis Pope, was born in Kenton County in 1814, and lived there all his life, dying in 1886. His first wife was Mary Jane Bagby, a native of Kenton County, who died there in 1857.

The children of Mr. Francis M. Pope and wife are: Forrest A.; Orville E., an employe of the Louisville & Nashville Railway Company, living at Covington; Rollie T., who was a railroad man, was born in 1876 and died in Kenton County in 1913; Harry L., a former railway employe, living at Latonia; Grover C., at home and employed by the Louisville & Nashville; Elmer F., also in the service of the Louisville & Nashville, and a resident of Latonia; Irl R., who enlisted as a private for service in the World war, spent about a year in France, was assigned to duty with the Medical Corps and was at the front when the armistice was signed, and is now in the drug business at Detroit, Michigan; and Harley D., who was with the Engineers' Corps, was overseas something over a year, and is now in the plumbing business at Detroit.

Lee Bird at the corner of Southern Avenue and Winston Avenue in Latonia, Covington. At the same time he was carrying his studies in the Cincinnati College of Pharmacy, from which he received his degree Ph.G. in 1893. Then for two years he was a pharmacist in the store of A. T. Dann at Twelfth Street and Russell Avenue in Covington, after which he resumed employment with Doctor Bird. In 1902 he acquired the business of Doctor Bird at Southern Avenue and Winston Avenue, and has for nearly twenty years conducted a high class pharmacy and drug store, the best equipped establishment of its kind in the Latonia section of Covington.

His home is a modern residence at 122 West Thirty-fourth Street, and he also owns a dwelling at 109 West Thirty-third Street. The local organizations for carrying the burden of patriotic work found in Mr. Pope a liberal contributor and constant influence exerted through his personal means and leadership to insure the success of the various drives.

July 2, 1902, at Latonia, Mr. Pope married Miss Emma A. Jones, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Dix Jones, now deceased. Her father was a carpenter at Cincinnati. The death of Mrs. Pope occurred at Latonia, September 6, 1917. During their married life they adopted a daughter, Nina Pope, who was born in July, 1904, and is now attending the Homesdale High School at Covington. On July 17, 1918, at Latonia, Mr. Pope married Miss Lillian Ulrich, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Ulrich.

HENRY CLAY WHITE, M. D. Granted a proper degree of natural ability and good preliminary training, the range of usefulness of a physician and surgeon is limited only by his energy and enthusiasm for active service. The varied activities and associations of Doctor White at Covington prove that he is possessed of an unusual degree of energy and also a willingness to accept responsibilities that have a direct relation to the welfare and progress of his community.

The old White farm on which he was born September 5, 1873, is in Kenton County, five miles south of Covington. The Whites have lived in Kentucky almost as long as Kentucky has been a state. His great-grandfather died in Kenton County. His grandfather, George White, was born in Campbell County in 1801 and spent his active life on a farm in Kenton County, where he died in 1873, the same year that his grandson, Doctor White, was born. George White married Matilda McCollum, who was born in Kenton County in 1809 and died there in 1893.

George F. White, father of Doctor White, was born in 1845, near the birthplace of his son, and for many years was a prosperous farmer at the old homestead south of Covington. He lost his life by drowning in the Licking River in 1898. He was a democrat in politics. George F. White married Augusta Stephens, who was born in Kenton County in 1848 and is now living at Covington. Her grandfather Stephens was a native of Culpeper County, Virginia, and was one of the earliest pioneers of Kenton County, Kentucky. The old homestead settled by him in Kenton County in 1797 is still owned by his descendants. Thomas Stephens, father of Mrs. George F. White, was born in Kenton County in 1802 and spent his active life as a farmer there. He died about 1870. His wife was a Miss Marshall, a life-long resident of Kenton County, who died at the age of fifty-two. Henry Clay White is the older of two children. His sister, Nellie, is the wife of Charles N. Caldwell, of Covington. Mr. Caldwell is an auditor for the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Railroad Department.

Henry Clay White spent his early years on his father's farm, attending in the meantime the rural schools. He graduated from the Covington High School in 1892, and for two years followed the work of teaching in Kenton County. He then entered the Ohio Medical College at Cincinnati, and received his degree in medicine in 1897. For a year Doctor White was an interne in the Good Samaritan Hospital of Cincinnati, and in 1899 began his regular private practice, his home being at Visalia in Kenton County until 1906. Since then he has lived at Latonia, Covington, his modern residence and offices being at 3823 De Courcay Avenue. He now owns the old homestead farm where he was born, five miles south of Covington.

Besides looking after a large general medical and surgical practice Doctor White is the present county health officer of Kenton County, and is a member of the staff of St. Elizabeth Hospital at Covington and United States pension examiner. During the World war he was commissioned a captain in the Medical Reserve Corps, and was called for active duty in October, 1918, being sent to Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia. He was mustered out January 1, 1919. Doctor White is a member of the Campbell-Kenton Counties Medical Society and the State Medical Society. He is vice president of the First National Bank of Latonia, and has served as a member of the School Board of Covington and on the County Board of Teachers' Examiners and the Board of Examiners for the Latonia District. Doctor White is an active member, deacon and trustee of the Christian Church, is a past master of Latonia Lodge No. 746, Free and Accepted Masons, and a member of McClure Chapter, Royal Arch Masons, at Walton, Kentucky. He is also a member of Keturah Chapter No. 50 of the Eastern Star at Latonia and is affiliated with the Junior Order United American Mechanics and the Daughters of America.

In September, 1904, in Kenton County, he married Miss Edith Coleman, daughter of Joseph and Ella (Wright) Coleman, now residents of Covington. Her father is a retired farmer. Doctor and Mrs. White have three children: Lybrand, born September 26, 1905, a high school student; George, born October 4, 1908; and Virginia, born April 15, 1910.

CHARLES NOLTE for a quarter of a century has been in the business of training race horses, and is one of the best known track and turf men in Kentucky. For several years he has been superintendent of the Latonia race track at Covington.

Mr. Nolte was born in Cincinnati, November 13, 1877. His grandfather, Francis Nolte, was a native of Germany, came to America as a young man and settled at Cincinnati. A stone mason by trade, he developed an extensive business as a contractor, and constructed a large part of the sewer system of Cincinnati during his time. Out of his business he acquired a fortune, was a prominent figure in civic circles in Cincinnati and died there in advanced years. His son, Henry Nolte, was born in Cincinnati in 1850 and spent his life in that city. He owned and operated sales stables at Fifth Street between Main and Sycamore, and was a well known dealer in horses. He died in 1888. He was a democrat and a member of the Presbyterian Church. Henry Nolte, married Elizabeth Nixon, who was born at Mason, Ohio, in 1855, and is now living at Latonia, Kentucky. She had two children, the only daughter, Lula, dying at the age of six months.

Charles Nolte until he was eighteen attended grammar and high school at Cincinnati, but for several years previously had worked for his father. After leaving school he was employed in a Cincinnati commission house, but in 1895 began training horses, and in that year received his first license for training and racing horses. That has been his profession and business ever since. He was superintendent of the race track at Douglas Park in Louisville from 1910 to 1918, and since then has been superintendent of the famous mile course at Latonia. This is one of the most noted racing courses in the United States, and is within the city limits of Covington, five miles south of Cincinnati.

Mr. Nolte is a republican in politics, and a member of the Catholic Church. A man of extensive acquaintance he was able to further the sale of bonds and the promotion of other causes during the World war, and was extremely liberal of his own means in sharing patriotic responsibilities. Mr. Nolte resides at 3929 Winston Avenue. He married at Louisville in 1913 Miss Nettie Nixon, daughter of John and Mrs. (Clickey) Nixon, now deceased. Her father was a painter at Wyoming, Ohio.

KIRBY LEE TANNER, M. D. As a physician and surgeon Doctor Tanner has had a very busy career at Covington. He removed to this city after a rather extensive experience as a physician in smaller communities. He is well fitted by training and nature for his work, and enjoys the highest standing not only professionally but in the circles of good citizenship.

Doctor Tanner was born in Boone County, Kentucky, on a farm a mile west of Florence, September 13, 1873. The Tanners have been factors in the life and affairs of Boone County for about a century. His paternal ancestors originated in Germany and were Colonial settlers in Pennsylvania. His great-grandfather was Ephraim Tanner, a native of Virginia, who brought his family to Kentucky and settled in the locality a mile west of Florence in Boone County. His wife was Susanna House, and they reared a family of fourteen children.

Among these children was Joshua Tanner, who was born in Virginia in 1815, and was a boy when his parents settled in Boone County. In later years he became one of the extensive and successful farmers of that section, and he lived on his place a mile west of Florence until his death in 1880. He was always a staunch democrat in politics. Joshua Tanner married Jinsey Jane Rouse, who was born in Boone County in 1817 and died there in 1887. A brief record of their eight children is as follows: William Alfred and James C., both deceased; Angelina, living at Mount Washington, Ohio, widow of William Lancaster, who was a farmer in Boone County, Kentucky; Benjamin Franklin Tanner; Robert, deceased; Linda, of Boone County, widow of Henry Ross, a farmer; Ephraim E., a watchman for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, living at Covington; and Sarah, who died when young.

Benjamin Franklin Tanner was born in Boone County February 14, 1845, was reared and married there, and followed farming until he moved to Covington in 1906. Thereafter he worked at his trade as a carpenter and builder, and died in Covington, one of the highly honored and respected citizens, in November, 1919. He was a very devout member of the English Lutheran Church and in politics was a democrat. Benjamin F. Tanner married Florence Baker, who lives with her son, Doctor Tanner, who is unmarried. Florence Baker was born in Darke County, Ohio, January 21, 1852. Her grandfather was Jacob Baker, one of the very early pioneers of Western Ohio, who developed a farm in Darke County, where he lived until his death. Her father, Augustus Baker, was born in Ohio in 1825, was reared and married in Darke County, and while living there was a carpenter and also a manufacturer of fanning mills. After the death of his wife he moved with his two children to Boone County, Kentucky, in 1860, and followed the trade of carpenter. Soon afterward he enlisted in the Confederate army and served all through the struggle, participating in the second battle of Bull Run, in the siege of Vicksburg and in the Atlanta campaign. After the war he lived near Florence in Boone County, where he died in 1900. Augustus Baker married Mary Wood, who was born in Ohio in 1833 and died in Darke County, that state, in 1857. Her two children were Florence and Charles Clifford Baker. The latter is a farmer in Douglas County, Missouri.

Benjamin F. Tanner and wife had seven children: Charles R., a resident of Covington; Dr. Kirby Lee; Jessie Belle, whose home was at Waltman, Kentucky, and who died in 1906, at Covington, wife of William Brittenhelm, a merchant of Waltman; Miss Daisy Dell, who died at Covington at the age of thirty-two; Blanche, wife of Ed Morrow, who for many years was a construction foreman for large contractors and is now a farmer at Erlanger, Kentucky; Grover Cleveland, a telegraph operator living at Covington; and Clifton Wayne, a machinist whose home is in Boston, Massachusetts.

Kirby Lee Tanner spent his early years on the home farm in Boone County, attended a rural school there, later the public schools of Covington and in 1894 graduated in the English-Business course at the National Normal University of Lebanon, Ohio. For some seven months he traveled in the interests of a publishing company through Illinois and Indiana, and by his own work paid a large part of his expenses for a medical education. Doctor Tanner graduated in 1900 from the Medical College of Ohio at Cincinnati, and in the same year located for practice at Crescent, now Devon, Kentucky. He was there a year, for two years at Erlanger, and three years in his old home community at Florence. In 1906 he moved to Covington, and for fifteen years has been one of the busy physicians and surgeons of the city. He is a member of the Campbell and Kenton Counties Medical Society. During the World war besides his association with other patriotic organizations he did a large share of patriotic duty in examining drafted men from the rural sections of Kenton County. He is a democrat in politics and was formerly affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias. Doctor Tanner owns his modern office and residence at 2611 Madison Avenue.

FREDERICK W. SCHMITZ came to Covington thirty-four years ago, a youth without capital or influence, eager to accept the opportunities and responsibilities of American citizenship, earned his way as a clerk until he could prepare himself for the law, and for the past fifteen years has been busily engaged in a general practice at Covington. He is one of that city's well known lawyers and men of affairs.

He was born in Germany March 14, 1871. His father, Herman Schmitz, was born in 1827 and died in 1879, spending all his life in Baden, where he was a merchant. He was a Lutheran in religion. Herman Schmitz married Ernestine Ruehle, who was born in Wuerttemberg in 1839, and some years after his death came to Covington where she died in 1899. Frederick W. was the third of six children and is the only survivor. The oldest, Herman, died at the age of twenty-two, and the others were Henry, who died at the age of two years, Bertha who died at eighteen, Anna, at sixteen, and Ernestine, at the age of six months.

Frederick W. Schmitz attended school in Germany until he was sixteen, acquiring the equivalent of a high school education. He came to Covington in 1887 and in 1892, on reaching his majority, was naturalized as an American citizen. For several years he was a clerk in stores, and later was employed in the United States revenue service until 1905. While earning his living by these occupations he spent one year in the Cincinnati Law School, and was a student at the night law school of the Cincinnati Young Men's Christian Association for three years, graduating LL. B. in 1906. He at once took up practice, and having acquired a wide acquaintance and being a man of commendable industry and sound abilities has prospered in his professional work. His offices are in the Lawyers Building on Third and Scott streets.

During 1907-08 Mr. Schmitz was attorney for the School Board of Latonia, and from 1914 to 1917, inclusive, was city solicitor of Covington. He is a republican, a Catholic, and a member of Bishop Carroll Council No. 702, Knights of Columbus, and Covington Lodge No. 314 of the Elks. He is a member of the Kenton County Bar Association and of the Industrial Club of Covington. He was a contributor of both time and means to the various patriotic organizations at Covington during the World war. Mr. Schmitz owns a farm in Florida and has considerable real estate in Covington, including his modern home at 3804 Glenn Avenue. In 1899, at Aurora, Indiana, he married Anna Stoll, daughter of Leonard and Caroline Stoll, now deceased. Her father was a butcher in Covington for several years but in 1885 moved his business to Aurora, Indiana. Mr. and Mrs. Schmitz had three children, Alfred, the youngest, dying at the age of six months. Ernestine, who was born June 14, 1900, is a graduate of Notre Dame Academy of Covington, and is serving her novitiate as a member of the sisterhood of Notre Dame at the mother house of the order located at Cleveland, Ohio. Karl David, born May 6, 1901, is a graduate of St. Xavier's High School at Cincinnati and is employed in a Cincinnati publishing house.

ALEXANDER JOHN AITCHESON ALEXANDER, M. D. From his chosen career as a medical missionary Doctor Alexander was diverted to the care and superintendence of the extensive estate of the Alexander family in Woodford County, and his life for the last twenty years has been largely that of a country gentleman, a farmer and business man. His home, its associations and his family record are all subjects of widespread interest in the Blue Grass district.

The delightful home in which he lives today was the place where he was born August 5, 1875. His parents were Alexander John and Lucy (Fullerton) Alexander. His father was born on the same farm October 7, 1824, but in another house, which is also still standing. His grandfather was Robert Alexander, a native of Scotland, and a son of William Alexander, who lived in France for several years, Robert going to that country in his boyhood. In 1788 Robert Alexander read law in Lincoln Inns at London. While in France he had the great honor of serving as private secretary to Benjamin Franklin, then representing American interests abroad. He introduced Mr. Franklin to the British ambassador as one of the first steps in the formal negotiation of the Peace of Paris. William Alexander was a buyer of Virginia tobacco, which he shipped to his brother, A. J. Alexander, in Scotland. This business brought him to Virginia, where he married for his second wife Agatha Delaporte, and they lived near Staunton.

It was in 1790 that Robert Alexander bought an extensive tract of 2,000 acres of land, including some of the holdings of the family now in Woodford County. He was a skilled surveyor, his surveying instruments being still preserved by his grandson, Doctor Alexander. The governor of Kentucky about 1817 selected Robert Alexander to make a survey of the land between the states of Tennessee and Kentucky. Robert Alexander was elected president of the first bank of Kentucky, at Frankfort, and during his residence in that city he married Eliza Richardson Weisiger, daughter of Joseph and Lucy (Price) Weisiger, of Frankfort, where her father was proprietor of one of the pioneer hotels. In 1820 Robert Alexander was deposed as president of the bank. In the meantime he had asked his father, William Alexander, to come to Kentucky, and William died in this state in 1819, in his ninetieth year. Robert Alexander on leaving Frankfort in 1820 moved to the farm and lived in the house he built about 1790. He died at Frankfort in 1841, his death being occasioned by his carriage slipping over a steep embankment. He was then seventy-three. His wife had died in 1839. While in Kentucky he was a member of the Legislature and was a captain of militia. His estate comprised about 600 acres at the time of his death.

Robert Alexander's second child was Robert, Jr., who was born in 1819 and died in 1867. He went to England in 1835, again went back to England in 1841, and attended Trinity College, Cambridge University, living there with his family, and in 1850 came to the old Kentucky homestead and gradually bought back a large part of the property which had become distributed by sale, including the present home of Doctor Alexander. He died in that home in 1867. He was a noted breeder of thoroughbreds and one of the first importers of fine horses and also an importer of Shorthorn cattle and Shetland ponies. He owned the "Airdrie" iron works in Muhlenberg County, a property sold after his death. It was named in honor of his old home in Scotland.

A. J. A. Alexander

He died a British subject. During the Civil war he was a neutral, and guerrillas stole his horses and otherwise annoyed him. He founded the journal known as the American Trotting Horse, and was widely known in racing circles, having owned Lexington, one of the great sires at Woodburn Farm. He was inheritor of the Airdrie estate in Scotland.

Another child of Robert Alexander, Sr., was Lucy, who became the wife of James B. Waller and died in Chicago in 1902.

The son, Alexander John Alexander, was born October 7, 1824, and in 1841 accompanied his older brother to England. His sisters Lucy and Mary Belle also went with him. Mary Belle was then twelve years of age, and she remained in England, where she married Henry Charles Deedes and died in England in 1913. Alexander John Alexander while abroad attended Cambridge University and about 1849 returned to the United States and married Lucy Caroline Humphreys, of Woodford County, settling opposite the old home of David Humphreys on Leestown Pike. Three children were born to their union, David, Mary and Robert. An unusual train of tragic circumstances followed in quick succession during a period of fifteen months in 1858-59, when Alexander John's wife and their three children all died, and his home was destroyed by fire. He afterward resided in Texas, and at the outbreak of the Civil war went to Chicago, where he remained until peace was restored.

After his brother's death in 1867 he lived alone in the house that is now the home of his son, Doctor Alexander. He inherited all this property and was executor for the Muhlenberg County property. He had extensive interests in Chicago real estate. Alexander John Alexander continued in the thoroughbred industry of the family. He mated the sire and dam on this farm of perhaps the world's greatest horse, Maud S, but sold her as a yearling before her fame was established. He developed a number of other noted trotters, but his interest was confined to the breeding stables and he never raced. He also had a herd of Shorthorns and was a very successful stockman.

In 1871 Alexander John Alexander married Lucy Fullerton, of Chillicothe, Ohio, a first cousin of his first wife. Alexander John Alexander died at the old home December 2, 1902, being survived by his widow, who passed away October 7, 1909, on his birthday, when sixty-four years of age. She was the mother of eight children: Robert and Elizabeth Fullerton, both of whom died in infancy; Alexander John Aitcheson; Lucy Fullerton, wife of William E. Sims, living on part of the original Alexander estate; Humphrey Fullerton, who died in childhood; Claude Aitcheson, who died at the age of twenty; Joseph Scott, who died when twenty-three; Kenneth Deedes, a noted New York horseman.

Dr. A. J. A. Alexander had private tutors until he was fifteen, then entered the Lawrenceville Preparatory School in New Jersey, and from that was enrolled in Princeton University, graduating A. B. in 1897. In 1901 he received his M. D. degree from Columbia University at New York, and immediately planned to embark on his career as a medical missionary. In the fall of 1902 he started for Korea, and had crossed the Pacific, the news of his father's death preceding him to his station by a few hours. He remained at his post of duty two months and then returned home. His mother's health was such as to demand his attention, and he also became the executor of his father's estate. The manager of this estate was the well remembered Lucas Brodhead, who died in 1914. Doctor Alexander has 887 acres surrounding his home and has done much in the line of livestock, keeping a herd of Herefords, though the farm is no longer a center for thoroughbred horses. He has exhibited his livestock with considerable success at several state and local fairs.

In 1905 Doctor Alexander married Kate Lee Holloway, of Kansas City, Missouri, daughter of James M. Holloway, a former merchant. They have two children, Alexander John and James Holloway, both attending school at Lexington. Two daughters, Evelyn Byrd and Katherine Holloway, died in infancy.

The home of Doctor Alexander is about fifteen miles west of Lexington, on the old Frankfort Pike. He is a member of the Country Club of Lexington, the Versailles Presbyterian Church, in which he is an elder, and every Sunday afternoon he conducts a Sunday school on his farm. In 1916 he was chosen chairman of the Democratic Forward League, which was organized to further the cause of prohibition. It was through the work of this league that Kentucky was put in the dry column and was the third state in the United States to ratify the prohibition amendment. For seventeen years he has been a member of the board of trustees of Center College and is now chairman of the board. He is also a member of the executive committee of the Layman's Missionary Movement, and during the World war did some active Young Men's Christian Association work at Camp Knox, while Mrs. Alexander was local manager among the women handling the war drives in Woodford County. She is a member of the Woman's Club at Lexington. Doctor and Mrs. Alexander spend every summer in a cottage at Wequetonsing on Little Traverse Bay in Northern Michigan. Their home is one of great interest to the historian and the art lover. The art gallery annex was erected by Doctor Alexander's father and is a feature not found in many Kentucky homes. Here there is ample scope for the display of many notable portraits, including representatives of each generation of the Alexander family from 1707. There is also a portrait of Thomas Jefferson by the great Kentucky artist Matthew Jouett, and a portrait of Benjamin Franklin painted in 1772 by David Martin, who executed two portraits of the great statesman, one being owned by the Biddles in Philadelphia.

JAMES BAILEY BLACKWELL, cashier of the Webster County Bank of Clay, grew up in that county, is one of its most progressive young business men, and has been identified with this bank for eighteen years, a period marked by increasing efficiency and constant faithfulness of service.

Mr. Blackwell was born on a farm in Webster County January 5, 1881, a son of John C. and Belle (Potts) Blackwell. His grandparents were Jesse and Almedia (McKinney) Blackwell. John C. Blackwell, who was born in Webster County August 20, 1860, has been a farmer for over forty years, and out of his hard work and good management has achieved a competency for his declining years. He was always progressive in farming matters as well as in his influence as a citizen of his locality and now owns a large farm of 272 acres in Union and Webster counties. He is a democrat in politics and a member of the Missionary Baptist Church. His wife, Belle Potts, was born in Union County, Kentucky, a daughter of Bluford and Mary (Brown) Potts. She died when twenty-seven years of age, leaving two children, James Bailey and Lily Maude. The second wife of John C. Blackwell was Mrs. Rosa (Fryer) Colvin. She is the mother of two sons and four daughters, and they all live on the farm in Webster County.

James Bailey Blackwell spent his youth on the farm and shared in its duties and work. He attended country schools, the Clay High School, taught four terms in country districts, and also continued his higher education at Marion and in Bowling Green.

Mr. Blackwell entered the service of the Webster County Bank in February, 1903, as assistant cashier. Since the fall of 1906 he has had the duties of cashier, and his ability as a banker and his genial character have done much to promote the strength of that institution among the county's banks.

Mr. Blackwell is a staunch democrat and a member of the Missionary Baptist Church. In 1904 he married Miss Ruby Clark, daughter of Thomas Marshall Clark of Webster County. They have one son, Kenneth Blackwell.

CHARLES HAERNLE. The Haehnle Provision Company of Covington, in which the three moving spirits are the Haehnle brothers, Charles being president of the corporation, is a well known packing industry in Kentucky.

Charles Haehnle was born at Cincinnati April 19, 1866. He was educated in his native city, completing the work of the intermediate schools at the age of twelve. About a year later he began working in the packing house of what is now the A. Sander Packing Company of Cincinnati. He learned the packing business from the ground up, and altogether was actively associated with the Sander Company for a period of twenty-eight years. When that business was incorporated in 1892 he was treasurer of the company, an office he held until 1908.

The extension of the packing industry to Covington through the Haehnle brothers came in 1908, when Mr. Charles Haehnle bought from Henry Feltman buildings and grounds at 309-315 West Twelfth Street. He remodeled the buildings and organized the Haehnle Provision Company, which was incorporated in 1910. The executive officers are Charles Haehnle, president; Oscar Haehnle, vice president; and Frank Haehnle, secretary and treasurer. This company buys green meats, cures and manufactures various meat products, including sausage and lard, and these products are marketed all over Kentucky under the Blue Grass brand.

JOHN CURTIS SNOW, M. D. The Snow family is one of the best known in Webster County, and its members are connected with the best interests of the several communities in which they have seen fit to establish themselves. One of them, held in high esteem both as a man and a physician is Dr. John Curtis Snow of Providence, one of the leading lights of his profession in this part of the state. Doctor Snow was born on a farm in Crittenden County, Kentucky, January 3, 1883, a son of Samuel A. and Rosa Belle (Williams) Snow, natives of Union and Crittenden counties, Kentucky, respectively. For many years they have resided in Crittenden County, upon their fine farm, and Mr. Snow has long been recognized as one of the leading farmers and citizens of this region.

Doctor Snow was reared on the home farm and attended the rural schools of his native county and the graded schools of Marion, Kentucky. When he was twenty-one years old he entered the Hospital College of Medicine at Louisville, where for two years he attended medical lectures. For one year thereafter he was a student in the Louisville Medical and Hospital College, and then attended for one year the University of Louisville, from which he received his degree of Doctor of Medicine June 30, 1909. Until September 1, 1910, he was engaged in a general practice of medicine at Bordley, Union County, Kentucky, on that date locating at Henshaw in the same county. There he was actively engaged in practicing medicine until November 8, 1918, when he volunteered his services to the United States Government, was accepted and commissioned a first lieutenant in the Medical Corps. He was stationed at Camp Greenleaf, Chickamauga Park, Georgia, until January 18, 1919, when he was honorably discharged. Some do not yet appreciate what a service the physicians and surgeons of this country rendered when they enlisted in order that the soldiers might have adequate attention in the training camps and abroad. There was as much need for experienced medical men in these camps as at the front, and these faithful men of science devoted themselves to the work assigned them, although many went into the army at a great personal sacrifice, leaving their families, giving up paying connections, and asking only to be permitted to use their skill in behalf of their country. The time will come when these physicians and surgeons will be accorded their place in the history of the great war and its termination much more abruptly than was hoped for by the most sanguine.

After receiving his discharge Doctor Snow came to Providence and associated himself with his father-in-law in the practice of his profession, and since then has built up a large practice. He belongs to the Webster County Medical Society and the Kentucky State Medical Society. Fraternally he is a Knight of Pythias and Odd Fellow. The Missionary Baptist Church holds his membership. His political convictions have led him to give his unqualified support to the republican party.

On July 27, 1903, Doctor Snow was married to Miss Bertha Wallace, a daughter of Dr. J. B. Wallace, one of the eminent physicians and surgeons of Providence. Doctor Snow is carrying on his practice all the better because of his experience in the army, which has given him a deep and enlightened interest in constructive community problems. His character is one which creates respect and invites friendship, and he numbers among his warm, personal friends some of the leading men of the city and county.

ALBERT SIDNEY DENTON, M. D. While he has been a busy physician and surgeon at Robard, Henderson County, for thirty years, Doctor Denton is also widely known over the state as a former useful member of the Legislature, and his entire career has been one of more than ordinary accomplishment and attainment.

Doctor Denton was born on a farm in Henderson County February 22, 1867, son of Elymas and Matilda M. (Reeder) Denton. His paternal grandparents were John and Lucy (Chambers) Denton, natives of North Carolina, who were brought to Kentucky when children, the Dentons locating in Henderson County and the Chambers family in Daviess County. Elymas Denton was born in Henderson County, owned and operated a farm, but at the time of his death, at the age of thirty-two, was county jailer. His wife, also a native of Henderson County, was a daughter of John and Ann (Hicks) Reeder. She was the mother of three daughters and two sons.

Albert Sidney Denton was nine years of age when his father died, and his early youth was one of limitations, involving personal application to the duties of the home farm and the personal earning of the means to achieve his ambition to become a physician. He grew up on a farm, attended the common schools, and after a course in the West Kentucky Normal at South Carrollton was a teacher four years. His work as a teacher gave him the means to enter medical school, and in 1891 he graduated from the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville. He at once located at Robard, and has been the leading representative of his profession in that community for nearly thirty years. He is a member of the Henderson County and Kentucky State Medical associations.

Doctor Denton was elected a member of the Legislature in 1899 and by re-election in 1901 and 1903 served three full terms. He busied himself with a study of the various bills and in looking after the interests of his constituents. He is perhaps best known through his authorship of the bill defining the regulations for public fence building for railroads and for line fences between individual properties. Doctor Denton is a democrat, a Master Mason, and a member of the Methodist Church.

In 1891 he married Miss Blanch Covington, of Muhlenberg County, Kentucky. She had also taught school prior to her marriage, and both the daughters of Doctor and Mrs. Denton have made notable records as educators. The older, Stella Earl, is a graduate of West Kentucky State Normal, and was a teacher for seven years before her marriage to Dr. F. J. Eakins, now a medical officer with the rank of first lieutenant in the United States Navy. The younger daughter, Catherine A., graduated in 1920 from the University of Kentucky, and is now teacher of home economics at Central City, Kentucky.

In April, 1916, he was appointed county judge of Kenton County by Governor A. O. Stanley to fill the unexpired term of the late Judge Walter W. Cleary. In November, 1917, he was regularly elected for a four year term, and began his term in January, 1918, and was re-elected for a term of four years in 1921. He served as chairman of the Board of Instructions for soldiers drafted or enlisted from Kenton County in the World war, and worked with every other organization to insure the success of drives for funds. He was a wholesale grocer, a member of the firm Kelly, Frazier & Company of Cincinnati. Mrs. Read is a graduate of the La Sahette Academy of Covington. Their four children are named: John B., Fred Kelly, Jane Elizabeth and George A.

GEORGE J. BEACH, in his second term as city recorder of Covington, is a banker by training, and he gave up congenial duties and important responsibilities with one of Covington's banks to give his time to the municipal government.

Mr. Beach was born at Covington October 7, 1887. His parents, George T. and Catherine (Jenkins) Beach, were both born in Tredegar, Monmouthshire, England, his father in 1843 and his mother in 1845. His mother is still living at Covington. George T. Beach, who died at Covington in 1914, was for years a prominent business man of the city. He was still young when he came to the United States and located at Covington, where he married and where he took up the business of a contracting painter. He was a master of that important branch of the building trades, and developed an expert organization that handled a large amount of the best quality of work done in Covington and adjacent cities both for residences and business buildings. George T. Beach was also a director of the Farmers & Traders National Bank of Covington, the Peoples Savings Bank & Trust Company, and the Central Savings Bank & Trust Company. He was active in political and civic affairs, served on the School Board, on the City Council and Board of Aldermen, and from 1904 to 1907 was mayor of Covington. In politics he was a republican, was an active member of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, and was affiliated with the Masonic Order, Knights of Pythias and Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He is a republican, attends the First Church of Christ, Scientist, of Newport, and is secretary and treasurer of the Newport & Covington Bridge. All the time not demanded by his official duties was unselfishly and enthusiastically devoted to war activities in Kenton County, and he assisted in promoting the success of every drive in that section.

Mr. Beach resides at 519 Garrard Street. He married at Ludlow, Kentucky, November 15, 1910, Miss Mildred Margileth, daughter of Edmond H. and Emma (Laferty) Margileth, residents of Ludlow. Her father is vice president of the E. R. Webster Company of Cincinnati. Mr. and Mrs. Beach have two children, Emma Elizabeth, born September 3, 1911, and George M., born May 5, 1916.

WILLIAM H. TABELING has been an active business man as a merchant at Covington since he was twenty years of age. He is proprietor of one of the large dry goods stores of the city, and accumulating interests have given him a wide range of connections with other business organizations and with the institutions and enterprises that promote the welfare of the community.

Covington is his birthplace. He was born February 16, 1875. His grandfather, John Clements Tabeling, was born in Germany in 1812. On coming to America he spent a brief time at New Orleans and then removed to Cincinnati. He was a carriage woodworker, and a number of years before the Civil war settled at Covington, where he followed his trade, and during the war helped make wagons and trucks for the Government. He died at Covington in 1890. After coming to this country he married Miss Stallo, a cousin of Judge Stallo. She was born in Germany in 1828 and is living in Covington at the age of ninety-three. Henry Tabeling, father of William H., was born in Cincinnati in 1848, but was reared and married in Covington, and has spent practically all his life in that city. He is now a retired carriage manufacturer. He votes as a democrat and is a member of the Catholic Church. His wife was Josephine Nepper, who was born in Cincinnati in 1855 and died at Covington in 1908. Of her four children William H. is the oldest. Rosa, who assists William in his business, lives with her father; Ida is the wife of Henry Pelstring, a cabinet maker living at 830 Willard Street in Covington; Harry C. is a shoe merchant, whose home is on Willard Street.

William H. Tabeling attended the parochial schools of Covington until he was fourteen, and on leaving school began acquiring experience for a business career. For one year he was errand boy in Pickering's hardware store in Cincinnati and for five years was a collector with the wholesale dry goods house of Joseph E. Brigle of Cincinnati. During these years he studied dry goods merchandising, familiarized himself with credits and other branches of the business, and though very modestly equipped as to capital he had other qualifications for success when at the age of twenty he opened his stock of dry goods on the south side of Pike Street. During the past quarter of a century he has pursued his role of merchant with undeviating regularity and faithfulness, and has seen his trade grow, and since 1906 has been located at 408 Pike Street, where he owns the building and ground. His residence is also in this brick building, and he owns the adjoining structure at 410 Pike Street.

Mr. Tabeling is vice president of the Latonia Building Association and is a director in the Liberty National Bank of Covington and the Covington Building Association. He is a director of the Kenton County Humane Society, has served as a member of the School Board of Covington, and is a member of the Retail Merchants Association, Industrial Club and the Orphans Society. He is a Catholic, a democrat, and a member of Bishop Carroll Council No. 702, Knights of Columbus. During the war he was an investor in Government securities, and gave much of his time to local war causes, particularly the Red Cross drives and War Savings Stamps sales.

September 11, 1906, Mr. Tabeling married at Morris, Indiana, Miss Eleanor Bishop, daughter of A. G. and Charlotta Bishop, the latter now deceased. Her father is a retired flour miller on Sterrett Avenue in Covington. Mr. and Mrs. Tabeling have two children: Richard, born in 1907, and Robert, born in 1916.

CAPT. PENDLETON FARMER DE WEESE KEITH was a widely known Kentuckian, a soldier under General Morgan on the Confederate side, and a man well qualified for leadership whether in a farming community, in war or in public affairs.

George and Alexander Keith, claiming descent from Lord Keith, Earl Marischal of Scotland, were colonists to Southern Maryland and were the founders of the Keith family in America. The name is also found in Frederick, Maryland, at an early date and in the vicinity of Hagerstown. The coat of arms of these Keiths is as follows: Arms—Argent on a chief gules three pallets or Crest—On a wreath, a stag's head erased proper and attired with ten tynes. Supporters—Two stags, proper, attired as the crest. Motto—Veritas Vincit (Truth Conquers). Robert (A. D. 1005), Prince of the Chatti, was knighted by Malcolm for slaying Camus, a Danish general.

The king arrived shortly after the deed was done and dipped his three middle fingers into the blood of his fallen foe and drew three strokes or pales on Robert's shield and said to those about him, "Veritas Vincit." These pales and words have ever since been the arms and motto of this family. The king then created him Great Marischal of Scotland. He is known in history as Robert Keith.

Bishop Robert Keith, directly descended from William Keith, (3rd) Earl Marischal, is in the direct line of descent to the subject of this sketch. Rev. James Keith, the reputed nephew of Bishop Robert Keith, whose connection with the Earl Marischal was unquestioned, is said to have left Scotland for taking the part of the pretender in 1715. He was for a time in Henrico Parish but later settled in Fauquier County, Virginia. Rev. James Keith married Mary Isham Randolph, daughter of Thomas Randolph, of Tuckahoe, and Mary Fleming. He probably removed to Fauquier County about 1732, where he died 1758-60. James and Mary Randolph Keith had eight children.

James Keith, Jr., the eldest son, was for sixty years clerk of the Court of Frederick County, Virginia. He had two sons, James and John.

John Keith the second son, from whom the subject is in direct descent, married a Miss Doniphan and lived and died in Virginia. They had four children, George the youngest follows next in line of descent. He married Agnes McCoy and was the father of eleven children, of whom John Doniphan Keith was the immediate ancestor. The others were, Thomas, Alexander, Mary, Martha, Eliza, Kittie, James, Frank, Anderson and Clay. Mary Isham Keith, daughter of Rev. James Keith, married Thomas Marshall. They had fifteen children of whom the oldest was John Marshall, chief justice of the United States.

Capt. Pendleton Farmer De Weese Keith was born in Pendleton County October 27, 1835. John Doniphan Keith, father of Captain Keith, married Mary Ann Holmes, whose mother was a Morrison of the same family that donated Morrison Chapel in Lexington.

Captain Keith served with the rank of captain under Gen. John Morgan until captured at Mount Sterling, and the remainder of the war he spent as a prisoner, being at Johnson's Island at the end of hostilities. He was always deeply interested in his Confederate comrades. He was one of nine brothers and the only one to fight on the Confederate side. His father and several of his brothers were Union soldiers. Captain Keith at one time held the office of United States marshal. He was a radical democrat and deeply interested in public affairs. For thirty-five years his family have had their home in Fayette County.

In 1865, at Maysville, Captain Keith married Sarah Howard Herbst. She was born at Maysville November 14, 1837, and is still living with her children on the farm near Lexington. Her parents were George and Esther (Cox) Herbst, the former of German and the latter of English ancestry. The father was the pioneer banker of Maysville, Kentucky.

Captain Keith died in Fayette County, October 14, 1912. His six children comprise a very interesting and enterprising family group, all of them living with their mother and operating a dairy near the Hydraulic Lake, three miles south of Lexington. They are sound Americans, possessed of the old American tradition of honorable industry, and Miss Lula, the head of the family, has been deeply interested in the success of woman's enfranchisement. The children are Lula D., who for six years was a successful teacher in Fayette County; John H.; George W. and Pickett, twins; Addie and Charles.

WILLIAM JUDSON NEAL, trainmaster of the Terminal Division of the Chesapeake & Ohio at Covington, has been railroading almost continuously since he was eighteen years of age, and the greater part of that time his headquarters have been in Covington, where he is one of the oldest and most trusted officials of the Chesapeake & Ohio.

Mr. Neal was born at Ansted, West Virginia, November 27, 1873. His father F. G. Neal, a venerable man of eighty-three at the time of this writing is still living at Ansted, one of the highly respected citizens of that locality. He was born in Monroe County, West Virginia, in 1837, was reared in his native locality, was married in Fayette County, and since then has lived in Ansted. During his active life he followed the trade of carpenter. He is a very devout Baptist and a democrat in politics. F. G. Neal married Nancy Burton, who was born in Fayette County, West Virginia, in 1838 and is now eighty-two. They became the parents of seven children: Millard Fillmore, a farmer in Fayette County, West Virginia; Ollie, wife of Dave Alderson, a railroad man living at Roncevert, West Virginia; Jennie, wife of R. Egan, a prominent retired resident of Fayetteville, West Virginia, who has filled the office of sheriff and county assessor; Mrs. Lillie Calvon, of Ansted; William Judson; Myrtle, who is married and lives at Hinton, West Virginia; and Daisy, wife of William Straughan, a machinist of Huntington, West Virginia.

P. F. Keck

William Judson Neal had a public school education at Ansted. Leaving school at fifteen, he worked with his father at the carpenter's trade until 1891, and in that year began railroading as a brakeman with the Chesapeake & Ohio, with headquarters at Hinton, West Virginia. In July, 1894, he was transferred to Covington as yard switchman, was promoted to yard master, and in 1902 was returned to Hinton as general yard master. After two months he came back to Covington as night yard master and subsequently was made general yard master. His long continuous service with the Chesapeake & Ohio was broken by a period of only eighteen months, during which he was a grocery merchant at Covington. When he resumed railroading it was as night yard master at Newport News, Virginia, and after three months he was made general yard master and continued on duty there eight months in that capacity and then for six months was assistant train master of the Newport News Terminal.

November 28, 1918, Mr. Neal's duties brought him back to his congenial home associations at Covington, where he was made trainmaster of the Terminal Division, an office in which his supervision extends to 200 employees. His offices are in the C. & O. Office Building at Fourteenth Street and Madison Avenue.

Mr. Neal owns one of the fine comfortable homes of Covington, at Eighteenth and Scott streets. He is a republican in politics, and during the World war, while his service constituted a thoroughly patriotic activity, he helped in the success of all the drives for funds and bond sales. On July 8, 1897, at Covington, he married Margaret McGillaway, who died in 1898, leaving a daughter, Pauline, still at home with her father. On June 12, 1918, at Covington, Mr. Neal married Miss Helen Madden, a native of that city.

HARRY H. MARTIN, secretary, treasurer and general manager of the Martin Foundry Company, is directing one of the important industries of Covington, a business that logically is a continuation of the foundry experience of three generations of the Martin family.

Mr. Martin's grandfather was named Harry H. Martin. He was born in Ohio about 1810, lived the greater part of his life at Gallipolis on the Ohio River, and his trade and business was that of a foundryman. For many years he was superintendent of a foundry at Gallipolis, and late in life moved to Covington, where he was superintendent of the Lane & Bodley Foundry Company at Cincinnati. The Martins are an old English family, and settled in Pennsylvania in Colonial days.

The president of the Martin Foundry Company is W. H. Martin, who lives at Covington. He was born at Gallipolis, Ohio, in 1853, was reared there, but when about fifteen went to work at Covington to learn the trade of iron moulder. At the age of twenty-one he established the Star Foundry of Covington, and made it a business that supplied iron castings for a large trade throughout the Ohio Valley. Under his management it became one of the chief foundries of Kentucky. In 1890 he reorganized his business as the Germania Supply & Foundry Company, with plant located at Second Street and the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Bridge. The business was reincorporated as the Martin Foundry Company in 1917, and he is still its active head. W. H. Martin is a socialist in politics and is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He married Mary I. Fisher, who is vice president of the Martin Foundry Company. She was born in Covington in 1855. Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Martin have seven children: Edgar, who is postmaster at Ludlow, Kentucky; Sadie I., of Denver, Colorado, widow of Harry J. Seerey, a bookkeeper who died in Denver; Harry H.; Mabel, wife of Thomas J. Dunn, assistant manager of the Modern Packing Company of Cincinnati, their home being in Covington; Frank, foreman of the Houston, Stanwood & Gamble Company's boiler shops in Covington; Jennie, who died at Covington in November, 1917, wife of William Baker, who is a boiler maker with the Houston, Stanwood & Gamble Company; and Stanley, who owns and operates a garage on the Ludlow Highway between Covington and Ludlow.

Harry H. Martin was born at Covington July 14, 1880, attended the public schools and at the age of thirteen went to work in his father's foundry. He started in the business with the idea of making it a permanent career, and was not satisfied to master merely one branch of the technique of iron casting, but acquired every detail of the foundry business. For many years he has been one of the well qualified foundry men of the Ohio Valley, and has kept the business growing under his active management. The foundry established and built up by his father was incorporated as the Germania Foundry Company, and the business was reincorporated at the change of the name in 1917 to the Martin Foundry Company. Mr. Martin and his father and his mother constitute the executive officers of the company. The plant now employs a force of twelve hands, and its regular output is chiefly window weights, grate bars and sewer castings, but the plant also has facilities for a large amount of special and custom work.

Mr. Martin was actively associated with various organizations of Covington for carrying out Liberty Bond sales and other measures during the World war. He is one of Covington's prosperous business men, owns some real estate on Main Street and a home at 403 Delmar Place. He is a former member of the Industrial Club, is a republican, is affiliated with the Presbyterian Church and a member of Golden Rule Lodge No. 345, Free and Accepted Masons, at Covington.

Mr. Martin married Miss Mary Kaelin at Covington in 1900. Her parents Michael and Anna (Steecken) Kaelin, live on Kyle's Lane in Kenton County, her father being a retired farmer. Mr. and Mrs. Martin have three children: Harry, born June 11, 1901, attended the Covington High School and during 1918 was employed in the Government service at the DuPont Powder Plant at Knoxville, Tennessee. He is now associated with his father's business. William, born November 9, 1903, attended high school into the senior year and is now working at his father's plant. The daughter, Viola, born January 15, 1905, is a student in the Covington High School.

HENRY GIVENS. A man who is known all over Webster County as a citizen of the highest standing and a wise and sagacious banker of wide experience, Henry Givens is capably discharging the heavy responsibilities connected with his position as chairman of the Board of Directors of the Providence and Citizens Banking and Trust Company. He was born on a farm in what was then Hopkins County, but is now Webster County, April 6, 1849, a son of Thomas K. and Judith (Gist) Givens, both of whom were born in Kentucky. The father lived to be seventy-nine years of age, and the mother to be eighty-four. The paternal grandfather, James Givens, was also born in Kentucky, and his father, a native of Virginia, settled in Hopkins County at a very early day. Ten children were born to Thomas K. Givens and his wife, four sons and six daughters. He was a farmer and dealer in tobacco, and moved to Providence when Henry Givens was five years of age, and here he has always resided.

The common schools gave Henry Givens his preliminary training, and he learned to be useful by doing farm work. He began his business career as a merchant in association with his father, and he was also interested in the latter's tobacco business. For over thirty years Henry Givens continued his mercantile interests, and later branched out as a banker. In 1885 he was one of the organizers of the Providence Banking Company, and has always been on its directorate. He served as its first president, and continued in that office until 1898, when he disposed of his mercantile establishment and became the bank's cashier, remaining in active charge of its affairs until 1919, when this bank was incorporated with the Citizens Bank under the name of the Providence and Citizens Banking and Trust Company, and since then he has been chairman of its board. The Missionary Baptist Church holds his membership, and he is a Master Mason.

Mr. Givens has been three times married. In 1874 he was first married to Aggie Rice, who bore him three children, namely: Virgil, Lenora and Karr. The first Mrs. Givens died in 1884, and later Mr. Givens was married to Mrs. Byrd Murphy, née Pike, who bore him one child, Ruth. After her death Mr. Givens, in 1908 was married to Mrs. Amelia Sugg, née Givens.

It would be difficult to find a man more thoroughly respected by all classes than is Mr. Givens. He has passed all of his life in Webster County, and with the exception of his first five years has lived at Providence so very naturally his interests are centered in this neighborhood. His experience as a banker and his knowledge of men and affairs give him an insight into human nature and his judgment is relied upon by his fellow citizens. It is safe to say that all legitimate and wholesome movements have his backing, and he has been instrumental in interesting outside capital in local enterprises. Such men cannot be too highly appreciated, for their value to their communities is beyond price.

EDWARD NATHANIEL RICE, M. D. of Providence, is one of the best-known and most highly respected physicians and surgeons of Webster County, and is a man who deserves the prosperity to which he has attained. He was born on a farm in Webster County January 24, 1867, a son of Joseph N. and Elizabeth K. (Givens) Rice, both of whom were born in Hopkins County. The grandfather, Edward Rice, was born in North Carolina, and his father was a native of Ireland. Edward Rice married Macy Nichols in North Carolina, and they then came to Kentucky, making the trip on horseback and carrying their few effects with them, and on account of danger from Indians he kept his rifle in his hands. He was born in 1794 and she in 1799, and he lived to be seventy-eight years of age and she to be seventy-four. They settled in what was then Hopkins County but is now Webster County, and there resided for many years. The maternal grandfather, Nathaniel Givens, was born in Hopkins County, of Virginia stock.

Joseph N. Rice was a farmer who died in 1908, aged seventy-three years, but his wife died in 1893, when fifty-two years old. In religious faith they were Cumberland Presbyterians. Their living children are as follows: Macy, Jennie, Mary K., Edward N. and Katie, and all were reared on their father's farm. One child, Frances Marion, died, aged five years.

Doctor Rice attended the rural schools and the Male and Female Academy at Providence, and then was engaged in teaching school for one term. He next turned his attention to farming, and at the same time studied medicine and was graduated from the University of Louisville March 13, 1893. Following his graduation Doctor Rice began the practice of his profession at Lisman, Kentucky, and remained there until 1908, when he moved to Providence, forming a partnership with Dr. J. T. Dixon, which continued for two years, and was then dissolved and Doctor Rice practiced alone until in July, 1920, when on account of ill health he was obliged to share his duties. He is a member of the Webster County Medical Society, the Kentucky State Medical Society and the Mississippi Valley Medical Society. He has made a specialty of coal mining companies' practice, and is local surgeon for the Louisville & Nashville and Illinois Central Railroads. In addition he has a wide outside practice. Fraternally he is a Knight of Pythias and an Odd Fellow. The Presbyterian Church holds his membership. Very active as a democrat, he has long been a leader in local affairs but would never accept office.

In 1888 Doctor Rice was married to Miss Nettie Baker, a daughter of I. N. Baker, of Webster County. Doctor and Mrs. Rice have two children, namely: Elizabeth Karrie, who is the wife of Lou S. Jefferson, of Morganfield, Kentucky; and T. G., who is engaged in the coal business at Princeton, Kentucky. He volunteered for service in April, 1917, immediately after being graduated from the University of Kentucky, and was sent to the Officers Training Camp at Fort Benjamin Harrison. He was commissioned a second lieutenant at Newport News, and stationed in Rhode Island and at other points. Going overseas, he reached France October 12, 1918, in the meanwhile having been promoted to the rank of first lieutenant, and was mustered out of the service and discharged in February, 1919, after which he returned home. Had his health permitted Doctor Rice would have gone into the service, but as it was he had to content himself with having his family represented by his brave young and only son. A man of high courage and public spirit, Doctor Rice has borne a leading part in the progress of Providence since locating in this city, and is recognized as one of its most dependable and worth-while citizens.

HENRY JANSEN is one of Covington's live and public spirited business men, and for thirty years has been a worker and student of his chosen line of business, hardware, and by his energy and faithfulness has achieved the responsibilities of general manager of the Jansen Hardware Company, one of the leading concerns of its kind along the Ohio River.

He was born at Covington April 4, 1872. His father, the late Gerhard Jansen, was for many years an esteemed resident of Covington, where he located in 1865, on coming to the United States. He was born in Hanover, Germany, in 1842, was reared and educated there, and learned the trade of blacksmith. After following his trade for a few years in Covington he became proprietor of a cafe, and continued in that line of business until his death in 1907. He was a democrat, a member of the Catholic Church and the Catholic Knights of America. Mr. Gerhard Jansen married Clara Grothouse. She was born in Westphalia, Germany, in 1851, and was a small child when brought by her parents to Covington, where she was reared and educated. She died at Covington in 1901. Of her children Henry is the oldest; Joseph owns and operates a garage at Covington; Bertha is the wife of F. J. E. Bramlage, secretary and treasurer of the Hatfield Coal Company of Covington; Mary is the wife of Al G. Zumbege, president of the Jansen Hardware Company; Clara is the wife of John Determan, a resident of Chicago, where he is foreman of the shipping department of the map and book publishing house of Rand, McNally & Company; while George, the youngest of the children, owned a cafe at Covington and died in that city in 1905.

Henry Jansen during his boyhood in Covington attended the parochial schools and spent the years 1888-89 in Hanover, Germany, where he finished the equivalent of a high school education. Soon after his return home he went to work in a minor capacity really as an apprentice in a hardware store, and accepted every opportunity to acquire a thorough knowledge of every detail of the business. In 1913 he became an official member of the Jansen Hardware Company, and as general manager keeps in close touch with every department of the large store at 110 Pike Street. This company does a business reaching into several states, and handles a large and complete stock of standard makes of agricultural implements and domestic hardware. The officers of the company are: Al G. Zumbeke, president; John L. Determan, vice president; F. J. E. Bramlage, secretary and treasurer; and Henry Jansen, general manager. These officials are all related by family and marriage ties.

Mr. Jansen is also treasurer of the Pike Street Building and Loan Association, and has interested himself in many projects for Covington's advancement and welfare, particularly through his membership in the Industrial Club. He is a member of the Catholic Church, a democratic voter, and is affiliated with Bishop Carroll Council No. 702, Knights of Columbus, and Covington Lodge No. 314 of the Elks. He has one of the substantial, comfortable homes of the city, at 611 West Seventh Street. During the World war he gave much of his time to patriotic causes, assisting in promoting the success of the various drives for the sale of Liberty Loans and other purposes.

At Covington in 1897 he married Miss Mary Bramlage, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Bramlage. Her mother lives at her country home near Covington in Kenton County. Her father, who died there, was secretary and treasurer of the John Brenner Brewing Company of Covington and in later years was a farmer. Mr. and Mrs. Jansen have two sons, Edward, born June 20, 1898, and Clarence, born December 19, 1903, a student in the Covington High School. Edward, who was educated in the parochial schools, graduated from St. Joseph's Business College of Cincinnati in 1913, and has since been active with the Jansen Hardware Company, being bookkeeper in the establishment.

JAMES W. MACDONALD. With a commercial experience covering a wide range of progressive duties from clerk in a country store to independent merchant, Mr. Macdonald is now head of a leading real estate and insurance agency at Covington and one of that city's enlightened and influential citizens.

The Macdonalds were an old family of Edinburg, Scotland, and on leaving there settled in Virginia. Mr. Macdonald's grandfather was a native of Virginia and an early settler in Fleming County, Kentucky, where he died. George W. Macdonald, father of the Covington business man, was born in Kentucky in February, 1840, grew up in the eastern counties of the state and in Indiana, and as a young man enlisted in the Union army, in the Sixteenth Kentucky Regiment of Infantry. He saw a long and active service of four years and one day, including his participation in the battles of Shiloh, Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge, the siege of Vicksburg, Sherman's March to the Sea and other engagements. He was once taken prisoner and for a brief time confined at Newport Barracks. He was married at Flemingsburg, Kentucky, where he kept a hotel, and in 1881 removed to Carlisle, Kentucky, where he continued in the hotel business and also as a contractor and builder. In 1902 he located at Shelbyville, and on retiring moved to Covington in 1905, and was a resident of that city at the time of his death on January 3, 1918. Though a Union soldier he was affiliated with the democratic party until Cleveland's second term, after which he was a republican. He was a very active member of the Baptist Church. George W. Macdonald's first wife was Clara Hoefflich, a native of Maysville, Kentucky, where she died. Her three children were: William, a broker in New York City; Paul R., in the insurance business at Chicago; and George C., a banker at Pittsburg, California. George W. Macdonald's second wife was Mary L. Powell, a native of Flemingsburg and now living at Covington. Her only child is James W., but she also has an adopted daughter, Ida.

James W. Macdonald was born at Flemingsburg in Fleming County November 4, 1878, was three years old when his parents moved to Carlisle, and he attended the public schools there until the age of seventeen. While going to school and for six years afterward he clerked in a grocery store. For another six years he was a dry goods salesman at Carlisle, and then for two years was proprietor of a grocery store. Following that Mr. Macdonald embarked in business as a manufacturing confectioner, remaining at Carlisle until 1902, and was then at Shelbyville until 1905. In 1905 he moved to Cincinnati, and was connected with the Cincinnati branch of Huylers, the celebrated New York candy manufacturer. In 1909, leaving the confectionery business, Mr. Macdonald became a local field agent for the Prudential Insurance Company, and subsequently was promoted to assistant superintendent. He resigned that post in August, 1920, to engage in the real estate and insurance business on his own account, and is now head of one of the leading agencies of that kind in Covington, his offices being on the third floor of the First National Bank Building.

Probably no one class of business men rendered more important and more nearly gratuitous service to the Government during the World war than insurance men. Mr. Macdonald assisted in promoting the success of every local drive in Kenton County, and besides other contributions he did a large amount of instruction work for drafted men. Ever since the war he has continued from patriotic motives to encourage ex-service men to maintain their Government insurance contract. Mr. Macdonald is a republican and a member of the Baptist Church.

He owns a modern home at 108 West Fourth Street. He married at Flemingsburg in June, 1898, Miss Orra Fisher, daughter of James A. and Martha (Fleming) Fisher. The latter is now deceased, and Mr. Fisher lives at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Macdonald. He is a veteran Union soldier. Mr. and Mrs. Macdonald have two children, Pauline R. and Harry P., the latter a student in the Junior High School. Pauline is the wife of Otto Wettlaufer, of 107 West Fourth Street, Covington. Mr. Wettlaufer is engaged with Mr. Macdonald, and is a member of the firm.

THOMAS TAYLOR MORRIS, cashier of the Union National Bank of Providence, has long been connected with the best interests of his community, and is a forceful figure in financial circles in Webster County. He was born on a farm near Dixon, Kentucky, September 23, 1864, a son of William S. and Caroline (Townsend) Morris, natives of North Carolina and Virginia, respectively. The parents were married in Webster County, Kentucky. In addition to being a minister of the Missionary Baptist Church William S. Morris was interested in farming, and lived to be sixty years of age. He and his wife had seven children, six of whom reached maturity and four are still living.

With the exception of six years, from the time he was four years old until he was ten, during which period his parents were residents of Illinois, Thomas Taylor Morris grew up in Webster County and attended the public schools and the Providence Male and Female Seminary. Like so many ambitious young men, he engaged in teaching school for a few years, until he had saved some money. He then invested it in a mercantile establishment, and conducted it until 1905, when he accepted a position in the Citizens Bank of Providence and held it for eight and one-half years, rising to be its cashier. For the subsequent fourteen months he was cashier of the the Kentucky Bank and Trust Company of Madisonville, resigning to become cashier of the Union National Bank at the time of its reorganization. This bank was organized in 1910, with A. E. Orr as president, and was reorganized in April, 1915, with G. W. Wynn as president; S. D. Palmer as vice president; and T. T. Morris as cashier. In September, 1915, Mr. Wynn died, and S. D. Palmer succeeded him as president, and F. A. Casner became vice president, Mr. Morris continuing as cashier. The bank has a capital of $25,000 and surplus and undivided profits of $22,000, and the business of the institution has been expanded in a steady and healthy manner. A republican in politics, Mr. Morris was elected on his party ticket mayor of Providence and was re-elected to succeed himself, his record while in office being of the most satisfactory character. He is a Master Mason, and zealous in his fraternity.

In 1899 Mr. Morris was married to Miss Frances Montgomery, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Montgomery, old and prominent people of Providence. Mr. and Mrs. Morris have four children, namely: John M., Mary Louise, Thomas Hays and James Carroll, of whom the eldest is at Harrisburg, Illinois, and the others in school at Providence.

The responsibilities resting upon anyone holding the position occupied by Mr. Morris are heavy, and more than average sagacity and knowledge of human nature are requisite qualifications. Mr. Morris is an experienced banker and good business man, and his advice is oftentimes sought and taken by his fellow citizens, who know that they can depend upon his good judgment. For years he has made a study of economic conditions, and rendered services because of the knowledge thus acquired which rank him among the most consequential financiers of his section, men whose experience and dependability are the bed-rock of the stability of all business in their locality.

LEWIS EDWARD PEARCE is a worthy representative of several prominent old families of Kentucky, members of which have figured in the affairs of the state for several generations, ever lending aid in furthering such movements as had for their object the general upbuilding of their respective communities. The life of Lewis Edward Pearce has been replete with honor and duty well performed, and he enjoys a splendid reputation as a man of courage, ability, stability of character and public spirit, whom to know is to honor and esteem.

Lewis Edward Pearce, was born at Maysville, Mason County, Kentucky, on October 3, 1840, and is the son of Charles B. and Maria (Shultz) Pearce. Both of these parents were natives of the Blue Grass State, and both are now deceased. The father, who was born in Fleming County, died in 1907, at the age of eighty-two years, and the mother passed away in 1902, at the age of seventy years. They were the parents of five children, all of whom grew to maturity, married and reared children. But two members of the family are now living, Lewis E., and his brother, Christian S. Pearce, who is now assistant treasurer of the United States and lives in Washington, District of Columbia. He was first appointed by President Cleveland to the position of chief paymaster of the treasury department, holding that position until 1914, when he was appointed to his present position. Charles B. Pearce was engaged in the wholesale dry goods business for a number of years at Maysville, Kentucky, and became one of the organizers of the banking house of Pearce & Wallingford, which was later reorganized as the State National Bank, of which he was principal stockholder and president up to the time of his death. Politically he was a staunch supporter of the democratic party.

On the maternal side Mr. Pearce is descended from sterling old stock, his maternal grandmother having been a daughter of Gen. Henry Lee, who came to Kentucky about 1780. She became the wife of Christian Shultz, who came to Kentucky in 1800. He was a soldier in the War of 1812 and was granted a medal for personal valor. He was a successful business man and retired in 1849, while at his death he gave his children $50,000. Mr. Pearce's paternal grandfather, William Pearce, also was an early settler of Kentucky, coming to this state in 1800.

Lewis E. Pearce secured his educational training in the private school of W. W. Richeson, a school which at that time was among the best of its kind, having been attended by Ulysses S. Grant and Henry Wadsworth. In 1865, in company with another Kentucky boy, he went to Exeter, New Hampshire, with the intention of entering Phillips Exeter Academy, but on entering the school yard they saw a negro student. Although they had matriculated, they at once turned on their heels and returned home, as they could not think of attending school in the company of a black man. On his return home Mr. Pearce entered the county clerk's office in the capacity of deputy county clerk, which position he filled for a number of years. He then entered the State National Bank at Maysville, where under his father's guidance he learned the banking business. He became teller, holding the position for several years, and also acquired other business interests, engaging in the mercantile business, buying turnpike stock, and also securing an interest in a planing mill, of which he became superintendent. He was manager of the Maysville and Mount Sterling Turnpike. In 1878 Mr. Pearce moved to Chattanooga, Tennessee, and bought a manufacturing plant, in which he engaged in the manufacture of carriage material. In 1882 he removed this plant to Lexington, and remained engaged in that line of business until 1892, when he was appointed city auditor, which responsible position he held for a number of years. This was followed by his election to the office of county auditor of Fayette County, which office he has filled for about twenty years, to the entire satisfaction of the voters of the county. Thoroughly qualified by both training and experience for this position, he has demonstrated in no uncertain measure his ability, integrity and sound judgment.

Politically Mr. Pearce is an earnest supporter of the democratic party, while his religious faith is that of the Southern Presbyterian Church, he and his wife holding their membership in the First Presbyterian Church of Lexington. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, in which he has taken all the degrees of the York Rite, being past eminent commander of Maysville Commandery of Knights Templar. He is an earnest supporter of every legitimate movement for the material, civic or moral advancement of the community.

In 1869 Mr. Pearce was married to Hattie Keefer, whose death occurred in 1874, and to them was born a daughter, Mamie, who became the wife of Thomas Radcliffe, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and the mother of a son, David. For his second wife Mr. Pearce married, in 1904, Hannah Kissick, to which union have been born three sons, Lewis Edward, Jr., Charles B. and Isaac Lee. Such, in brief, has been the record of Mr. Pearce, than whom a more whole-souled or popular man it would be difficult to find in his section of the state, where he has long maintained his home and where he has labored not only for his own individual advancement but also for the improvement of the entire community whose interests he has ever had at heart.

JAMES CLEVE CANNADAY. The success which has attended the efforts of James Cleve Cannaday, one of the distinguished members of the bar of Webster

L. E. Peares

County and a prominent resident of Providence, is but the just reward of years of conscientious endeavor and the development of natural abilities along congenial lines. He was born on a farm in the vicinity of Providence February 25, 1884, a son of Joseph D. and Celia (Jennings) Cannaday, both of whom were born, reared and spent their entire lives in Webster County, where the father died in 1899, being at that time forty-seven years of age, and having spent his life as a farmer. His widow died two years later, in 1901. They had two daughters in addition to their son in their family.

The paternal great-grandparents of James Cleve Cannaday were James and Kate Cannaday, natives of Ireland, who came to the United States following their marriage and settled in North Carolina. The maternal grandparents were Redding and Elizabeth Jennings. James and Rebecca (Howard) Cannaday were born in North Carolina, where they were married, but later moved to Webster County, Kentucky, where they spent the remainder of their lives. The Howard family were of Irish descent, so Mr. Cannaday is largely of Irish extraction and inherits many of the brilliant characteristics of that people. The Jennings are of English descent.

Until the death of his mother James Cleve Cannaday was reared on a farm, but in 1901 came to Providence, which has since continued his place of residence. He received an academic education in the Male and Female Academy of Providence, and at the age of eighteen years began teaching school. After teaching several rural schools for three terms he was elected principal of the grammar schools at Clay, Kentucky, where he spent two years, and then for five years was principal of the grammar schools of Providence. In 1907 he was graduated in law from the Southern Normal School at Bowling Green, Kentucky, and was admitted to the bar that same year. Immediately thereafter he established himself in a general practice at Providence. A man of force of character and ability, his worth was soon recognized, and for the past eight years he has been city attorney of Providence, being elected to that office on the democratic ticket, and he was also the successful candidate of his party for that of member of the county Board of Examiners. Well known in Masonry, Mr. Cannaday is a Knight Templar and Shriner.

In 1912 he was united in marriage with Miss Ora H. James, the accomplished daughter of Mr. and Mrs. B. C. James of Webster County. Mr. and Mrs. Cannaday have one child, Grace Marie Cannaday.

Mr. Cannaday is a man who has always possessed that broader sense of civic responsibility, and has carried out the work of his offices in a thoroughly competent and vigorous manner and has achieved a surprising amount of results, for others have responded in a wonderful measure to his efforts. He has had vision, courage and initiative, and has been able to reach the understanding of the public directly and surely, so that he has been accorded the place in his community to which his talents entitle him.

MARTIN J. BROWN has been one of the influential younger members of the Covington bar for several years, has made himself secure in his profession, and also in the esteem paid to public spirited citizenship. He is son of the late Martin J. Brown, Sr., for many years one of the prominent lawyers of Northern Kentucky.

The grandfather was Frederick Brown, a native of Germany, who settled in Cincinnati in 1847. He was a blacksmith, a very skilled workman, thorough and industrious, and in 1869 located at Newport, Kentucky, where he lived until his death in 1883. He had little inclination for politics, voting as a democrat, and was a member of the Catholic Church. Frederick Brown married Margaret Miller, who was born in Baden, Germany, in 1819. They were married in the United States. She died near Newport in 1901. They were the parents of three children: Joseph, a painter and decorator who died at Newport in 1910, at the age of fifty-seven; Harriet, living at Fort Thomas, Kentucky, widow of George Kessen, who was a dairyman in Campbell County; and Martin J., Sr.

Martin J. Brown, Sr., was born at Warsaw, Ohio, May 30, 1860, and lived at Newport from 1869. He was educated in the Catholic schools of Delhi, Ohio, in St. Michael's College at Cincinnati, in St. Vincent College in Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania, and finally in St. Xavier College. He studied law in the office of A. T. Root, then city attorney of Newport, was admitted to the bar September 25, 1880, and in a few years had earned a high place in his profession at Newport, where he continued with an extensive general practice until his death in 1902. He served as county judge of Campbell County from 1897 until his death. He was a democrat, a Catholic and a member of the Young Men's Institute and the Campbell County Bar Association. Judge Brown married Hattie Kearney, who was born in 1861 and died at Newport in 1892. Of her five children Martin J. is the youngest. Hattie, the oldest, is the wife of Charles Sendelbach, a resident of Newport, Mr. Sendelbach being foreman in a large tailoring factory. Mary is the wife of George J. Kauffman, deputy county clerk of Campbell County, with home at Newport. Lillian is the wife of F. C. Hauser, Jr., a druggist at Covington. George J., who was assistant foreman in a tailoring house, died at Newport in December, 1918, at the age of thirty-six.

Martin J. Brown, Jr., was born at Newport in Campbell County March 23, 1890, and was two years old when his mother died and twelve at the death of his father. He attended the Immaculata Academy at Newport, St. Xavier College in Cincinnati, and his first choice of a profession was that of pharmacy. He is a graduate of the Cincinnati College of Pharmacy and was employed in this profession at Cincinnati and adjoining towns until 1910. Since that year his home has been at Covington, and while pursuing other work in the day he attended the Young Men's Christian Association night law school of Cincinnati, and received his degree in law in 1913. He was admitted to the bar that year and since then has been identified with a civil and criminal practice at Covington. His offices are in the Coppin Building. From 1917 until November, 1920, he was police court prosecutor and assistant city solicitor of the City of Covington. Mr. Brown was also actively associated with patriotic organizations during the World war and gave much of his time to the task of filling out questionnaires for drafted soldiers in the county.

He is a democrat in politics, a member of the Catholic Church, is affiliated with Bishop Carroll Council No. 702, Knights of Columbus, Covington Aerie No. 329, Fraternal Order of Eagles, and is a member of the Kenton County Bar Association.

Mr. Brown owns a comfortable modern home at 2040 Garrard Street. In 1908, at Covington, he married Miss Frances Garrison, daughter of Abram and Mary (Koors) Garrison, the latter still living at Covington. Her father was a cafe proprietor and died at Covington in 1901. The three children of Mr. and Mrs. Brown are: Martin C., born December 11, 1909; Charles, born February 27, 1911; and John, born July 7, 1917.

At the election in November Cox carried Kenton County by 5,700 votes, while Ernst received a majority of 1,300. This indicated a strong independent swing of 7,000 votes, practically a third of the entire vote cast in the county. Mr. Wilson was active in all the local war campaigns in Covington and Kenton County.

He is unmarried, is a member of the First Presbyterian Church, affiliated with Covington Lodge No. 109, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, Indra Consistory No. 2 of the Scottish Rite, Oleika Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Lexington, Covington Lodge No. 314, of the Elks, and a member of the Fort Mitchell Country Club.

From December, 1889, until 1892, he was in the internal revenue service, and from 1892 until 1896 was deputy sheriff of Pendleton County and then resumed his work with the Internal Revenue Department, continuing from 1896 until 1900.

SIMON KENTON HOLLAND. Dependability, trained knowledge, experience and well-balanced sympathy in times of bereavement are necessary qualifications for an undertaker, and these are possessed in marked degree by Simon Kenton Holland of Providence, who is engaged in an undertaking and furniture business. He was born in Marshall County, Kentucky, September 18, 1882, a son of Marion Harrison and Permelia (Heath) Holland, both of whom were born in Marshall County, Kentucky, where they are still residing. Marion H. Holland is the youngest and only survivor of the six sons born to John Holland and his wife, who was a member of the Hill family. John Holland was a very early settler of Marshall County, to which he came from North Carolina. During the war between the North and the South Marion H. Holland served in the Confederate army, and his brother James was killed while serving as a Confederate Soldier. Another brother, William, served in the Kentucky State Assembly. All his life Marion H. Holland has been interested in agricultural matters. He and his wife became the parents of six sons and two daughters, and the daughter Gania married Rev. T. W. B. Demaree, at one time a Methodist missionary to Japan. The children were all reared on the homestead where Mr. and Mrs. Holland are still living, and where in 1919 they celebrated their Golden Anniversary. The family are all Methodists.

Simon Kenton Holland attended the schools of his native county, and then took a business course at Bowling Green. For the subsequent two years he was in the employ of the W. R. Belknap Hardware Company of Louisville, following which he was a clerk in a retail hardware concern at Paducah for two and one-half years. Having learned the details of business pretty thoroughly, he decided to branch out for himself, and borrowed $1,000 and engaged in a hardware and furniture business at La Center, Kentucky, where he remained from 1910 to 1913, inclusive, he then sold his interests to his brother, and, buying a stock of goods, in the spring of 1915 established himself at Providence in an undertaking and furniture business, and has prospered in it. Mr. Holland maintains a branch establishment at Clay. He is a licensed embalmer, and thoroughly understands his business and knows how to conduct the last rites in a becoming and dignified manner, which reflects credit upon his ability and the affection of the bereaved.

In 1910 Mr. Holland was united in marriage with Miss May Miller, and they have three children, James Grover, Vienna and Hattie May. The Methodist Episcopal Church holds his membership. A Mason, he has attained to the Commandery and Shrine in that order, and he also belongs to the Elks.

During the late war Mr. Holland's brother, Harold Holland, enlisted, was made a captain at the age of twenty-three years, and served overseas as captain of an ammunition train. Not only was his command one of the most dangerous branches of the service, but he was one of the youngest to attain to that rank.

CAPT. WILLIAM HARRISON MAY has spent practically his entire life within the borders of Fayette County, Kentucky, and his persistent and commendable efforts have benefited alike himself and the community, for he has always had deeply at heart the well being and improvement of the county, using his influence whenever possible for the promotion of enterprises calculated to be of lasting benefit to his fellow men and taking a leading part in all movements for the advancement of the community along social, intellectual and moral lines. He is the scion of an excellent old pioneer family, in fact, Captain May himself may be said to have come down to us from the pioneer period, having noted the great changes that have taken place here during the past three-quarters of a century and seen the wilderness give way to as fine farmsteads as the state can boast.

William Harrison May was born in Lexington, Kentucky, on the 23d day of August, 1842, and is the son of William C. and Jane (Abbott) May. Both of his parents were natives of Virginia, and both are deceased, his father dying in 1870, when sixty years of age, and the mother's death occurring in 1855. William H. is the ninth in order of birth of their eleven children and is the only survivor. His parents were married in their native state and came to Lexington in 1833. The father was a farmer and overseer of plantations up to 1848, when he engaged in the grocery business in Lexington, in which he continued up to the time of his death. He erected the brick store building at the corner of South Broadway and Maxwell streets in 1850, in which he conducted business and where Capt. William H. May's sons are now engaged. During a part of the time that he was running the grocery business he also served as a member of the police department. His religious faith was that of the Baptist Church, while in politics he was first a whig and later a democrat.

William H. May received his educational training in the public schools of Lexington, after which he became connected with the grocery business, which he conducted in connection with his father until 1905, when his son, Charles William, became associated with him. In 1908 the Captain finally retired altogether from the grocery business. In 1890 Captain May became interested in the business of breeding, raising and training racing horses, and some of the thoroughbreds produced by him became noted as consistent winners on the American turf. In this work his son John W. was associated with him. Among the sires owned by Captain May was "King Cole," by "Illused," "Spokane," by "Hiderali," dam "Interpose," owned by Noah Armstrong. When a three-year-old "Spokane" won the Kentucky Derby and the Clark Stakes at Churchill Downs, Kentucky, and the American Derby at Washington Park, Chicago, he being the only three-year-old that ever won all three of these great races; "Imported Likely," bred in England, and other noted sires. He has also owned several dams of note, among them "Lilly B.," by "Bulwark," dam "Pattie." She became the mother of thirteen stud colts, all of whom, except one, became winners, the one exception dying when two years old. Among the two-year-olds was "Pulsu," which Captain May sold to Madden & Thompson with his entries for $13,000.00, he being entered in the Great Trial Stake at Sheepshead Bay, New York. His sale was with the understanding that if he won that race the Captain was to receive an additional $3,000; the horse won the stake, valued at $25,000, and the Captain received his $3,000. Captain May has for many years closely followed the running races of the country and raced his stable of horses at Lexington, Kentucky, Churchill Downs, Latonia, Sheepshead Bay, New York, Morris Park, New York, Gravesend, New York, Saratoga Springs, New York, New Orleans, Louisiana, Washington Park, Chicago, Garfield Park, Chicago, Hawthorne Park, Chicago, and at Windsor, Toronto, Fort Erie and Montreal, Canada. During this period he won many stakes and handicaps, and won the last Derby at Washington Park, Chicago, in 1904, with "Highball," by "Ben Strome," dam "Strychnia." His stable was known as the William H. May & Son Stable, and it enjoyed a high reputation wherever its horses were entered. Several years ago the Captain retired from the horse racing game, though he has never relinquished his interest in racing. He has attended every race meeting at Churchill Downs since 1875, and saw "Aristides" win the first Derby, as well as all the winners since that historic meeting. His son John W. is now the owner of a fine stable of thoroughbreds and has made his entries for 1920 in many of the big stakes in Kentucky and the East. He entered in the Kentucky Derby his grand three-year-old, "Vice Chairman."

Captain May has a splendid record of arduous and faithful service during the Civil war. At the age of nineteen years he became a member of a military company known as the Lexington Rifles, under the command of Capt. (afterward General) John H. Morgan. Later, with Morgan, he enlisted under Col. N. B. Forrest, being the first man to enlist in this company. They proceeded to Meade County, Kentucky, and raised Company A, and from there went to Memphis, Tennessee, where they were joined by several other companies, three from Alabama, four from Tennessee and one from Texas. These companies comprise what became known as Forrest's old regiment, which had such an important part in many of the most important campaigns of that war. Among the battles in which they participated were Fort Donelson, Missionary Ridge, Lookout Mountain, Resaca, under Colonel Woodard, and then, retreating, they fought General Sherman all the way to Savannah and later into Virginia. From there they escorted Jefferson Davis and Gen. J. C. Breckinridge to Washington, Georgia, after having participated in all the campaigns, battles and skirmishes in which his command had a part. After this last duty was performed he surrendered with his comrades and was discharged on May 11, 1865, after which he returned to his home in Lexington.

On October 3, 1865, Captain May went to Alabama and was married to Victoria Cunningham, who was born and reared in that state. To their union were born four children, of whom three are living, namely: Charles W., who married Bessie Mahoney, and they have a son, William H.; Lessie, who is the widow of C. S. Milward and the mother of two children, Frances Victoria and Charles S.; and John W., who married Anna Luzader, of Covington, Kentucky, and they have one child, J. W., Jr.

Politically Captain May has been a life-long supporter of the democratic party, and has always taken a deep interest in public affairs. In 1890 he was elected a member of the Kentucky State Legislature and was re-elected, serving two terms. Later he was appointed police commissioner of the City of Lexington by the late Mayor H. T. Dincan. Fraternally he is a member of Lexington Lodge No. 89, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, while his religious affiliation is with the Baptist Church. Invulnerable integrity and high purpose have characterized his life, and he has made an indelible impress on the annals of the community honored by his long residence. His strength has been as the number of his days, and not only has he accomplished much in connection with the practical affairs of life, but his nature, strong and vigorous, has found denotement in kindly tolerance and human sympathy, generous deeds and worthy service.

GEORGE OSBURN, M. D. A large share of the burdens of the medical profession in the Sebree community of Webster County has been borne for many years by a Dr. Osburn, formerly by the late Dr. George Osburn and in more recent years by his son Dr. Roy Osburn. Both have been physicians of the highest attainments and the community has been singularly fortunate in the possession of such representatives of the medical profession.

The late Dr. George Osburn was born on a farm in Webster County, August 16, 1849, and died at Sebree February 11, 1905. His father was James Worth Osburn and his mother was a member of the King family. Dr. Osburn grew up on the farm, had a public school education, and attended his first medical lecture at the University of Louisville. Later he graduated from the Medical College at Cincinnati and for four years practiced at Sorgho in Daviess County. He then gave up his professional labors to devote his personal energies to his farming interests in Webster County. Later, after post-graduate work in medicine, he established his home at Sebree and continued in active practice there from 1898 until the time of his death. He was a democrat, and a member of the Masonic and Odd Fellows Orders. Dr. George Osburn married Miss Sarah Frances Snipes. She died after becoming the mother of three children, Roy, Ruby and L. Smith Osburn.

Dr. Roy Osburn was born on his father's farm in Webster County August 2, 1879, lived on the farm to the age of nine and after that at Sebree. His early advantages were those of the common schools, and he subsequently attended Vanderbilt and Cornell Universities, and studied medicine at Louisville. He graduated from the University of Louisville Medical School in 1910, and for the past ten years has steadily practiced at Sebree. He is a member of the County and State Medical Associations, is a Mason, a Methodist and a democrat. Dr. Osburn also owns farm interests. He married Miss Clida Mae Price, of Webster County, and they are the parents of three children, George P., Mary Catherine and Frances Louise.

GEORGE THOMAS CARNAL is the man responsible for giving the community of Sebree in Webster County a more than local reputation as a center of high class grain milling products. He is a practical miller and recently constructed what is said to be the second best flour mill in the state.

Mr. Carnal, whose life has been one of hard work and steady application to every successive undertaking, was born on a farm in Webster County March 27, 1870, son of Starling Alexander and Rachael (Presley) Carnal. His parents were both born in Webster County, spent their lives on a farm, and the father died at the age seventy-two, while the mother is still living, at the age of sixty-eight. They have a large family of five daughters and four sons, all of whom reached maturity and married and went to homes of their own before there was a single death in the circle.

George Thomas Carnal acquired a common school education, and at the age of twenty-one began his independent career as a farmer. Hard and intelligent work has been the keynote of his success. He continued farming until 1915, when he bought a small flour mill at Sebree. He subsequently sold this property and in August, 1919, began the erection of the present brick mill which has been in operation since February, 1920. It is a four story mill, thoroughly modern in all its equipment and processes, and has a capacity of seventy-five barrels of high class flour daily. He also does a large business in grinding meal and feed products.

At the age of twenty-four Mr. Carnal married Velma V. Cavanah of Webster County, and she has been a splendid home-maker and associated with him in all his struggles and prosperity. They have one living child, May, wife of William Buchanan. Their only son, Clarence, died in April, 1920, at the age of twenty. Mr. Carnal is a democrat, a member of the Baptist Church and is affiliated with the Woodmen of the World.

BENJAMIN F. PUGH. The active career of Benjamin F. Pugh has been almost entirely identified since his early manhood with the public utility corporation of Covington known as the Union Light, Heat and Power Company. He served the business in various capacities, beginning in the ranks, and is now assistant secretary of that corporation.

He is a member of one of the older families of northern Kentucky. His great-grandfather was born in this state, of ancestors who came from Wales in Colonial times. Mr. Pugh's grandfather was John B. Pugh, who was born at Covington in Kenton County in 1823, and lived all his life at Covington, and his business as a brick contractor resulted in the contribution of many substantial residences and other buildings to Covington during his active lifetime. He died at Covington in 1896. He espoused the cause of the republican party when it was organized. John B. Pugh married Catherine Everett, who was born in Kenton County in 1832, and died at Fort Mitchell in 1914.

Joseph W. Pugh, father of Benjamin F., was born in Kenton County, January 7, 1855, and for many years was prominent in public affairs and in democratic politics. He served as a member of the Democratic State Central Committee twelve years, and enjoyed the confidence and esteem of many of the leaders in Kentucky affairs. He was a very close friend of Governor Goebel. He served as county assessor of Kenton County thirteen years, and for twelve years was chief of police of Covington. Following that he was a county tax commissioner for two years. He had lived in Covington from December 3, 1895, and he died at Cincinnati October 1, 1919. On that day he had attended one of the games at Cincinnati during the World series, and he died of apoplexy in his automobile while driving home. He was a member of the Industrial Club of Covington and Newport Lodge of Elks. Joseph W. Pugh married Cynthia Marshall, who was born in Kenton County February 20, 1855, and died at Covington September 8, 1915. She became the mother of five children, Benjamin F. being the oldest; Mellie Florence is the wife of Frank E. Burnett, an attorney at law living at Norwood, Ohio; Frank M. is claim adjuster for the Big Four Railroad Company and lives at Indianapolis; Joseph E. is a railroad clerk for the Big Four Company and is living at Norwood, Ohio; and Clifford W. is the present county tax commissioner at Covington.

Benjamin F. Pugh was born in Kenton County August 15, 1880, and was well educated, attending the grammar and high schools at Covington, spent one year in Georgetown College of Kentucky, and is a graduate of Nelson's Business College at Cincinnati with the class of 1898. After two years of varied employment he entered the service of the Suburban Electric Company, now the Union Light, Heat & Power Company of Covington. He started as a clerk in the offices, and twenty years of continuous service have brought him a broad and comprehensive knowledge of the corporation's business. He was promoted to assistant secretary January 1, 1920. The offices of the company are in the South Covington and Cincinnati Railway building at Third Street and Court Avenue.

Mr. Pugh is also a director in the Home Building & Loan Association. He is a democrat in politics. His home is at 353 Berry Avenue, Bellevue, Kentucky, and he also has an interest in his father's valuable estate, comprising residential property and eighteen acres of ground at Fort Mitchell. During the World war period Mr. Pugh gave much of his time to the patriotic organizations in Campbell County, serving as chairman of the Bellevue Council of Defense in that county and giving liberally of his time and means to the success of the campaign for raising of funds.

At Bellevue, August 8, 1908, Mr. Pugh married Miss Bertha Genoway, daughter of P. J. and Amelia (Kreis) Genoway. Her father, who died at Bellevue, was a clothing merchant. Mrs. Genoway lives with her daughter, Mrs. Pugh, who was reared and educated in Kentucky and before her marriage was a teacher in the public schools at Bellevue. Mr. and Mrs. Pugh have two children Janet, born May 14, 1913, and Robert, born January 31, 1915.

CLIFFORD WARREN PUGH, county tax commissioner of Kenton County, is a son of the late Joseph W. Pugh, and a brother of Ben F. Pugh of Covington.

He was born in Kenton County May 4, 1892, and is undoubtedly one of the county's most popular younger citizens. He was educated in rural schools, spent one year in high school at Covington, and for three years was a student of electrical engineering in the Ohio Mechanics Institute at Cincinnati.

Mr. Pugh was for six years in the employ of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company at Cincinnati, and for another year was in the auditor's office of the Illinois Central Railroad Company. Through several seasons he was clerk of race tracks in New Orleans and Cuba, but in October, 1919, returned to Covington and was appointed county tax commissioner for the unexpired term of his father. In November, 1920, Mr. Pugh was elected tax commissioner for the remaining year of the unexpired term. That election was in the nature of a personal triumph, since he received a majority of 6,000 votes, the largest majority ever given a candidate for this office in Kenton County.

Mr. Pugh is unmarried, is a democrat in political affiliation, and a member of the Baptist Church. He owns a beautiful country home five miles south of Covington on the Dixie Highway. This home is surrounded by eighteen acres of ground.

Mr. Pugh in April, 1918, enlisted in the World war, was first assigned to duty with the Motor Transport Corps at Indianapolis, later was chosen to enter the Louisville Officers Training Corps, and was given a commission as second lieutenant in Field Artillery. He was mustered out November 25, 1918.

THOMAS F. DONNELLY is the present mayor of Covington, a native and lifelong resident of the city, and brought to his present office a knowledge of city needs and individual qualifications and experiences that have already made his administration the opening of a new chapter in municipal progress.

Mayor Donnelly was born in Covington October 27, 1870. His father, Lawrence Donnelly, was a native of County Cavan, Ireland, and in early youth located at Covington, where he lived the rest of his life. He served in the Civil war and supported his family by work in different lines. He died at Covington, Kentucky, in 1876. He was a democrat and a Catholic. By his first marriage there is living one son, Lawrence, who gave many years to a business career and is now living retired with other members of the family at 1505 Holman Street. At Covington Lawrence Donnelly married Mrs. Mary (Tierney) Colleron. She was born in County Cavan, Ireland, in 1831 and died at Covington in 1918, having come to Covington with her parents at the age of fourteen and completed her education there. By her marriage to Lawrence Donnelly she had two sons, Thomas F. and Phillip L., the latter secretary to the mayor. Mrs. Donnelly by her marriage to Mr. Colleron had two daughters: Margaret, living with her half-brothers, widow of Abner Pierce, a stove moulder by trade; and Catherine, who died at Covington in 1910, wife of John Hoffman, a coal operator of Covington.

Thomas F. Donnelly was educated in the parochial and public schools of Covington. After his father's death he worked in a glass factory and a tobacco factory, and at the age of fourteen became an apprentice to the book-binding establishment of W. B. Carpenter & Company in Cincinnati. Altogether he was in the service of that firm eighteen years and three months. Beginning in 1902 he was a Pullman car conductor, and was in that service thirteen years, chiefly with the Queen and Crescent Railroad.

Mr. Donnelly was elected a city commissioner of Covington in 1915 and re-elected to that office in 1917. During his second term he was also vice mayor. In November, 1919, he was chosen mayor, and began his four year term of office in January, 1920. Besides instituting a vigorous administration of the affairs in all departments Mayor Donnelly has been especially interested in the long cherished project of a new Union Depot, work on which has now progressed to a point where its completion is promised in 1922.

While Mayor Donnelly has at times worked for the election of qualified men in other parties, he has been essentially a life long democrat. He is a member of the Roman Catholic Church and the Holy Name Society, is a fourth degree knight in Bishop Carroll Council, No. 702, Knights of Columbus; a member of Covington Aerie, No. 329, Fraternal Order of Eagles, Old Kentucky Lodge, No. 1359, of the Moose, Court Pride, No. 1, Foresters of America, Ancient Order of Hibernians, St. Bernard's Society, and the Industrial Club of Covington.

He was one of the founders and for five years a member of the Board of Trustees of St. Mary's Cemetery. During the war he was prominent in patriotic activities in Kenton County, serving as chairman or colonel of the Council of Defense, and as chairman for the Fifth Ward in the Red Cross campaign. Mayor Donnelly has no outside business interests, having carried out his pledge to the people that if he was elected mayor he would give all his time and energies to his official duties.

While this record gives the outline of facts in Mayor Donnelly's career, it is appropriate to supplement the record with quotations from an article written by a Covington man born in the city about the same time, growing up with young Donnelly, and a constant admirer of his good qualities. This old boyhood friend is Dolph Berli, now assistant director of markets of Detroit, who on the occasion of Mr. Donnelly's election as mayor wrote a story for a Covington paper from which the following sentences are taken: "And so Tom Donnelly has been elected Mayor of Covington. This is truly a fitting reward for a life spent in trying to help his fellow men in the city which gave him birth.

"Tom Donnelly's home was near Nineteenth and Greenup streets and the writer's was at Sixteenth and Madison. Beginning in the humblest walks, Tom Donnelly saw the hardships of a widowed mother and early in life worked at Hemingway's glass works at the foot of Madison Street in order to assist the mother in keeping the wolf from the door. As he grew older he entered the W. B. Carpenter & Company printing plant in Cincinnati as apprentice bookbinder. There is where he learned his trade and there also is where he got his first induction into politics. Ed Ranshaw, who was then connected with the Carpenter concern, ran for member of the School Board. Tom was delegated to distribute the literature Ranshaw had printed in support of his own campaign. He invited me to help him, and until the early hours one morning Tom and I plodded over west end streets, dropping the circulars on doorsteps. Ranshaw proved to be one of the few republicans to be elected. Covington was a democratic stronghold in those days and republicans were discredited as a rule.

"I believe that the work which Tom Donnelly performed for his foreman, Ed Ranshaw, in his early youth led him to aspire to a School Board position. Anyway, he ran for the office some years later, and was elected. His next advancement was to become Police Commissioner, and while serving in that capacity he took his first decided stand for greater purity in municipal politics. Because Tom Donnelly was and is an idealist, he believes in the finer things of life, although politics does not always allow a man to satisfy his ideals.

"His later life in the public life is known to most Covingtonians. I don't know much about his record as commissioner, but it must have been good or the people would not have returned him with the greater honor of mayor. And I believe that he has not reached the pinnacle of his successful public career.

"Tom Donnelly and his brother Phil devoted their lives to looking after their aged mother. They did not enter wedlock because their mother needed their care. And when she passed away to her well earned reward a few months ago she left her blessing upon her two faithful sons. What greater or more worthy sacrifice could be made?"

JAMES H. WHITSON, M. D. The name Whitson has a special significance in a history of medicine in Kentucky, since members of three successive generations have practiced the profession. Dr. J. H. Whitson, a man of recognized attainments as a physician and surgeon at Slaughters, is a grandson of Dr. Harmon Hyland Whitson, who has been retired from his profession many years but is still living at Slaughters.

Harmon Hyland Whitson was born in Wilson County, Tennessee, July 8, 1834. At the age of seventeen he moved to Logan County, Kentucky, taught school several years, graduated in medicine at Vanderbilt University in 1856, and did the work of a pioneer country physician for upwards of half a century before he retired. He located in Slaughters many years ago. His wife was Annie Eliza Moore, who is now deceased. Their three children were: David William; James, who died in infancy; and Robert H., a merchant at Slaughters. Dr. H. H. Whitson is a Baptist, a democrat, and was formerly a member of the Masonic Order.

His son David William Whitson also took up the profession of medicine. He was born in Hopkins County, Kentucky, January 23, 1859, and died at Slaughters February 23, 1912. He was a graduate of the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville, practising a year at White Plains and two years at Hanson before locating at Slaughters in 1895, and was busied with his professional duties there the rest of his life. He was a member of the Missionary Baptist Church. His first wife was Anna Lee Parker, who was born near Providence, Kentucky. Her only child is James Harmon Whitson. Dr. David William Whitson married for his second wife Cassie J. Smith, who was the mother of a daughter, Annie Smith Whitson.

James Harmon Whitson was born in Slaughters May 24, 1884, and completed his medical course in the Kentucky School of Medicine July 12, 1905. For fifteen years his professional and other interests have been identified with Slaughters. During the World war he volunteered his services in the Medical Corps, was commissioned a first lieutenant in October, 1918, and for eighty-eight days was stationed at Camp Greene, North Carolina, until he received his honorable discharge. Dr. Whitson is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner, a member of the Elks, and is a democrat. In 1912 he married Minnie E. Cosby, of Slaughters.

SHELBY T. HARBISON. The true measure of individual success is determined by what one has accomplished, and, as taken in contradistinction to the old adage that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country, there is particular interest attached to the review of Shelby T. Harbison, since he is a native son of Kentucky, where his entire life has been passed, and he has so directed his ability and efforts as to gain recognition as one of the worthy citizens of this state, and he is therefore eminently entitled to representation in a work of the character of the one in hand.

Shelby T. Harbison was born in Shelby County, Kentucky, on October 25, 1857, and is the son of William Crawford and Sarah Pendleton (Caldwell) Harbison. These parents were both natives also of Shelby County, and both are deceased, the father dying in 1873, at the age of fifty-six years, and the mother in 1900, aged sixty-one years. They were the parents of five children, three of whom are living, namely, Shelby T., Howard and Alvan L. William Crawford Harbison attended the public schools of Shelby County and practically his entire life was devoted to the pursuits of the farm, in connection with which he gave some attention to the breeding and raising of pure-blooded Shorthorn cattle. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church and in politics was a democrat.

Shelby T. Harbison attended the public schools of his home district until sixteen years of age, when, in association with his brother Benjamin Crawford he took charge of his father's farm, which he conducted for nine years. He then engaged in the wholesale and retail agricultural implement business at Shelbyville, Kentucky, which he carried on for about four years. In 1886 Mr. Harbison located in Lexington and engaged in the livestock business, giving his principal attention to blooded horses, which he shipped to New York City, Atlanta, Georgia and Richmond, Virginia, and also exported many fine animals to Belgium. At that time he was operating under the firm name of Harbison, Jewell & Patterson, dealers in horses and mules. During the Spanish-American war he sold many horses to the United States Government, and during the recent World war he sold horses to France, England, Italy and the United States. In 1900 the firm bought from an English syndicate what was known as the Lexington Tattersalls. Two years later they opened a branch business at Atlanta, Georgia, at the Miller Union Stock Yards, where their sales average from 5,000 to 15,000 head of horses and mules annually. In 1905 they opened a branch at Cincinnati, known as the Cincinnati Horse and Mule Exchange, selling from 3,000 to 5,000 animals each year. The partnership was maintained up to August 1, 1914, when it was dissolved, but after the breaking out of the great European war they reorganized again for the handling of war contracts only, the relation being continued until March, 1918, since which time Mr. Harbison has been alone in business as the Lexington Tattersalls. In February, 1919, the latter establishment was sold to the Tattersalls Tobacco and Warehouse Company, of which he is president. Mr. Harbison is still interested in the horse business, operating under the name of the Harbison Tattersalls. During the past thirty-four years he has developed thousands of fine horses for saddle and harness use, and has long been recognized as one of the most reliable and competent men in the business, enjoying an excellent reputation throughout the country. Mr. Harbison organized in 1904 The Kentucky Sales Company, a corporation for the sale of blooded horses and the company, of which he is president, has enjoyed a liberal patronage from the breeders of thoroughbreds and trotting horses. Some of the most important sales in America have been conducted under the company's management.

Politically Mr. Harbison is a democrat, and served for two years as a member of the Lexington School Board. He has served as president of the Agricultural and Mechanical Fair at Lexington, and for three years has served as president of the Lexington Elks Fair. He is a member of the Christian Church and stands always for the best interests of the community along all lines, giving his earnest support to those movements which promise to advance the public welfare.

On May 17, 1881, Mr. Harbison was married to Cecelia McClarty, a daughter of Col. Clinton McClarty and his wife, Lucinda Elliott. Five children are the result of this union, Lucinda Caldwell, the wife of Buford Allen Graves; Katherine Buckner, who died in infancy; Clinton McClarty, who married Dorothea Mann, the daughter of Bishop Cameron Mann; Shelby T., Jr.; and Anna Howard, who married Frank Copeland Page, a son of Walter Hines Page. Mr. Harbison's career has been characterized by hard and conscientious work, and he owes his rise in the business world to no fortunate circumstances, it being simply the reward of mental qualifications of a high order to the affairs of business that have enabled him to grasp the opportunities that presented themselves. He is a man of genial disposition and generous impulses, and because of his success and his high personal character he enjoys to a marked degree the confidence and esteem of all who have come into contact with him in either a business or social way.

EDWARD FINCH OGDEN is a member of one of the old and honored families of Webster County, and for over two decades has been proprietor of the flouring mills at Slaughters. He is one of the leading citizens of that community, and the energetic prosecution of his private business affairs has always been accompanied by a high degree of public spirit.

Mr. Ogden was born on a farm in Webster County June 6, 1868. His great-grandfather, Rev. John W. Ogden, was a Presbyterian minister who did some important pioneer work for his church in the middle west. The grandfather of the miller at Slaughters was Major Williams Hines Ogden, a native of Louisiana, who on coming to Kentucky engaged in the tobacco business for a time at Madisonville, and later moved to a farm in Webster County. Besides farming he was a contractor and builder. He died at Slaughters at the age of fifty-two. His wife was Lucy Finch.

The parents of Edward Finch Ogden were Edward

Finch and Mildred (Jones) Ogden. The former was a native of Tennessee, born near Nashville, and was a boy when his parents moved to Kentucky. He was a farmer and merchant and also died at the age of fifty-two. His wife was born in Hopkins County, Kentucky, and her father, Solomon Walker Jones, came from North Carolina. The Jones family migrated west in a wagon and were pioneers in Hopkins County. Solomon W. Jones was also a local Methodist minister.

Edward Finch Ogden was one of seven children, grew up on a farm, and after acquiring a high school education was a teacher for four terms. The seven years following he devoted assiduously to his business as a farmer, and still has important farming interests. Just twenty-one years ago he erected a modern flouring mill at Slaughters.

Mr. Ogden is a democrat in politics, is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner, and a member of the Missionary Baptist Church. He married in 1892 Miss Augusta Nelson, who at her death was survived by three children. In 1910 Mr. Ogden married Miss Birdie Toombs.

PRYOR C. TARVIN is manager of the news department of the Kentucky Times-Star at Covington. The greater part of his experience since he left high school has been with the publishing and newspaper business in Cincinnati and Covington, and he has had an increasingly responsible part in handling the news office of the Kentucky Times-Star for the past seven years. The Kentucky Times-Star is a Kentucky edition of the Cincinnati Times-Star, one of the oldest journals of the Ohio Valley, established in 1836. The main offices are at Sixth and Walnut streets in Cincinnati, while the Covington office is at Fifth street and Madison avenue. This is the leading afternoon paper of Kentucky and is republican in politics.

Mr. Tarvin was born at Covington December 20, 1875. His grandfather was a native of Kentucky and an early settler in Covington, where he died. His father, William Henry Tarvin, was born at Covington in 1840, was reared, educated and married in his native city, and for a period of thirty years was one of the leading merchants in the queensware business. He died at Covington in 1912. At one time he was a member of the Covington City Council. He was a democrat and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. William H. Tarvin married Eliza Pryor, who was born at Carrollton, Kentucky, in 1847 and died at Covington in 1910. Her oldest child was the late Judge James P. Tarvin, distinguished as a lawyer and political speaker, who for six years was a judge of the Circuit Court of Kenton County, but had a national reputation as a political leader and speaker. He was an intimate friend of William J. Bryan and was speaker in the various Bryan campaigns, touring the country with the Nebraska Commoner. Judge Tarvin died while visiting in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1908. The second child of the family was Jennie, who died at Hamilton, Ohio, in 1894, the wife of Samuel P. Tarvin, of the same family name but not related. Samuel P. Tarvin is a resident of Cincinnati, a manufacturer of medicines. Samuel Pryor Tarvin, the third of the children, was a civil engineer and was with the engineering staff of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company when he died in Harrison, Arkansas, in 1904. Pryor C. Tarvin is the fourth in age, and the youngest is Albert Henry Tarvin, a reporter for the Louisville Herald.

Pryor C. Tarvin made the best of his advantages in the grammar and high schools of Kentucky until he was seventeen years of age, and his first experience in the publishing business was as assistant proof reader for the Methodist Book Concern of Cincinnati, in whose employ he remained for six years. For four years he was general utility clerk in the Covington postoffice, and after that was associated with the publication of several weekly newspapers in Kenton County. Beginning in 1908 he was for six years a city reporter in Cincinnati for the Commercial Tribune. Then, in 1914, he became local news representative at Covington for the Kentucky Times-Star, and since then has been given full charge of the news department at Covington.

Mr. Tarvin is a member and secretary of the Board of Civil Service Examiners, is a democrat, was president of the Northern Kentucky Press Club in 1914, is a member of the Rotary Club, the Citizens Patriotic League of Covington, and is affiliated with Ashland Lodge of Masons at Ashland, Kentucky. By personal contributions and active work he did all he could to insure the success of patriotic drives in Kenton County during the World war, and among other important services was chairman of the Publicity Committee of the county in all the drives for funds and bond sales.

Mr. Tarvin resides at 3928 Gilbert Avenue, Rosedale, Covington. In 1911, at Covington, he married Miss Emma Bernhardt, a native of Cincinnati.

JUDGE LEWIS LEE MANSON, Police Court Judge of Covington, is a native of that city and is a man whose character and abilities have been shaped by rugged experience and contact with men and affairs. He took up the battle of life when a youth, was in railroad work for a number of years, studied law and was admitted to the bar, and for many years has enjoyed a good general practice at Covington in addition to his official duties.

Judge Manson was born at Covington June 29, 1865. The Mansons were Scotch-Irish, and during the time of the American Colonies it is said that nine brothers of that name came and made settlement in Maryland. William Manson, grandfather of Judge Manson, was born in Maryland in 1795, at the age of seventeen entered St. Mary's College at Emmitsburg, Maryland, graduated, and was a man of exceptional scholarship for his time. Much of his active life was devoted to educational work. He crossed the mountains to Lancaster, Ohio, about 1836, and died there in 1840. He was a democrat in politics. His wife was Sarah Ann Sifford, a native of Maryland, who died at Lancaster. Her second husband was Simeon Denton, a contractor and builder, and a man of considerable wealth.

William Lewis Manson, father of Judge Manson, was born at Frederick, Maryland, April 4, 1830, and was a small child when taken to Lancaster, Ohio. He was reared and married there, became a sales merchant, and also filled the offices of constable and marshal. In 1854 he moved to Cincinnati, and was made chief deputy under his uncle Lewis Sifford, then a United States marshal. He remained as chief deputy marshal throughout the administrations of president Pierce and President Buchanan, and continued six months in Lincoln's term. In 1864 he removed to Covington, where he became a merchant, and in 1866 settled on a farm at Latonia Springs in Kenton County. He was appointed a justice of the peace in 1868, and served continuously in that office until 1890. He finally removed from Latonia Springs to South Covington, now part of the city of Covington, and died there in October, 1896. He was a democrat in politics and was affiliated with the Episcopal Church. At the age of sixteen he had enlisted for service in the Mexican war, but as he was needed by his widowed mother the authorities ruled against him and he was not permitted to go to the front. William L. Manson married Mary Elizabeth Reck at Lancaster, Ohio. She was also a native of Frederick, Maryland, where she was born in 1829. She died at Covington in 1910. She was the mother of a large family of eleven children: Fannie, wife of Alexander Sandford, of Kentucky, a carpenter and stationary engineer; William Sifford, a fruit grower at Fort Meyer, Florida; Miss Virginia, of Covington; Bertha, who died in infancy; Edward R., a locomotive engineer living at Covington; Lewis Lee; Thomas K., a resident of Louisville and manager for the P. Lorillard Tobacco Company; Richard Marmaduke, a locomotive engineer living in Kansas; Charles M., who at the age of fourteen in 1886 was killed by a locomotive freight train at Latonia; Emma and Mary Elizabeth, both of whom died in infancy.

Lewis Lee Manson spent most of his youth in the rural districts of Kenton County. While he attended the rural schools, the greater part of his very substantial education was acquired by reading and by contact with men and affairs. At the age of seventeen he was paying his own way, and soon afterward became an employe of the Kentucky Central Railroad. He continued in the railroad service, was made a locomotive engineer, and did his last railroading in Texas and old Indian Territory. He was in Indian Territory when he resigned June 3, 1889, and soon afterward returned to Covington, where he took up other interests. While here he studied law in the office of the late Judge W. W. Cleary and John E. Hamilton, and was admitted to the bar in 1899. Since then he has had a general civil and criminal practice and for seventeen years he and Leslie T. Applegate have been law partners, with offices in the First National Bank Building at Sixth Street and Madison Avenue.

From 1897 to 1901 Mr. Manson was a justice of the peace. He was elected police judge of Covington in November, 1917, and began his four year term in that office in January, 1918. His offices as judge are in the City Building. Judge Manson is attorney for the Latonia Deposit Bank of Latonia and for the Model Savings & Building Association of Covington. He has also acquired some property interests in the city and his home is at 113 West Thirty-fourth Street.

He has always been an active Democrat, is a member of the Official Board of the Methodist Episcopal Church and a teacher in its Sunday School, and is a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the Industrial Club of Covington. While he was a railroad man he took his degrees in Masonry at Tyler, Texas, and still has membership in St. John's Lodge, No. 53, Free and Accepted Masons, Tyler Chapter No. 24, Royal Arch Masons, and Ascension Commandery No. 25, Knight Templars, all at Tyler, and also belonged to El Hasa Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., at Ashland, Kentucky.

Judge Manson regarded the needs and commands of the Government as paramount to all other private interests during the World war. He served on nearly all the local committees in Kenton County, went out and worked for the success of the various drives, and contributed all his available personal means to the different objects.

Judge Manson is a member of Company D of the Kentucky State Guards, being a sergeant under Capt. L. V. Crockett. He saw some real service in a memorable recent chapter of Kentucky history when he took part in what is called the "second battle of Lexington" on February 9, 1919. He and sixty-five other State Guardsmen stood off a mob of 10,000 who were storming the court house at Lexington for the purpose of laying their hands on William Lockett, a negro, for the purpose of lynching him. It will be recalled that in this battle nine were killed and 150 wounded.

When Company D mustered out and the Thirty-Eighth Tank Company of the Kentucky National Guard was mustered in on the 29th day of March, 1921, Judge Manson was appointed and approved by the War Department as first lieutenant of the Tank Company.

On July 26, 1911, at Covington, in the First Presbyterian Church, Judge Manson married Miss Birdie Horner, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John T. Horner, now deceased. Her father was a merchant and traveling salesman while living at Covington, and later was proprietor of a hotel in Florida, where he died. Mrs. Manson is a graduate nurse.

MORRIS MALCOMB DAVIS, M. D. Since graduating from medical college in 1906 Doctor Davis has been one of the busy professional men of Webster County, and both as a physician and surgeon and as a public spirited citizen he is well known and highly esteemed at Clay.

He was born on a farm in Union County, Kentucky, August 24, 1876, son of William Marshall and Mary (Carr) Davis. His great-grandfather was a native of Ireland, of Scotch-Irish lineage, came to this country and first settled in South Carolina and afterward moved to Mason County, Kentucky, where he died. His son, George Washington Davis, was born in South Carolina, and in Mason County, Kentucky, married Miss Colie, whose mother bore the family name of January. George Washington Davis settled in Union County in 1853, and bought a section of land at $1.25 an acre. He developed this as a farm and lived there until his death at the age of eighty-four. In early life he was a carpenter. He and his wife reared four sons and four daughters, and all are living except William Marshall Davis. The latter was born in Mason County and pursued his activities as a farmer with more than ordinary energy and success. He was a Democrat and a member of the Missionary Baptist Church. His death occurred in Webster County at the age of fifty-eight. Mary Carr, his first wife, was a native of Union County and died at the age of thirty-two, leaving four daughters and one son, Morris M. The second wife of William Marshall Davis was Sallie Elizabeth Dial, who survived him with two sons.

Doctor Davis was farm reared and trained, began his education in country schools and later attended high school at Clay. For ten years his energies were largely devoted to teaching in country schools. He studied medicine while teaching, and in 1906 graduated from the medical department of the University of Kentucky. At that time he began his career at Clay, and for about fifteen years his reputation has been growing as a very able and skillful physician. During the World war he was a member of the Volunteer Medical Corps. He is a member of the Webster County and Kentucky State Medical associations, is a Master Mason and is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Improved Order of Red Men. He is a democrat and a member of the Missionary Baptist Church.

In 1900 Doctor Davis married Miss Delle Watson, of Clay, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Jefferson Watson. The three daughters of Dr. and Mrs. Davis are Z. Irene, Edna Earl and Morris Katherine. Their only son, William Thomas, died at the age of seven and a half years.

PIGMAN TAYLOR, M. D., AND J. H. TAYLOR, M. D. Some of the most representative men and finest characters in this country have found congenial employment for their talents and a wide field of usefulness in the practice of medicine. For many years the name of Taylor has been connected with this learned and self-sacrificing profession in Providence and Webster County, it having been borne by the late Dr. Pigman Taylor and his son, Dr. J. H. Taylor, who is still engaged in an active practice at Providence.

Dr. Pigman Taylor was born in Ohio County, Kentucky, February 28, 1825, and died at Providence, Kentucky, August 22, 1899. He was a son of Harrison and Philenia (Pigman) Taylor, the former a native of Virginia and the latter a native of Maryland, and of Irish and English descent, respectively. When he was eleven years of age Harrison Taylor was brought by his parents to what is now Ohio County, Kentucky, where his father, Richard Taylor, settled on military land and developed a farm, and later became the first merchant of Hartford. Still later he engaged in a distilling business. He served for three terms in the Lower House of the Kentucky State Assembly, and was a prominent man and a second cousin of General Zachary Taylor.

His son, Harrison Taylor, was reared on the homestead, and after reaching manhood's estate bought a farm in the then wilds of Ohio County and developed it, residing on it until 1870, when he sold his property and went to live with his daughter, Mrs. Sarah A. Austin, remaining with her until his death in December, 1878. He was a veteran of the War of 1812, and served as sheriff of Ohio County for one term.

When he was nineteen years old Dr. Pigman Taylor began the study of medicine under Doctors Moore and Hart of Hartford, Kentucky, and during 1846 and 1847 attended the medical department of the Louisville University, and in the spring of 1848 began the practice of his profession at Fordsville, Ohio County, Kentucky. In January, 1849, he moved to the western part of Hopkins County, where he was engaged in practice for ten years, and in March, 1859, located permanently at Providence, and continued to practice until his death.

In 1851 Doctor Taylor was united in marriage with Miss Almedia S. Anderson, a native of Christian County, Kentucky, who died in March, 1906, aged seventy-seven years. They were blessed with eight children, four of whom grew to maturity: Lelia, who married William Johnson and died in 1906, leaving one son, Taylor Johnson; Ida, who married Sidney Morrow, and died in 1889; John Harrison, whose name heads this review; and Thomas Lee, who is residing at San Antonio, Texas. Both Doctor Taylor and his wife were consistent members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. In politics he was a democrat. Fraternally he was a Royal Arch Mason. A gentleman of the old school, he was noted for his charming personality and exquisite courtesy, as well as for his profound learning and professional skill. Boundlessly generous, he lived up to the most exalted conceptions of his calling and displayed in every relation of life a sweet-tempered spirit and was beloved by all who knew him.

Dr. John Harrison Taylor, son of Dr. Pigman Taylor, was born at Providence, March 20, 1864, and secured his preliminary educational training in the city of his nativity and his medical instruction in the medical department of Vanderbilt University, from which he was graduated February 26, 1884, when not quite twenty years of age. He began to practice medicine with his father, and this association continued till the death of the elder man. In 1889 Dr. J. H. Taylor took a post-graduate course of three months at the New York Polyclinic; in 1907 he took another post-graduate course at Johns Hopkins University at Baltimore, Maryland, and was appointed resident physician at Saint Agnes Hospital at Baltimore in May, 1908, which position he held for a year, and then returned to Providence. He is a member of the State and National Medical Associations, and for several years was president of the county Board of Health.

On February 17, 1892, Doctor Taylor was married to Miss Nannie Lee Humphrey, and they had two daughters, Juanita and Almeda. Mrs. Taylor died November 14, 1920. Fraternally Doctor Taylor belongs to the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. In his politics he is a democrat. For many years the Cumberland Presbyterian Church has held his membership. Like his father, he is held in the highest esteem in Webster County, and is a physician and surgeon of unquestioned skill and scholarly attainments.

THOMAS MARSHALL HANKINS, a native son of Webster County, was a small child when his father lost his life as a Confederate soldier, and his youth was attended with poverty and many struggles to establish himself on an independent footing. Many industrious years were spent in the farming vocation, he is also a former sheriff of the county, and for a number of years has been one of the active officials of the First National Bank of Sebree.

A brief history of this bank may properly be ap-ended here. The People's Bank was organized at Sebree in 1904, under a state charter, with J. B. Ramsey as president and Joel Bailey as cashier. In 1905 the charter was surrendered and the national charter secured, the name being changed to the First National Bank of Sebree. At the same time the capital stock was raised from $25,000 to $50,000. J. B. Ramsey remained as president and Mr. Bailey as cashier. Later the president was J. R. Ramsey and a year later W. I. Smith became president, and is still active head of the institution. For one year Vernon Sullenger was successor to Mr. Bailey as cashier, B. O. Warren was cashier for two years, and since 1905 that office has been occupied by Thomas M. Hankins. The present bank building was erected by the old People's Bank. In 1920 this bank's surplus exceeded $12,000, and it is one of the real bulwarks of finance in Webster County.

Mr. Hankins was born on a farm in Webster County December 6, 1859, a son of Barney L. and Agnes (Shelton) Hankins. Barney Hankins was born in Tennessee, and as a child was brought by his parents, Houston Hankins and wife, to Kentucky, where Houston Hankins continued farming. Barney Hankins was also a farmer and volunteered his services to the Confederate cause early in the war and was killed near Morganfield, Kentucky. His wife, Agnes Shelton, was born in North Carolina and came to Kentucky as a girl, her father, Josiah Shelton, settling on a farm in what is now Webster County. She died at the age of forty-eight.

Thomas M. Hankins was one of five children, and his early opportunities enabled him to secure only a common school education. He worked on a farm from early youth, and on leaving home hired out to a farmer and remained in the employ of one man nearly seven years. This long period of service proved his industry, his persistence and faithfulness, and after that he farmed for himself, gradually acquired independent circumstances, and in 1895 he was elected sheriff of Webster County and held that office four years. He had previously served as deputy sheriff several years. After leaving the court house he returned to the farm, and still has some valuable agricultural interests in Webster County. Mr. Hankins was assistant cashier one year before he was elected cashier of the First National Bank of Sebree.

He is a democratic voter, a Methodist and a Royal Arch Mason. In 1879 he married Miss Mary Brooks, a daughter of William Brooks, of Webster County. Six children were born to their marriage, five daughters and one son. One daughter, Florence, died at the age of fourteen. The names of the five living children are Nettie, Maynie, Roland, Effie and Kate.

THOMAS JEFFERSON ADAMS who has enjoyed the double distinction of being the Grand Master of Kentucky and at the same time entrusted with the direct care and welfare of widows and orphans under the protection of the Craft in Kentucky as superintendent of the Widows and Orphans' Home and Infirmary at Louisville, was born at Adams, Robertson County, Tennessee, August 15, 1861, a son of James M. and Sarah Catherine (Dillard) Adams. His parents were both natives of Robertson County, his father born April 21, 1828, and his mother May 15, 1833. His father died in 1897 and his mother in July, 1895, Thomas J. being the youngest of their family of two sons and one daughter. His father spent his life as a farmer, was for a number of years in the tobacco business and also a traveling salesman. He was a past master of Hampton Lodge No. 237, Free and Accepted Masons, at Port Royal, Tennessee, was a member of the Baptist Church and in politics was a democrat. Thomas Jefferson Adams became a resident of Louisville December 28, 1887, and has lived in that city ever since. On January 17, 1900, he married Julia Page, a native of Jefferson County.

Of Mr. Adams' experience and progress in Masonry, the honors he has received and the distinguished services he has rendered, it will be appropriate to quote for the chief authority from an article written by Past Grand Master James E. Wilhelm. What follows therefore is a slightly abbreviated quotation from Mr. Wilhelm's article.

The late honor bestowed upon Mr. Adams in elevating him to the highest distinction that can be paid a Kentucky Mason is not only a recognition at the hands of over 40,000 of his brethren in the state, of the fidelity and zeal he has always displayed towards the principles and teachings of Freemasonry, but is also the placing of the seal of unqualified confidence and approval of his faithful services as superintendent of the Masonic Widows and Orphans Home, an institution not only near and dear to the hearts of all Kentucky Masons, but whose welfare has the best wishes of all the Craft throughout the world, and especially so of those who maintain similar places of education and abode. For it was Kentucky that first gave to the Masonic World the idea in tangible form by establishing the first and oldest Masonic Home for the care of the widows or orphans of its deceased Masons.

Brother Adams was initiated in Louisville Lodge No. 400, Free and Accepted Masons April 18, 1892; passed to the degree of a Fellow Craft May 16, 1892, and raised to the sublime degree of a Master Mason June 20, 1892. He was elected Master of Louisville Lodge December 27, 1897, and served as such one year. He was declared a life member of the Lodge July 1, 1907. From his initiation to the present time Brother Adams has been an active and zealous worker in his lodge, ever ready to promote the welfare of the Craft wherever he may be.

The Capitular degrees were conferred upon him in Eureka Chapter No. 101, Royal Arch Masons, in Louisville. He received the Mark Master, Past Master and Most Excellent Master degrees November 11, 1892, and was exalted to the degree of a Royal Arch Mason November 18, 1892. He demitted from Eureka Chapter in June, 1905, for the purpose of assisting in organizing Highland Chapter No. 150, Royal Arch Masons at Louisville, which was set to work under a dispensation July 24, 1905, and granted a charter October 18, 1905. He served that Chapter as High Priest during the year 1906.

He received the Cryptic degrees in Louisville Council No. 4, Royal and Select Masters, consisting of Royal Master, Select Master and Super-Excellent Master degrees. In 1900 he was elected Thrice Illustrious Master of Louisville Council.

The orders of the Temple were conferred upon Brother Adams in DeMolay Commandery No. 12, Knights Templar. He received the Order of the Red Cross September 21, 1894, and the orders of Knights Templar and Knight of Malta October 3, 1894. He was elected and installed Eminent Commander of DeMolay Commandery April 10, 1906, and declared a life member of the Commandery May 10, 1911. Since April, 1907, he has served as a member of the Finance Committee of the Commandery, and rendered valuable assistance in promoting the interests of this Commandery that has a well earned reputation throughout the whole country for its excellence in work, some of its drill corps having acquired a national reputation on the field.

Brother Adams has received all of the Scottish Rite degrees, and was made a Master of the Royal Secret of the thirty-second degree in the Grand Consistory of Kentucky, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite Masons, at Louisville, April 29, 1893. He was made a Knight Commander of the Court of Honor October 20, 1897, and received the thirty-third and last degree in Masonry October 20, 1903. Since April, 1893, he has been an active worker in the Scottish Rite bodies, and was elected Grand Master of the Grand Consistory of Kentucky January 1, 1916, at which time he was also Grand Master of Kentucky Free and Accepted Masons.

On June 19, 1903, he became a member of Kosair Temple, Ancient Arabic Order Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, at Louisville.

Brother Adams was elected Grand Junior Warden of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky October 16, 1912; elected Grand Senior Warden October 22, 1913; elected Deputy Grand Master October 23, 1914, and elected Grand Master October 20, 1915, and passed out of office October 19, 1916.

During his term as Grand Master Brother Adams made ninety-six visits to eighty lodges. He also attended twenty-two meetings of the Board of Directors of the Masonic Widows and Orphans Home, three meetings of the Board of Directors of the Old Masons Home, four meetings of the Board of Trustees of the Masonic Temple, three meetings of the Educational Trustees of the Grand Lodge, one meeting of the Trowel Club, one meeting of the High Twelve Club, and wrote nearly 1,700 letters to various officers and members of the Craft. Notwithstanding the great amount of time consumed with the duties of Grand Master, he was ever watchful of the care of the hundreds sheltered by the Home, and the affairs of that institution moved peacefully along without a single discord or the slightest neglect of his duties as its superintendent.

For a number of years Brother Adams was engaged in the wholesale hardware business in Louisville, and for several years was a traveling salesman for the Continental and American Tobacco Company. He is also a director of the Avery Building Association, and also of the Evergreen Cemetery Company. He is a member of the Walnut Street Baptist Church.

One has but to glance at the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky to readily realize the patience, zeal and wisdom displayed by Grand Master Adams during his term of office. Many vexatious and difficult questions of all character and nature arose, but the affairs of the forty odd thousands of Masons were so wisely administered that when their representatives assembled in Annual Communication to receive the accounts of the various stewardships the full and comprehensive report of the Grand Master covered all matters requiring attention, and peace and harmony prevailed throughout the entire jurisdiction. His labors as such rest in the archives of Masonry, and he laid aside the gavel amid the plaudits of his brethren, and modestly received the heartfelt praises of his fellows for his faithful and untiring performance of his duties.

Contrast the duties and responsibilities of a Grand Master with those of a superintendent of a Masonic Widows and Orphans Home, and at once the thinking mind will find them scarcely worthy of comparison. The former deals with questions and affairs concerning men; the latter with those that vitally affect the lives and the very destiny of children deprived of a father's watchful care and protection. Hence, may we not approach with confidence the conclusions that in a Home such as the Masons of Kentucky maintain the tender hearts and minds of our wards more often turn to the life and character displayed by the one into whose hands have been committed their welfare of every description? In a word, to the superintendent of the Home.

Brother Adams was elected superintendent of the Masonic Widows and Orphans Home September 20, 1907, and assumed his duties as such October 1, 1907. For over nine years he has been faithful to his trust and to the confidence reposed in him. With the physical, educational, moral and spiritual training of the hundreds upon hundreds of children that have been entrusted to his care during his administration of the affairs of that institution, can one with any degree of accuracy calculate the immensity of the responsibility that has rested upon the shoulders of one so situated? Many, indeed, have been the moments of anxiety and prayerful thought bestowed upon the line of duty to be observed in so many individual cases. The obligations as such are numerous and extremely weighty, and were it not that one's trust is in God, and being taught to apply to Him for strength and wisdom, he might well shrink from assuming them. But a real man, whose life and conduct courts Divine favor, has within him the assurance that in the hour of darkness and despair a Strong Arm will raise him and establish his feet firmly in the path of duty, wherein he may manifest and exemplify the essential points of fellowship with all mankind. Such is the responsibility of the position to which Brother Adams has been called. But there is another side to consider.

What is the mission of life? There is but one, and it is to do good unto all mankind, and thereby glorify the Creator. That we may better accomplish the mission the heart and mind of the young must be trained toward that which is high and noble. How great the privilege of those into whose hands the future of an immortal being largely rests. Each day, nay, each hour, offers opportunity to mould the character of a child by instilling into its impressionable heart and mind the great truths of life. The mere touch of the hand, a timely word spoken or the kindly look of the eye, may have its influence for good in the years to come. Out of the Home each year go some of the men and women of a few years yet to come, and the training received there does not end with their departure therefrom, but courses on down from generation to generation; and long after those whose patience, perseverance and love helped fashion the character of their charges have passed away and perhaps forgotten, their good works will live after them and be an everlasting monument to their fidelity and zeal. Great indeed is the honor of being an instrument to carry out the Divine Plan of uplifting mankind, and to have one's personality so intimately interwoven in the lives of hundreds of others, as must be the case with that of the superintendent of our Home and those who look to him for guidance and who accept him as an example. That he measures up to the high standard required by such an honorable position is best evidenced by the high plane upon which the Home rests, the affectionate regard of the loved ones there for him, and the full confidence of his brethren.

FRANCES ESTILL BEAUCHAMP, of Lexington, for a third of a century has carried on important tasks of leadership and direct exercise of influence and effort through the great organization, now world-wide, of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. She is easily one of Kentucky's most famous women.

Frances Estill was born at the old Estill homestead in Madison County, Kentucky. Her great-great-grandfather, James Estill, was a Virginia soldier of the Revolution, and for his service was given a grant of land which he exercised in the Blue Grass region of Kentucky. Mrs. Beauchamp's grandfather, Samuel, spent his life on the plantation near Kirksville, on Silver Creek. He married Rebecca Hamilton, whose parents also had a land grant in Kentucky due to her father's Revolutionary service. James W. Estill, father of Mrs. Beauchamp, married Nancy Scott, of Jessamine County, and for many years was engaged in stock raising on a large scale in the old Paint Lick community of Garrard County. In 1880 he moved to Lexington, and for several years was associated in business with his son-in-law, J. H. Beauchamp, on Versailles Pike near Lexington, where he died at the age of eighty-four. Mrs. Beauchamp's mother died at sixty-five.

An only child, Frances Estill was educated at Science Hill under Mrs. Julia R. Tevis, one of the most noted women teachers Kentucky ever had. When Miss Estill was in school this venerable educator was still in charge of the work in French and chemistry.

A year after leaving school Miss Estill became the wife of J. H. Beauchamp. Mr. Beauchamp was a native of Spencer County, Kentucky, and was reared in Union County in the western part of the state. He was also of Virginia ancestry, and his father, Alfred Beauchamp, was of old French Huguenot stock, descended from one of three brothers who came to America from England. J. H. Beauchamp grew up in Union County, was liberally educated and studied law with an uncle, who for forty years was county clerk of Spencer County. He practiced for a time in Spencer County, and then moved to Lexington, where he became associated with John R. Allen and for a number of years was a member of the firm Buckner, Beauchamp & Allen.

Mr. and Mrs. Beauchamp had no children of their own, but took into their home and reared seven boys. One of them, John Haley, graduated from the State University and died at the age of twenty-one, soon after graduation. Houston Brown died at the age of fifteen. Frank Scott is now a coal dealer at Knoxville, Tennessee. Dr. Ernest Smith is a medical missionary in Africa, while Rev. A. E. Smith is a missionary preacher in the Kentucky Mountains.

It was in 1886 that Mrs. Beauchamp took active responsibilities of leadership in the W. C. T. U. In that year she was elected local president at Lexington and also state secretary. In 1896 she was elected state president. Her duties as state secretary were especially onerous, involving all the business of the Central office and also much of the organization work out over the state. In 1887 there were only eight or ten organizations of the Women's Christian Temperance Union in all Kentucky, while at present there are over 300 local bodies. The growth of the organization in Kentucky is but a reflection of an even larger growth, since the world's Women's Christian Temperance Union is now represented in forty-six nations. Mrs. Beauchamp has attended every national convention of the order since 1887. In 1894 she was elected one of the two national secretaries, and while state president she was a vice president of the National Union. Mrs. Beauchamp is a very earnest worker, a talented and resourceful speaker, and has appeared before audiences in discussion of the work of the Union and of different problems in every state, and has attended many state Women's Christian Temperance Union conventions. She has been deeply interested in the success of the suffrage movement, though her influence in that direction has been exercised entirely within the Women's Christian Temperance Union. She has been for many years a member of the Woman's Suffrage Association. The Kentucky Women's Christian Temperance Union established the well known settlement and school at Hindman, Knott County, and she has been an official member of the board of that school from the beginning. This school has been pronounced by the United States commissioner of education as a model school, and in many ways it has extended its influence to raise and improve the standards of school work throughout Eastern Kentucky.

Mrs. Beauchamp for a number of years has made a study of problems of prison reform, especially as affecting the handling of juvenile cases. The Kentucky House of Reform at Glendale is the direct outgrowth of influences set in motion by her and associates. Formerly it was a practice of the penitentiary authorities to mix the boy inmates indiscriminately with the other convicts, and at one time there were sixty-eight boys under eighteen in daily contact with hardened criminals. Mrs. Beauchamp became attracted to a special case of one eight-year-old boy in Garrard County who was sentenced to the penitentiary. She at once visited Governor Bradley, and through her influence the boy was met at the penitentiary gate with a pardon.

Mrs. Beauchamp since early girlhood has been an active member of the Presbyterian Church, and for many years has been a leader of the Bible Class and Sunday school. For many years she was secretary of the national prohibition party, and in the interests of the prohibition movement has worked with commissions and committees before Congress and also state legislatures and has spoken in public on prohibition in every state in the United States. For about fifteen years she was secretary of the National Christian Temperance Union.

MORRIS B. GIFFORD. The only important variation in the routine of a busy and successful practicing lawyer which Mr. Gifford has permitted was his long and consistent record of duty well performed as a member of the Kentucky National Guard and his service as a major in the World war.

Major Gifford was born at New Albany, Indiana, August 10, 1873, a son of Harley N. and Eugenia (Rowley) Gifford. His father, who was born at Conneaut, Ohio, in 1842, was reared and educated in Ohio, and during the Civil war was a captain in the Fourth Ohio Heavy Artillery. Soon after the war he moved to Louisville, was also in business at New Albany, and was instrumental in promoting one of the first successful telephone companies in this section, being one of the organizers of the Ohio Valley Telephone Company. He served as its general manager for many years. From 1907 to 1909 he was treasurer of the City of Louisville. He was a staunch republican, was affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and was a member of the Episcopal Church. Harley Gifford died in 1912. His wife was born at Asheville, North Carolina, in 1849, and died in 1913. Their two children are Helen and Morris, the former the widow of William Clegg.

Morris B. Gifford was reared at Louisville, attended the Male High School, graduated in law from the University of Louisville in 1892, and in 1893 received his law degree from the University of Michigan. Since that year he has been in active practice at Louisville, his business taking him into all the courts, and is largely of a civil nature. His offices are in the Inter Southern Building.

Major Gifford was for ten years a member of the Kentucky National Guard, serving as first lieutenant of Company B of the First Kentucky Infantry, was commander of Company K during the Porto Rico campaign in the Spanish-American war, and at the close of his service was lieutenant colonel of the First Kentucky Regiment. During the World war he served as captain of Company A of the Three Hundred and Thirty-Sixth Infantry, and finally as major of the Seventy-eighth Infantry. He is a member of the American Legion and a reserve major of the Infantry Section of the United States Army. Major Gifford is affiliated with Willis Stewart Lodge No. 224, Free and Accepted Masons, is a member of the Episcopal Church and the Pendennis Club, and votes as a republican.

On December 3, 1901, he married Marguerite C. Peters, a native of Louisville and daughter of Simon and Margaret (Davidson) Peters, both natives of Kentucky. Her mother is still living.

JONATHAN VAN DYKE NORMAN. In the practice of law at Louisville since 1899, Mr. Norman is widely known throughout the Ohio Valley as a specialist in transportation law, and his abilities have brought him a constantly growing practice in that and in corporation matters.

Mr. Norman was born at the Town of Normandy in Spencer County, Kentucky, August 13, 1877, a son of Abner E. and Kate (Barry) Norman. His father was born in Shelby County February 15, 1850, and his mother in Prince George County, Maryland, May 18, 1850. Jonathan is the second of four children, three of whom are still living. Abner Norman and his wife were fellow students at Georgetown College. Soon after leaving college he went West with a party of United States surveyors to old Indian Territory and for a time had charge of the Government survey in what is now the State of Oklahoma. In honor of his services there the Town of Norman was named. That is now an Oklahoma city dignified in importance as being the seat of the State University. Abner Norman was in Indian Territory many years before the original Oklahoma was opened and when its only legal inhabitants were members of the Indian tribes. He continued in charge of the surveying until 1872, when he returned to Normandy, Kentucky. He married in 1874, and after that was a farmer in Spencer County until 1890, when he came to Louisville and established the Norman Lumber Company, Incorporated. He has for thirty years been president of this important wholesale lumber business. He is independent in politics and a member of the Baptist Church.

Jonathan Van Dyke Norman has lived in Louisville since he was thirteen. His primary education was acquired in Spencer County. He graduated in 1896 from the Male High School at Louisville, received his A. B. degree from Central University at Richmond in 1898, and then continued in the law school until graduating in 1899. Mr. Norman is a member of the Jefferson County, Kentucky State and American Bar associations. He belongs to the Pendennis Club, the Louisville Country Club, is a member of the Second Presbyterian Church and is affiliated with Louisville Lodge No. 400, Free and Accepted Masons, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Like his father, he exercises an independent choice in politics.

Mr. Norman married Mary Cecil, a native of Louisville. They have three children, Jonathan Vandyke Norman, Jr., John Cecil Norman and Mary Cecil Norman. Mrs. Norman is a granddaughter of the distinguished Presbyterian minister Stuart Robinson, and is a daughter of John G. and Elizabeth Robinson Cecil. John G. Cecil was one of the prominent physicians of Louisville, where he died in 1913.

BLAKEMORE WHEELER has been a Louisville business man for twenty years, and his time and energies are now effectively bestowed in the real estate business as a member of the Wheeler Realty Company.

Mr. Wheeler was born in Louisville November 18, 1885, a son of William C. and Katie (Blakemore) Wheeler. His paternal grandparents, I. Marbury and Sarah (Seaton) Wheeler, were both born in Jefferson County, the former May 6, 1833, and the latter in 1837. Marbury Wheeler, who died in April, 1910, was a well to do and highly esteemed farmer of Jefferson County. He voted as a democrat, and was a member of the Masonic fraternity and the Christian Church. His wife died October 12, 1883, and of their nine children three grew to mature years, two now living. The oldest child is William C. Wheeler, who was born on his father's farm in Jefferson County January 1, 1859, was educated in public schools and the Southern Business College, and in 1880 began an active business career at Louisville. For over twenty years he was connected with and in 1902 became a member of the firm C. P. Moorman & Company, distillers and wholesale liquor dealers. He was actively associated with that business until it disbanded January 16, 1920, and Mr. Wheeler was then satisfied to retire after forty years of consecutive labors. He is a popular citizen, a member of the Pendennis Club, the Louisville Country Club, and is a democrat and a member of the Christian Church. His wife was born in Oldham County, Kentucky, December 18, 1865, and died April 30, 1920. They had three children, Blakemore, Sarah Catherine (who died in infancy) and Araminta M.

Blakemore Wheeler completed his education at Louisville and in 1903, at the age of eighteen, became an employe under his father in the firm of C. P. Moorman & Company. The following years brought him larger responsibilities, and he was an active factor in the business until January 16, 1920. At that time he turned his attention to the real estate auction business as a member of the Wheeler Realty Company, and has figured in some of the notable transactions in real estate in the city and surrounding district. His company is owner of the Willard Hotel, one of the fine old hostleries of the city. Mr. Wheeler is a member of the Louisville Country Club, Pendennis Club, Lexington Country Club, and in politics casts an independent vote. On April 30, 1913, he married Miss Minnie Norton Marvin, a native of Louisville and daughter of Dr. J. B. and Juliet Henry (Norton) Marvin. Her father was a native of Florida, and after a long career as a physician and surgeon died September 2, 1913. Her mother was born at Hopkinsville, Kentucky, daughter of George Washington Norton, one of the prominent citizens of that section of the state. Mrs. Wheeler is the youngest of three children.

DARA ESTES CROSS. Closely identified with the younger business element of Louisville, Dara Estes Cross since coming to the city has been identified with one concern, the Belknap Hardware and Manufacturing Company, and has attained executive responsibilities with that, one of the largest enterprises of its kind in the Ohio Valley. Mr. Cross was born in Graves County, Kentucky, February 21, 1886, a son of Thomas A. and Addie (Parker) Cross. The Cross family has been on the western side of the Allegheny Mountains since about the close of the Revolutionary war. His ancestor, Samuel Cross, was born in North Carolina in 1766, of Scotch ancestry, and as a young man he moved over the mountains and settled in Stewart County, Tennessee. His son, William Cross, great-grandfather of the Louisville business man, was born in Stewart County in 1798, and was one of the youthful soldiers under General Jackson at the battle of New Orleans at the close of the War of 1812. Thomas A. Cross was born in Stewart County, Tennessee, March 4, 1840, was reared and educated in that state, and as a young man joined the Confederate army and for a time was a messenger to the great leader Stonewall Jackson. He was in the battle of Bull Run, and after the fall of Fort Henry and Fort Donelson he was captured. After being held a prisoner for nine months he made his escape and rejoined his command and served faithfully until the end of the struggle. After the war he married and for a number of years taught school, and finally settled at Bardwell in Carlisle County, Kentucky, where he was active in the harness and leather business until he retired in 1917. He is a Baptist and a democrat. Thomas A. Cross' wife was born in Stewart County November 26, 1845, and died December 8, 1891. Of her seven children four are still living, Dara E. being the youngest.

Dara E. Cross grew up at Bardwell, completed his high school course there and at the age of eighteen came to Louisville and found employment with the Belknap Hardware and Manufacturing Company. At first he was only one of many employees of that concern, but each year has brought him increasing responsibilities and more important connections with the business and he is now comptroller of the company and one of the board of directors. Mr. Cross is a member of the Pendennis Club, Louisville Country Club, belongs to the Board of Trade and the Lions Club, votes as a republican and is a member of the Baptist Church. On April 4, 1909, he married Miss Lutie Rudd, a native of Louisville. They have two children, Dara E., Jr., and Lilian.

HARRY S. COX. For his responsibilities as superintendent of the city schools of Covington, one of the largest school systems in the state, Harry S. Cox had a preparation and experience that well justify his high position among Kentucky educators. He went into school work soon after graduating from university, and is one of the most scholarly men in the profession in Kentucky, and has also shown the highest ability in school administration.

Mr. Cox was born near Columbus, Ohio, December 12, 1867. The Cox family was originally English. Some of its members were followers of William Penn to Philadelphia, and in nearly every generation since some of the descendants have been affiliated with the Friends Church. John Cox, grandfather of the Covington educator, was born in Pennsylvania, was a surveyor and farmer and an early settler in Franklin County, Ohio, where he died in 1873. For many years he held the office of justice of the peace. His son, John Cox, was born in Paulding County, Ohio, in 1837, and was also well educated and maintained an interest in books and learning all his life. He was reared and married in Franklin County, Ohio, where he followed farming. In 1875 he removed to Chanute, Kansas, and was one of the early merchants in that section of the state, but in the spring of 1879 returned East and settled near Richmond, Indiana, where he continued farming until his death in 1886. He had served as a Union soldier during the Civil war, was a republican in politics and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. John Cox married Kate Seymour, who was born in Franklin County, Ohio, in 1844, and is now living at Richmond, Indiana. She was the mother of seven children: Horace, a farmer in Preble County, Ohio; Harry S.; Charles, a farmer in Preble County; Miss Alice, a teacher in the public schools of Cincinnati; John, a farmer in Preble County; Mary, who lives with her mother; and Catherine, wife of Harry Rettick, a teacher in the Cooper Institute of New York City.

Harry S. Cox received his first instruction in rural schools in his native county of Franklin, and after he was eight years old attended school at Chanute, Kansas, and later was again a country school pupil in Wayne County, Indiana. His higher education was obtained in the preparatory department of Ohio Wesleyan University and in the regular collegiate department of that university at Delaware, from which he received his A. B. degree in 1896. While at Ohio Wesleyan he became a member of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity. Following his university career Mr. Cox was a teacher of history in the high school of Richmond, Indiana, one year, for five years was a member of the faculty of the high school at Lancaster, Ohio, and then for two years interrupted his work as a teacher to attend Harvard University, during 1902-04. As a result of his post-graduate studies he has the Master of Arts degree from Harvard.

Mr. Cox has been in close touch with Covington's educational interests for over fifteen years. He was teacher of science in the high school from 1904 to 1907, and for the following ten years was high school principal. In 1917 he was appointed superintendent of city schools, and much credit has been properly given him for the able manner in which he has directed the local school system during the peculiarly difficult period of the World war, with shortage of funds and shortage of teachers a nationwide characteristic. Superintendent Cox has the supervision of fourteen schools in the Covington district and a staff of 212 teachers, while the scholarship enrollment is approximately 7,000.

He is a member of the Kentucky Education Association, the National Education Association, the Cincinnati School Masters Club, is superintendent of the Sunday School in the Methodist Episcopal Church and in politics is independent. Besides his modern home at 2220 Eastern Avenue he owns a half interest in a farm in Preble County, Ohio. Mr. Cox gave all the material and spiritual aid he could to the successful prosecution of the war, assisted in the canvass for the Red Cross and Liberty Bond drives, and was otherwise active in Kenton County.

In 1905, at Lancaster, Ohio, he married Miss Rebecca

S A Hass

Wolfe, daughter of Daniel and Elizabeth (Dum) Wolfe, both deceased. Her father was an Ohio farmer, and Mrs. Cox is a graduate of the high school at Lancaster. They have two children: Grace Elizabeth, born January 1, 1913, and Rebecca Katherine, born December 8, 1914.

WORLEY AUGUSTUS SHORE. To his duties as business director of the Covington Board of Education Worley Augustus Shore brings a long and varied experience as an expert accountant, formerly in the railroad service, and he has handled the business side of local school administration not only with exceptional skill and efficiency but with the incentive of a deep personal interest in the school system.

Mr. Shore was born in Middleport, Meigs County, Ohio, November 19, 1870. His grandfather, John Wreford Shore, Sr., was a noted old-time iron master, a native of Derbyshire, England, where he was born in 1810. He was trained as an architect and builder, and on coming to the United States settled at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and from there removed to Zaleski, Ohio. He built a number of iron furnaces in the famous iron region of Southern Ohio, including the furnaces at Iron-ton, where he lived and reared his family. His ability as a furnace builder late in life called him to the new center of the iron and steel industry at Birmingham, Alabama, and he built several furnaces in that state and also in Virginia. He died at Birmingham in 1893. His wife was Margaret Smith, a native of England, who died at Iron-ton, Ohio, in 1885. Their son, John Wreford Shore, Jr., was born at Pittsburgh in 1849, but grew up at Iron-ton, Ohio, and as a young man removed to Middleport, where he married. He was a fresco artist, but on removing to Versailles, Kentucky, in 1880, became a carriage manufacturer. In 1883 he took his family to Mount Sterling, Kentucky, where he followed his profession until his death in 1886. He was also a well trained and skillful musician. When between fourteen and fifteen years of age he ran away from home to join the Union army in the Civil war. His youth was a bar to his acceptance for duty as a regular soldier, but his other accomplishments caused him to be assigned as a musician in the Eighteenth Kentucky Regiment, Veteran Volunteer Infantry, and he was on duty the last two years of the war, participating in Sherman's Atlanta campaign and the March to the Sea. He was always a republican in politics and a member of the Episcopal Church.

John Wreford Shore, Jr., married Electa Jane Worley, who was of Scotch ancestry. She was born at Middleport, Ohio, in 1850 and died at Columbus, that state, in November, 1891. She was distinguished by brilliant intellectual accomplishments, was a thorough artist and musician, and personally supervised much of the early education of her only son and child, Worley Augustus Shore.

The latter attended public school at Middleport and Gallipolis, Ohio, and for five years attended a night school at Columbus and subsequently took courses in correspondence schools, specializing in accounting. He began supporting himself at the age of seventeen as a messenger in the State House at Columbus, and subsequently was a clerk in one of the departments of the State House. In 1892 ill health compelled him to seek outdoor employment and he began training thoroughbred horses, and in that capacity traveled all over the United States and was associated with some of the famous strings of racing and trotting horses during that period.

In 1905 Mr. Shore became a clerk in the freight department at Cincinnati for the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company, but six months later joined the accounting department of the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railway. A year later he entered the comptroller's department of the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and was on duty with that corporation until 1911.

Mr. Shore was elected clerk of the Board of Education of Covington in 1912, and since July, 1913, has been business director, handling the general administration of the schools at Covington. His offices are in the City Hall. He served as president of the Board of Education at Latonia, Kentucky, from 1906 to 1908. He is a democrat, is affiliated with Latonia Lodge No. 746, Free and Accepted Masons, and has taken fourteen degrees in the Scottish Rite Indra Consistory No. 2 at Covington. Mr. Shore did practically double work during the World war period, assisting with his influence and means and serving on various committees to raise funds and promote other patriotic objects in Kenton County. He was a captain in the American Protective League.

Mr. Shore has a beautiful bungalow home at 3611 Lincoln Avenue. He married at Covington in July, 1900, Miss Irmina Olinger, daughter of John and Nancy (Hampton) Olinger, now deceased. Her father was a farmer and spent his last years at Covington. The Hamptons were a pioneer family of the city. Landrum Hampton, maternal grandfather of Mrs. Shore, at one time operated a water mill on Bank Lick Creek, a mill previously owned by old General Taylor.

SETH AMNON GLASS, who for the past twenty years has been a Lexington merchant, building up a splendid chain of wholesale and retail grocery establishments, is a member of old and noted families of the Blue Grass state.

He was born on his father's farm in Owen County, August 14, 1874, son of Horace Sanford and Mary Frances (Wilson) Glass. His great-great-grandfather, William Glass, was a native of Culpeper County, Virginia, the son of Scotch parents. William Glass came west to Kentucky and located four miles from the present City of Lexington, on the Georgetown Pike. He was a typical frontiersman and pioneer Kentuckian, and very fond of sports, particularly cock fighting. He and his wife had come west from Virginia on horseback. Their son John Glass, the great-grandfather, was born in Scott County, Kentucky, where for many years he was identified with farming and planting. He was a Baptist and politically a democrat. He married a Miss Southworth, and of their five children one son, Van, is still living, at the age of ninety-two. The grandfather of Seth A. Glass was one of the pioneers of Owen County, where he spent his active life on a farm. He built the first school-house in his district, was closely associated with the Baptist Church and in politics was a democrat. He and his wife had thirteen children, ten of whom are still living, eight sons and two daughters.

The second in age of these children was Horace Sanford Glass, who was born in Owen County and died in November, 1918, at the age of sixty-two. His widow is still living. Her father, Silas H. Wilson, was born in Scott County and spent his life as a farmer. His first wife became the mother of ten children, and by a second marriage he had two other children. Silas H. Wilson was the son of Joseph and Louise Wilson, both of whom came from Maryland and reared a large family in Kentucky. Many of the Wilsons were professional men as well as farmers, and as a family they were educated and cultured people. The Wilsons also came from Scotland. Silas H. Wilson and three of his sons were soldiers in the Confederate army, two of the sons serving under General Morgan. The youngest of the sons stole away from home when thirteen years of age, taking a horse, and, getting accepted into the ranks, participated in some of the hardest fought battles. All these sons and the father escaped unhurt.

Seth Amnon Glass was one of six children, all of whom are living: Elias D., who married Adia Bell; Seth Amnon; Rowan R.; Allie B., wife of Lemuel Lovegrove; Effie, wife of Merritt Taylor; and James Howard. The son James Howard enlisted in California for service during the World war, and was a sergeant major at the close of the war.

Seth Ammon Glass acquired his education in the public schools of Owen and Scott counties and was appointed from Scott County as a scholar representative to the Kentucky State University, attending that school for five years, beginning in 1894. After leaving university he remained at Lexington and since 1900 has been in the grocery business. He has developed a large and prosperous chain of stores now counting fourteen, located at Lexington, Nicholasville, Versailles and Georgetown, with a large central wholesale establishment at Lexington. Mr. Glass has also become extensively interested in real estate in Lexington. He has been a very busy man and has never sought the cares of public office. He is a democratic voter, a member of the Christian Church, and is affiliated with numerous lodges, clubs and organizations of a commercial, fraternal and social nature.

August 6, 1902, he married Anna Katherine Hays, who was born at Lexington, daughter of James M. and Emma (Davis) Hays. Her father was born at Loudon, Tennessee, December 4, 1848, and her mother at Lexington, April 13, 1854. Her father is a retired business man of Lexington, is an active Baptist and his family are republicans. Mrs. Glass is the third of six children, all of whom are still living. Mr. and Mrs. Glass have one son, Donald Hays, born in 1910. Both Mr. and Mrs. Glass are eligible to membership in the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution.

CHARLES HENRY ELLIS. It is perfectly safe to make the statement that no man can become a leading factor in any line and win such appreciation from his fellow citizens as to be rewarded with high local office unless he has deserved such preferment. Occasionally men do have honors conferred upon them to which they are not entitled, but it is not long before they are found out and they fall back to their real position among their associates. Were there no material rewards attending upon the proper performance of duty and an uprightness of living, the self respect a man earns by such a course is sufficient to raise him above the level of a time-serving servant, and mark him for what he is. Charles Henry Ellis, president of the Bank of Sturgis, president of the Kentucky Bankers Association, and for four years mayor of Sturgis, is easily one of the most deserving and successful of the citizens of Union County, and one to whom all the above praise should be applied.

Charles Henry Ellis was born in Ohio County, Kentucky, near Hartford, July 27, 1873, a son of Alexander C. and Mary (Stevens) Ellis, both of whom were born in Kentucky. The Ellis family is of Virginia stock, but Joel Ellis, the grandfather, was born in Kentucky, and this state also gave birth to the grandfather Stevens, although his ancestors came from Maryland. Alexander C. Ellis was a farmer and tobacconist of Ohio County, and Charles H. Ellis was reared on the homestead and was early taught to make himself useful to his parents. After attending the rural schools he became a student of Centre College, from which he was graduated, and then for nine years was occupied with teaching school. Entering the banking business he was cashier of the Citizens Bank at Calhoun, Kentucky, for one year, and then occupied a similar position for three years with the Morganfield National Bank of Morganfield, both of which he assisted in organizing. In 1908 he came to Sturgis as cashier of the Bank of Sturgis, and continued in that office until 1920, when he was elected its president. In September, 1920, he was further honored by his fellow bankers of the state, who made him the chief executive of their organization. In politics a democrat, he has always been active in his party and popular with the masses, and was once elected mayor of Sturgis. He is a Master Mason, and belongs to the Christian Church.

In 1902 Mr. Ellis was united in marriage with Miss Corinne Landrum, and they have three daughters. Having had such a long experience as a banker, Mr. Ellis is well qualified to judge wisely with reference to men and their motives, and many times renders very valuable services in advising with reference to prospective investments and expansion of existing business concerns. His interest in his home community is unquestioned, and he is one of the leaders in all wholesome movements designed to improve existing conditions and raise the general standards of the people.

J. HOGAN BALLARD is one of the young men and citizens who have given a great impetus to the growth and development of the town of Bryantsville in Garrard County. He is a merchant there, is a former representative in the Legislature, and is widely and favorably known for his activities and the integrity of his character.

Mr. Ballard was born at Bryantsville June 18, 1889, and is the oldest son of W. J. Ballard and of Eliza (Hogan) Ballard. He is of Scotch-Irish descent, and his ancestors were from that unsurpassed race of people who first settled in the valley of Virginia and then became the pioneers of the state of Kentucky.

His grandfather, the late Capt. William Jefferson Hogan, was a direct descendant of Richard Hogan, of Virginia, who brought his family to Kentucky in 1775. He settled at Harrodsburg at the same time Daniel Boone returned with his wife and daughter. Captain Hogan served with distinction in the Civil war, having received slight wounds in both the battles of Chickamauga and Murfreesboro. He was well known and one of Garrard County's best and most prominent men. He spent his entire life here, and the town of Bryantsville is a part of the large plantation originally owned by his father, John Hogan, great-grandfather of Mr. Ballard. Captain Hogan married Miss Margaret Baughman, of Lincoln County, who is a great-niece of the late Gov. William Owsley of Kentucky, also a cousin of Ex-Gov. A. O. Stanley. Captain Hogan died March 12, 1908.

Richard D. Ballard, the paternal grandfather of Mr. Ballard, was a native of Madison County, where he lived until middle life, when he moved to Garrard County and resided on his farm until his death. He was always active in politics. He was a near relative of Bland Ballard, who was appointed United States district judge in 1862, also a direct descendant of Bland Ballard who received great distinction in the Clark and Logan expedition of 1786 and in other attacks against the Indians when Kentucky was struggling for her independence.

W. J. Ballard, father of J. Hogan Ballard, was born in Madison County, in 1862, but was reared and married in Garrard County. He was a prominent business man, having been engaged in the mercantile and drug business and was always active in politics, having been deputy sheriff of Garrard County at one time. He was a democrat, and always interested in every thing pertaining to the progressiveness of his county. He died in early manhood, in 1894. At the time of his death he had received an important Federal appointment. He was the father of three children, one daughter and two sons. Miss Mayme Lee Ballard, who resides with her mother at Bryantsville, is a graduate of Hamilton College of Lexington, and during the late World war held an important position in the Treasury Department in Washington, D. C.; Richard Bryan Ballard, graduated in law from the Kentucky State University at Lexington, but preferred business to a profession and is now connected with a large wholesale house at Lexington, and makes his home in that city; and J. Hogan Ballard.

J. Hogan Ballard had a university career, but took up business rather than a profession. He attended the rural schools, a private school at Bryantsville, the preparatory department of Kentucky State University at Lexington, and in 1906 completed his junior year in the university. While there he was a member of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity.

On leaving the university in 1906 he returned to Bryantsville and became assistant cashier of the Bryantsville Bank. Two years later, in 1908, he joined in the firm of Becker & Ballard, hardware and implements, and these enterprising merchants have built up a business that draws its patronage from a large part of Garrard County. They own their store and a large and well selected stock on Main Street. Mr. Ballard has his home on Pine Crest Farm, probably the most attractive rural residence in Garrard County. The house is built of brick, and has every modern convenience, while 400 acres of land afford ample opportunity for the profitable exercise of the arts of agriculture.

Mr. Ballard served in the Legislature in the session of 1918. He was chairman of the Kentucky State University Committee, member of the Racing Committee, Municipalities Committee and Constitutional Amendments Committee. He introduced into the House what is known as the State Wide Bill, which was introduced into the Senate by W. F. Frost. This bill, passed by both Houses, was a referendum measure submitting the liquor question to popular vote, and the measure was favorably approved in 1920. Mr. Ballard is a democrat. He is active in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and was secretary of the Building Committee which completed the handsome new Bryantsville church in 1920. He is a member of Bryantsville Lodge No. 764, Free and Accepted Masons, Lancaster Chapter No. 56, Royal Arch Masons, Ryan Commandery No. 17, Knights Templar, at Danville, and Oleika Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Lexington. He was personally active in all the bond sales and other drives during the war.

On June 28, 1911, at Nicholasville, Mr. Ballard married Miss Sallie Marrs Sparks, who is a graduate of the Jessamine Institute of Nicholasville. She is a granddaughter of the late Senator E. R. Sparks, of Nicholasville and a daughter of Ed and Eunice (Hamilton) Sparks. Her mother is still living at Nicholasville. Her father, now deceased, was in the hemp business.

JAMES F. GRINSTEAD. A wholesale merchant, former mayor of Louisville and a present county commissioner of Jefferson County, James F. Grinstead has been one of the notably constructive men in the life and affairs of Louisville for over half a century.

The Grinsteads are an old Colonial Virginia family. Mr. Grinstead's grandfathers were brothers, of Virginia, and both soldiers in the Revolutionary war. After that war they brought their families and became pioneers of Barren County, Kentucky, settling at Glasgow as early as 1818. One son of these brothers, William, married the daughter of the other, Levina Grinstead. Both William and Levina were born in Henrico County, Virginia, but spent the greater part of their lives in Barren County, Kentucky, where William Grinstead followed the trade of wagon maker. Of his children James F. Grinstead was born at Glasgow, November 14, 1845.

James F. Grinstead had a common school education and lived the life of a normal youth in a Southern Kentucky village until 1866, when, at the age of twenty-one, he came to Louisville. Here he entered the employ of the wholesale grocery house of Glazebrook, Grinstead & Company. By 1871 his abilities had won him a partnership. For fourteen years he contributed to the growing volume of the firm's business as a traveling salesman, and was a member of the firm for twenty years. Mr. Grinstead in 1892, organized the wholesale grocery firm of Grinstead & Tinsley, and under his direction and from the prestige of his name the business grew and expanded until its trade relations covered all of Kentucky and several adjoining states.

Mr. Grinstead was mayor of Louisville from 1907 to 1909. It was the first administration of a republican mayor for over a decade. In later years it has frequently been referred to as setting new standards of efficient administration of municipal affairs. Mr. Grinstead was elected mayor by a majority of nearly 5,000. Two years later, as a candidate for reelection, he received more votes, though the normal democratic majority asserted itself and he was defeated. Mr. Grinstead cast his first vote for a republican president in 1868 and has done much to maintain the party organization in Kentucky. In 1917 he was elected county commissioner of Jefferson County, beginning his duties January 1, 1918. In 1919 he was reelected for a four-year term. Mr. Grinstead is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner, and is a member of the Christian Church.

Mr. Grinstead married for his first wife Miss Margaret Perkins, by whom two children were born, Martha, now Mrs. Ray, and Bailey. For his second wife he married Miss Katie Hume, and by this marriage one child was born, Carrie, now Mrs. Vaughn. On July 21, 1892, Mr. Grinstead married Annie W. Harwood, daughter of Barney M. Harwood and a native of Shelby, Kentucky. Mr. and Mrs. Grinstead have one son Durward, who married Miss Gladys Safford, of Massachusetts, and has a little daughter, Anne.

HENRY J. FARBACH, M. D. In medical circles at Louisville Dr. Farbach is best known for his work and authoritative standing as a specialist in urology.

Dr. Farbach was born at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, July 14, 1880, only son of John and Sophia (Klos) Farbach. His father, also a native Philadelphian, was an artist by profession, and died in 1883, when his son was three years of age. The mother passed away at the age of sixty-seven.

Henry J. Farbach grew up in Indiana, attended grammar and high schools in that state, and in 1907 graduated from the medical department of Center University of Kentucky later merged with and now known as the University of Louisville. While he began his career in general practice soon afterward, Dr. Farbach has spent much time in study and research at Johns Hopkins University and the University of Pennsylvania, and his practice is now almost altogether confined to clinical diagnosis and the subject of his specialized study. He is a member of the American Urological Society, and also of the Jefferson County, Kentucky State, Mississippi Valley and American Medical Associations.

In December, 1917, Dr. Farbach married Miss Julia Meredith, a native of Oldham County, Kentucky. They have two children, Sophia and Mary Ann.

JOHN LOGAN REYNOLDS, M. D. The subject of this sketch, John Logan Reynolds, M. D., is one of the experienced and highly esteemed physicians and surgeons of Webster County, Kentucky, with headquarters at Blackford, Kentucky, who has fairly won and retained the confidence of all with whom he is associated. He is scholarly, experienced and capable, and the people of this region have learned that he can be depended upon to render efficient service whenever called upon and the utmost reliance is placed on his judgment.

Doctor Reynolds was born on a farm in the eastern part of Crittenden County, Kentucky, August 7, 1862, the second son of Jeremiah Farley and Matilda Caroline (Tudor) Reynolds, both of whom were born in Kentucky. Doctor Reynolds is one of eight children born to his parents, there having been four sons and four daughters in the family. Jeremiah Farley Reynolds was a farmer, who died in 1888 at the age of sixty-five years, his wife having passed to the "beautiful beyond" in 1884, aged fifty-three years. Both were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. John Reynolds, the paternal grandfather, was born in Virginia, and his wife, Martha Farley, was born in Georgia, and they become pioneers of Kentucky at an early date. John Reynolds was a son of Thomas Reynolds, a soldier of the American Revolution, who was killed while in action during the famous battle of Cowpens. The maternal grandfather, John Evans Tudor, and his wife, Mary Crowell, were married in Georgia, her native state, although he was born in Scotland and they, too, became Kentucky pioneers. The said John Evans Tudor, while a full-blooded Scotchman, was also an American soldier during the Revolutionary rebellion, but was fortunate enough to be honorably discharged, came to Kentucky and was a pioneer school teacher during the age when the "goose-quill" was used as a pen-point. Being a progenitor of the subject of this sketch (John Logan Reynolds), he takes great pride in claiming the lineage of Scotch blood from his maternal grandfather, John Evans Tudor.

Doctor Reynolds, growing upon a farm, was educated in the common schools of the country and at Marion Academy, Marion, Kentucky, and there engaged in teaching school in Kentucky and Arkansas. Having decided upon a medical career, he became a student in the medical department of the University of Louisville, Kentucky, from which he graduated in 1898, and later took a post-graduate course at the Hospital College of Medicine, Louisville, Kentucky, in 1903. For two years following his graduation he was engaged in an active practice at Creswell, Caldwell County, Kentucky, but in 1900 came to Blackford, Webster County, Kentucky, where he has since remained. He had a general practice, is a Registered Pharmacist and is also local surgeon for the Illinois Central Railroad Company. His standing in his community and profession is unquestioned, and through his skill, efficiency and warm sympathy he has made many friends throughout the western part of Kentucky. During his spare time he has manifested a great deal of interest in lodge work, and is a Knight Templar Mason. Politically he is a "Simon-Pure" republican, religiously a Wesleyan Methodist and his inviolable rule is to practice economy, to love his work, to be kind and humanly helpful, and is striving to do all the good he can while living and thereby leave an example that may cause his works to live after him.

R. E. MORELAND is undoubtedly one of Kentucky's most widely known horsemen. As a trainer and exhibitor in the show ring his name has a national if not international prestige.

Mr. Moreland, who is proprietor of Moreland's Training Quarters at Lexington, was born in Moreland, Kentucky, in 1881. His father was also a stock raiser. His mother was Sarah Sandidge. Her father, Wyatt Sandidge was one of the largest landowners in Lincoln County and a famous horseman, one of the early breeders of horses for the show ring, and his work contributed in an important degree to the fair fame Kentucky has enjoyed as a state of fine horses. His son Charles T. Sandidge still owns the old Lincoln County homestead and is an even more celebrated breeder than his father had been.

R. E. Moreland grew up with horses and as a boy was an expert rider and trainer. For eleven years he was employed by the noted Lexington firm of Harbison, Jewell & Patterson, and eventually was accorded chief responsibilities as main trainer of this plant. In 1914 he secured his present quarters, consisting of about five acres, well covered with stables and paddocks. Here he has built up a large establishment. He buys many well bred and promising young animals, which are given a thorough course of training as saddle and driving horses. He has facilities for handling about eighty animals. These are either his own stock or those of customers to whom he sells. For a quarter of a century he has trained horses for the leading show rings of the country, and probably no one individual has carried off more honors. During the season of 1919 he had the unique honor of winning both championships at the Madison Square Horse Show, and no other exhibitor ever carried off both honors in one season. In the $10,000 stake at Louisville he carried two of the four contests. The three to five gaited saddle animals are his specialty, though he has also interested himself and has owned some winners in the trotting circuits.

Mr. Moreland is a member of the Lexington Club. At the age of twenty-seven he married Ida O'Brien, of Lexington, and they have one daughter, Marjorie.

EDWARD JOHN McDERMOTT has successfully practiced law at Louisville continuously since 1876. While his attainments and achievements are understood and appreciated by his fellow lawyers throughout Kentucky and other states, his fame has gone further abroad as a brilliant orator and as a publicist whose matured views and enlightened vision have furnished comfort to liberal and forward-looking men for many years.

Mr. McDermott was born at Louisville, October 29, 1852, a son of William and Catherine (Byrne) McDermott. His father came to Louisville when a boy, in June, 1833, from Belfast, Ireland. Catherine Byrne, his wife, was a native of Kentucky, a granddaughter of a Maryland soldier of the Revolution. She was educated in the first public school in Louisville, at the southwest corner of Fifth and Walnut streets, and at Loretto, Kentucky. Her son carefully preserves a silver medal, one of three, given her at that public school and engraved with the words: "City School, July 29, 1831. From Louisville City to Catherine L. Byrne for scholarship."

Edward J. McDermott was two years old when his father, though still young, died November 9, 1854. His widowed mother survived until March 30, 1890. Managing her estate with skill, she was able to maintain her family in comfort and give her children every advantage of religious training, refinement and thorough education. Her son, Edward John, with constant industry, made excellent use of his opportunities, gaining a silver medal in mathematics and the degree of A. B. at graduation. Then he went abroad, studying a year at Queens College, Belfast, Ireland, and a year at the University of Goettingen, Germany. He received his degree of LL. B. at the Harvard Law School in 1876. In 1913 he was given the degree of LL. D. by the University of Kentucky, and in 1917 by the University of Notre Dame, Indiana, at its Diamond Jubilee. He has delivered lectures at universities in and out of Kentucky, and a few years ago was selected to deliver at the commencement of the University of Illinois the annual oration for the Phi Beta Kappa. On a similar occasion, for a branch of the same organization, in 1881, Wendell Phillips delivered his famous oration, "The Scholar in Politics," at Harvard University.

His resourcefulness as a leader, his eloquence and his faculty of constructive thinking and planning have gained him many public honors. In 1880 he was elected to the Legislature and was presidential elector on the democratic ticket of that year. In the Legislature he passed bills reforming some abuses in the administration of justice, and was selected to deliver the welcoming speech to the great Irish leader and patriot, Charles Stewart Parnell, on his visit to Frankfort. In 1888 he was appointed, and served for several years, as United States chief supervisor of elections for Kentucky, and in 1890 sat for eight months as a delegate in the State Constitutional Convention, and wrote important parts of the Constitution. He was chairman of the committee of three that in 1892 prepared the charter for the City of Louisville, still in force. In 1894 he was chosen in a democratic primary as a candidate for Congress over two distinguished competitors. That was a year of republican victories, and Mr. McDermott was defeated at the regular election. His candidacy was regarded among liberal forces outside his home state as a hopeful sign for good government, and no less a person than the poet-editor of the Century Magazine, Richard Watson Gilder, wrote: "I hope to Heaven McDermott will win for Congress."

Edward J. McDermott

He would be for good government all along the line." From 1911 to 1915 Mr. McDermott served as lieutenant-governor of Kentucky, and for six months of that time as acting governor. He was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in St. Louis in 1916, and was one of the five directors of the Louisville Water Company from 1916 to 1920, inclusive.

Within his profession he has been the recipient of many honors. He was vice president of the Kentucky State Bar Association in 1901 and 1907, was president of the Louisville Bar Association in 1905, and a member of the executive board of the American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology in 1913-15. He has been a frequent contributor to the foremost literary and legal magazines. Before that, in 1910, he wrote a paper, at the request of the American Political Science Association, of which Woodrow Wilson was president, while also governor of New Jersey, on the subject of "Delays and Reversals on Technical Grounds in Civil and Criminal Trials," which was thereafter published simultaneously in three law journals.

Mr. McDermott has been professor of law in the law department of the University of Louisville since 1919. He delivered a lecture to the Kentucky State Medical Association on "Expert Testimony," which was first printed in the Kentucky State Medical Journal, reprinted in the American Law Review of St. Louis, and later reprinted in full in an English law journal of India. Mr. McDermott twice declined appointment by the governor to fill a vacancy on the circuit bench of the state, with assurance of election by the people for the six year term.

As a public speaker his chief distinction rests not so much on mere eloquence as the power and logic of his thinking. Nearly all his speeches represent a pioneer study of pressing public questions and, as such, they have in the truest sense been a public service. His speech on "Commercial and Political Problems from a Southern Standpoint," a plea for clean politics, a clear platform, courageous leaders and sound money, was the climax of the annual banquet of the New York Board of Trade, February 24, 1892, and, while several other men of national distinction were on the program at that dinner, Mr. McDermott was accorded the chief honors of the evening, and his words attracted the attention of Mr. Cleveland and produced an impression that helped to influence the political program on which the democratic party rode into power at the election late in that year. At the request of Mr. Cleveland, Mr. McDermott attended the Cleveland Caucus in Chicago several days prior to and during the Democratic Convention of 1892.

Another public address that attracted national attention, winning the approval of George William Curtis, the great editor of Harper's weekly, was on the subject, "The North," delivered before the Wholesale Druggists Association of America in 1891. Shortly thereafter he was also a guest and speaker at the annual dinner of the Massachusetts State Board of Trade and also of the Chicago Real Estate Board. A lecture on "Leo XIII and the Papacy," was delivered by him in many of our large cities. On the subject of "city-planning," he delivered the address, "Planning for the Future," a few years ago before the Engineers and Architects Club of Louisville, of which he was later made an honorary life member. He was selected as the speaker for Kentucky at the opening of "The Kentucky Home," at the St. Louis World's Fair in 1904, and was also a speaker at the unveiling of Lincoln's monument in Hodgenville, May 31, 1909. He conducted and won the suit in Hodgenville that made it possible for Mr. Collier of New York to acquire the property and present it to the Lincoln Memorial Association.

In 1892 Mr. McDermott was elected an honorary member of the Louisville Commercial Club for life, and in 1907 was president of the Kentucky State Development Association and presided at its sixth annual convention in Louisville. He is a member of the Pendennis Club, and was the first president of the Louisville Literary Club in 1908-09. Mr. McDermott is a Catholic and in 1910 was chosen Grand Knight of the Knights of Columbus of Louisville.

On October 15, 1895, he married Miss Susan Rogers Barr. She is a granddaughter of Col. Jason Rogers of the United States army. Her parents were John W. and Susan Preston (Rogers) Barr. The late Mr. Barr was a distinguished lawyer and for twenty years was on the bench of the United States District Court of Kentucky. Mr. and Mrs. McDermott have three children: Susan Barr, Edward J., Jr., and Catherine Watson Barr McDermott.

ALLEN R. CARTER has had a conspicuously useful part in the mercantile history of Louisville for over thirty years. The chief field of his business energies has been wholesale farm products, and he has done much to make Louisville a great central market to supply the needs of the great tributary agricultural region.

A native of Louisville, where he was born February 11, 1865, Mr. Carter is a son of James G. and Melville (Brown) Carter. His grammar school education was acquired in the ward schools of Louisville, and he was prepared for college by Prof. Jason W. Chenault. Mr. Carter graduated with the A. B. degree from Vanderbilt University in the class of 1887. He is a trustee of Vanderbilt University at Nashville. The only secret order with which he has ever affiliated is the college fraternity Phi Delta Theta, of which he is a member of the Tennessee Alpha Chapter.

For two years after leaving the University Mr. Carter was an employee of Carter Brothers & Company, wholesale dry goods. This was succeeded by the Carter Dry Goods Company, with Allen R. Carter one of the incorporators, and he has continued to be identified with the organization as a director ever since.

However, the greater part of his time for thirty years has been bestowed upon the Herndon-Carter Company, which he organized in 1889. Of this wholesale farm products concern he is president. He was vice president and general manager of the Union Cement and Lime Company, which recently liquidated its affairs.

On April 3, 1894, Mr. Carter married Miss Nora Lee Gheens. They have one child, Eleanor Allen Carter. Mr. Carter is a member of the Varsity Club of Vanderbilt University, a member of the Louisville Country Club and Pendennis Club, and a charter member of the Rotary Club of Louisville. His membership in the Society of Colonial Wars and the honor of being president of the Kentucky Society, Sons of the American Revolution, indicate his interest in American ancestry. During the World war, in 1917-18 he was chairman of the Poultry and Egg Division of the United States Food administration, serving under Fred M. Sackett, Federal food administrator for Kentucky. Mr. Carter and family are members of the Fourth Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, South. The Herndon-Carter Company has its offices at 116-118 North Third Street, and Mr. Carter's residence is at 1317 South Fourth Street.

Born in Edinburgh, Scotland, July 9, 1841, he was a child when his parents came to America and settled in Indiana. He was educated in that state, and as a young man entered the lumber trade at Madison, Indiana. In later years his interests extended to the manufacturing field in eastern Kentucky, and in 1903 he organized the W. P. CHARLES H. SEMPLE. As Kentucky has for many years enjoyed first rank as the state of fine horses it is logical to expect that many lines of business would be developed involving that statewide industry. One of these is located at Louisville for the manufacture of horse goods and equipment, specializing in girths and blankets, a business founded and conducted by the late Charles Semple and continued now as a corporation with his sons in charge.

The late Charles Semple was a native of County Cork, Ireland, where he was born March 27, 1843, and he came to America at the age of nineteen, locating at Louisville. During the war between the states he served with the rank of major on General Breckenridge's staff. Following the war he entered the hardware business with Robinson Brothers and later with Moss and Semple, and subsequently was associated with the great firm of B. F. Avery & Sons as a traveling salesman. In 1898 he bought the Louisville Girth & Blanket Mills Company, and continued that business under the same name until his death on May 1, 1903. He was a Knight Templar Mason and a democrat.

On January 15, 1873, Mr. Semple married Virginia Braxton, who was born at Richmond, Virginia, June 15, 1845. She is the mother of six children, two daughters and four sons.

In 1904 the Girth & Blanket business was incorporated as the Semple Manufacturing Company and rope and cotton twine were added to the products. Mrs. Charles Semple became president of the corporation, and her sons assisted her in the management. In 1916 Mrs. Semple retired from the office of president, and since then the officials have been Alexander B. Semple, president, Charles H. Semple, vice president and William M. Semple, secretary and treasurer.

Charles H. Semple was born at Louisville June 25, 1881, and was educated in local schools. When he was twenty-two years of age he became associated with the nationally known firm of railway contractors, Mason, Hoge & Company, and in 1904, after his father's death, he gave much of his time to the manufacturing business, and he and his brothers have continued the high reputation of the product among horsemen of Kentucky and many other states.

Mr. Semple is a member of the Episcopal Church, of the Pendennis Club and in politics is a democrat. On October 9, 1912, he married Lottie Lee Dodd, a native of Louisville. They have one son, Charles H. Semple, Jr.

REV. FINLEY FOSTER GIBSON, pastor of the Walnut Street Baptist Church at Louisville, has during an active ministry of twenty years filled a number of responsibilities in his church both as a pastor and on administrative boards.

Dr. Gibson was born at Hope in Hempstead County, Arkansas, August 29, 1876, a son of Arthur Alexander and Mattie R. (Powell) Gibson. His father, who was born at Alexandria, Louisiana, June 23, 1848, was a small child when his father died, and was practically self-educated, but through his native intellect became a man of prominence. He was a farmer in Arkansas and later for many years conducted a drug and general mercantile business at Hope. He was elected county judge of Hempstead County, and held that office eight years, being the incumbent at the time of his death, in 1912. Up to the time he was fourteen years of age he had attended school at Hope only three months each year. Later he pursued his classical studies in Ouachita Baptist College at Arkadelphia, Arkansas, and received his A. B. degree in 1897. This college in 1912 bestowed upon him the degree Doctor of Divinity. In 1900 he graduated with the degree Th. M. from the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, being then twenty-three years of age. He was ordained to the Baptist ministry the same year, and his first charge was as pastor at Malvern, Arkansas. He left there two years later to begin a long and successful pastorate of the First Church at Fort Smith, Arkansas, where he remained thirteen and a half years, from 1902 to 1916.

Dr. Gibson was pastor of the First Church at Bowling Green from 1916 to 1918. For over a year he was pastor of the Grace Street Church at Richmond, Virginia, one of the oldest Baptist churches in the South. On October 1, 1919, he accepted the call to the Walnut Street Baptist Church at Louisville.

REV. WILLIAM THOMAS PUNCH, whose work as a minister of the Catholic Church has exemplified a splendid fidelity to the church and a wonderful degree of zeal in behalf of its people and their welfare, has for the past eleven years been pastor of St. Peter's Church of Lexington, one of the oldest Catholic churches in the state.

Father Punch was born at Mount Sterling, Kentucky, July 17, 1871, son of Patrick and Johanna (Murphy) Punch. His father, only child of Patrick and Sally (Brown) Punch, was born in the City of Limerick, Ireland, in 1842, and was six years of age when his parents came to America by sailing ship, landing at New Orleans and soon afterward establishing a home at Paris in Bourbon County, Kentucky. Here Patrick, Jr., grew to manhood and at the age of nineteen joined the Confederate army as a member of the Hamilton Guards, subsequently the Second Kentucky Infantry in the famous Orphans Brigade. He was twice wounded and twice taken prisoner, and was in the war until the close. On his return to Paris he engaged in contracting, and for many years was a builder of turnpike roads in various parts of Kentucky. Subsequently he moved his home to Mount Sterling. There he served as chief of police, succeeding James Young, for some time was county jailer, and during the first term of President Cleveland served as deputy United States marshal of Kentucky. About a year before his death he retired on account of ill health, and died February 10, 1901. He was an active democrat and a Catholic, and was distinguished by a wonderful amount of poise, coolness and courage, and while an officer of the law he never carried weapons. His wife, Johanna Murphy, was born in County Kilkenny, Ireland, in 1850 and is still living. Of their five children two died in infancy, while John died in 1909, while serving as deputy warden of the Kentucky State Prison. Richard E. was a merchant at Mount Sterling, and died on June 22, 1920. William Thomas is the youngest of the family.

William Thomas Punch acquired his early education in the public schools of Mt. Sterling, at St. Mary's College in Marion County, and took his theological work in St. Mary's Seminary at Baltimore, Maryland. He was ordained at Covington, Kentucky, June 29, 1899, by Rt. Rev. Camillus P. Maes. For three years and three months he was assistant pastor of St. Patrick's Church in Covington, and was then assigned as the first Catholic priest to do missionary work in fifteen counties of Eastern Kentucky, with headquarters at Beattyville. He built a church at Beattyville, and gave a splendid impulse to church activities in many communities. After his missionary labors he became pastor of St. Mark's Church at Richmond, and when the church edifice was burned he erected the present beautiful stone structure. Father Punch came to Lexington in 1909 as pastor of St. Peter's congregation. St. Peter's parish was established in 1837 and in 1912 Father Punch carried out the notable celebration of the Diamond Jubilee. He has done much constructive work, including the purchase of property and the erection of a new St. Peter's school building, and the parish is now looking forward hopefully to the erection of a church edifice that will properly accommodate this old and prosperous congregation.

GARRETT LEE WITHERS has achieved success and prominence in his profession as a lawyer within a comparatively brief period. It is a congenial profession, one in which his talents find their best expression.

Mr. Withers is a native son of Webster County and most of his professional work has been done at Dixon, the county seat. He was born on a farm June 22, 1883, a son of Francis Gooch and Sarah (Imboden) Withers, also natives of Webster County.

Reared on a farm, Garrett Lee Withers attended local schools, the Academy at Providence, and began the study of law in the Southern Normal University at Bowling Green. He also studied law privately, and five years of his early life were devoted to the profession of teaching. He was admitted to the bar in 1908, and in 1909 was elected Circuit Court Clerk. After filling that office four years he resigned to look after his law practice, and later was associated with the late Roy M. Baker, one of the prominent young lawyers of Dixon. Mr. Withers is now a member of the firm Rayburn & Withers.

He has been interested in several democratic campaigns in his county and state, and was a candidate for presidential elector in his congressional district in 1920. In 1912 he married Miss Mabel Hammack, of Webster County, and they are the parents of two children.

EDWARD K. COFFMAN. The Coffman family represented by Edward K. Coffman, in the real estate and insurance business, has been identified with the community of Slaughters, Kentucky, for several generations, and the men of that name have always been noted for unusual business ability and high character in community affairs.

Edward K. Coffman was born at Slaughters January

25, 1879, a son of Richard Franklin and Anna (Ogden) Coffman. His grandfather, John Coffman, was born in North Carolina January 8, 1805, came to Kentucky when young, and married a native of this state, a Miss Cobb, who died January 8, 1880, at the age of seventy-five. John Coffman died at Slaughters September 29, 1884. Richard F. Coffman was born near Slaughters March 4, 1837, and died there in 1889. He spent all his life in that community and for many years was a tobacco dealer. He was a very popular citizen, and his fine character and success in business doubtless were responsible for his popular title as major, by which he was widely known. He and his wife were active members of the Methodist Church and he was a democrat. Major Coffman's wife was born in Virginia and died in 1918, at the age of seventy-five. Her father, Major William H. Ogden, was a native of Louisiana, was architect of the state capitol of Tennessee, and also became prominently identified with the pioneer history of Webster County, Kentucky.

He was reared in Slaughters, attended the common schools of the town, and for a number of years he and his brother William were associated in the tobacco business. For the past fifteen years Mr. Coffman has conducted an extensive real estate and insurance business, and is a citizen who has always accepted opportunities to cooperate with movements for the common welfare.

In 1898 he married Miss Mayme Young Brooks, daughter of the well known farmer and banker of Webster County, W. C. Brooks. Mr. and Mrs. Coffman have four children. He is a democrat in politics, a Master Mason and an Elk, and a member of the Methodist Church.

LEXINGTON DRY GOODS COMPANY? In the past dozen years no one institution has done more to extend the fame of Lexington as a wholesale and jobbing center than the Lexington Dry Goods Company, importers and jobbers of dry goods, notions and furnishing goods. The business was organized by C. L. Thompson and S. B. Royster, and the joint effort and constant supervision of these two men have been responsible for the substantial and satisfactory position the company enjoys in commercial and financial circles today.

The company opened for business February 1, 1907, with a capital of $100,000. At present the company has a surplus of nearly $400,000. During the first year the volume of sales aggregated $75,000. The business for 1919 and 1920 ran well over a million dollars per annum and throughout the history of the company there has been evidence of special vigor and good management in every department. This concern has about fifty employes on its payroll, including fourteen commercial salesmen covering all of Central and Eastern Kentucky, going over the line into Virginia and competing even with the normal territory of Louisville and Cincinnati wholesalers. The company has about 2,000 customers. It has given these customers a real service, prompt and reliable, with large quantities of goods bought immediately at the factories of origin, and it also does a large importing business from Europe and the Orient.

In 1907 the company erected a four-story and basement building 50 by 130 feet, at 249-253 East Main Street, and contemplates an addition of 20,000 square feet of floor space, which will give them nearly 55,000 square feet to accommodate the increasing stock of dry goods, notions, house furnishing goods and other wares.

S. B. Royster, secretary and treasurer of the company, was a successful banker before he became a wholesale merchant. He was born in Shelby County, Kentucky, spent his early life on a farm, learned merchandising by clerking in a store and left that to become cashier of the Beard Deposit Bank, now the Crestwood State Bank. He helped organize the bank, was its cashier for thirteen years, and was one of the principal owners of that very prosperous financial institution.

Mr. Royster is a son of William Goodloe Royster, a native of Richmond, Kentucky, who died at the age of fifty-eight. His grandfather, Mitchell Royster, was a son of Littleberry Royster, who came to Kentucky from Virginia. Mitchell Royster was a wagonmaker by trade and married Mourning Shelton Goodloe. William Goodloe Royster married Mary Bryan, descended from the great Kentucky character Col. William Bryan, an officer of the Revolutionary war who was connected with one of the first Kentucky settlements at Bryan Station. Mrs. William G. Royster died in 1895, at the age of sixty-nine.

C. L. Thompson, president of the Lexington Dry Goods Company, is a nephew of Mr. Royster. He spent thirteen years on the road as a traveling salesman and then secured the cooperation of Mr. Royster in establishing the Lexington Dry Goods Company, and since then they have constituted a well working team of merchants who have kept their business growing every consecutive year.

Mr. Royster is also a director in the Fayette National Bank. He is a member of the First Baptist Church. His wife was Lily Forwood, of Oldham County. They have one son, Samuel Bryan Royster, Jr., a student in the University of Kentucky at Lexington.

GEORGE JACKSON. A man who rises to a position of esteem in his community for his character, business integrity and all around ability after a youthful struggle to make his way is always an object of admiration, and an example of this is George Jackson of Webster County, one of the sterling agriculturists of that section, and he has lived practically in one community from birth to the present time.

He was born June 9, 1857, a son of Thomas and Martha (Townsend) Jackson. His father was a native of Ireland, came to this country in early life, and was a carpenter by trade. He died when about sixty-five years of age. He was twice married. His wife, Martha Townsend, was born in Person County, North Carolina, in 1818. Her father, John Townsend, was one of the pioneers of Webster County and lived to be a very old man. George Jackson is one of a family of four brothers and two sisters and he also has a half-sister.

He acquired only a limited education and had to fight his own battles almost from the time his father died, being a child at the time. He worked for others, then did farming for himself, contended with all the vicissitudes that beset Webster County farmers during the past half century, and is now proprietor of a large and valuable place of 206 acres. For five years Mr. Jackson also served as superintendent of the Webster County Poor Farm.

He is a democrat and has been married twice. First, on June 9, 1891, to Mary Jenkins. She was the mother of four children: Willie, born January 27, 1893, who was in the Great Lakes Training Station during the World war, but had no opportunity to get into service overseas; Cordie, born September 17, 1896; Mamie, born December 22, 1900, and died December 31, 1905; and John, born September 16, 1903.

Mr. Jackson was later married, January 27, 1910, to Sallie Mooney, and by this union there are three children, Ivy, born July 25, 1912, Stanley, born October 9, 1915, and Brown, born October 13, 1917.

GEORGE LAND and brother Headley are proprietors of a well known business establishment at Lexington as dealers in coal and building supplies. Mr. George Land has been interested in this line for about twenty-eight years, and for the past nine years his brother Headley has been his active partner and associate. The business was started on a very small scale in a location not convenient to railroad tracks. For the past twenty years the firm has been at its present location on West Short Street, near the Louisville & Nashville Railroad where they have ample yards and trackage. This is a business that has grown and developed on the basis of good service, and without any of the familiar devices of boosting and advertising.

George Land was born on Jack's Creek Pike, twelve miles south of Lexington, February 22, 1869, and his brother Headley was born at the same farm May 6, 1874. They are brothers of the well known Lexington banker Charles Land. Under the name of Charles Land will be found elsewhere in this publication a complete record of this old and prominent family of the Blue Grass section.

While he has been a coal dealer at Lexington for almost a generation, George Land was long prominent as a breeder and trainer of horses, and as such became widely known in Kentucky and elsewhere. He was associated with the firm Rowland and Land, his partner being Nelson H. Rowland. They exhibited their horses in the show rings all over the middle west, including the Kentucky State Fair and the Missouri State Fair, and had some very fine horses, some of which commanded fancy prices. George Land while he has been out of the business for a number of years still retains a great interest in Kentucky thoroughbreds.

George Land was for two terms commissioner of public safety at Lexington, serving at different times. He is a member of the Kiwanis Club. He has one daughter, Effie, an employee of the Phoenix and Third National Bank of Lexington. Headley Land married at the age of thirty-eight Miss Leah H. Clem, and has one son Anthony.

W. B. TALBERT, who grew up on the noted Inwood Stock Farm formerly owned by his father, has for over thirty years been active in business at Lexington as a wholesale and retail dealer in grain and feed supplies. He is proprietor and general manager of the Blue Grass Commission Company. Nearly thirty years ago he acquired this business, then known as the old Wolf & Harting Malt House, located on Upper Street between Fifth and Sixth. This site was later sold to the Board of Education, and in 1905 the present site was acquired on Rose Street. The D. F. Wolf Malting Company was incorporated in 1889, but in 1892 the business was reorganized and the name of the corporation changed to the Blue Grass Commission Company. For a quarter of a century it was a corporation, and since the charter expired has been continued under the same name, though under the sole ownership of Mr. Talbert. The plant occupied grounds 90 by 200 feet on Rose Street and the Chesapeake & Ohio tracks, has private switch track, and the business represents an investment of $150,000. The company handles grain and feed both wholesale and retail, ships large quantities of grain to Eastern Kentucky, and also puts out a widely patronized line of feed stuffs manufactured in the mills at Lexington. The business is one requiring about twenty employees, and for many years has been under the personal direction and management of Mr. Talbert.

Mr. Talbert was born in Lexington June 13, 1869. His father, Dr. A. S. Talbert, was a dentist by profession, followed that work for some years, and later was a noted breeder and trainer of trotting horses, and the colts from his farm always commanded premiums in the market. The Inwood Stock Farm, which has been sold since his death, was on the Versailles Pike, two miles from Lexington. He died there in 1883, at the age of sixty-three. Doctor Talbert was a native of Indiana and moved to Lexington in 1845. He married Charlotte Brownell, of Rhode Island. She died in 1917, at the age of eighty-seven.

W. B. Talbert has spent most of his life in Lexington. He attended the Kentucky State University and finished his education at the Moses Brown College, Providence, Rhode Island, where he graduated with the class of 1887. He had a period of foreign travel in Europe during 1888-89, and in the latter year returned to Lexington and began the career which has been steadily in one line as a wholesale grain and feed merchant. He is also a director of the Fayette National Bank, and has held that office for eleven years.

Mr. Talbert served one term as a member of the Lexington Board of Education. He is a member of the Board of Commerce. At the age of twenty-two he married Miss Minnie Clark, daughter of John S. Clark. His son, W. B. Talbert, Jr., now associated with his father's business, was graduated from Princeton University in 1920. While in college he was for two years in the army service, a lieutenant, having entered the First Officers Training Camp at Fort Benjamin Harrison.

EDWARD CLARK. The name Clark for many years had prominent associations in the wholesale grocery business at Lexington. Edward Clark in his early years was active in that business with his father, but through the greater part of his active career has handled an extensive business as a general insurance and real estate agent, dealing to a large extent in his own property.

His father was the late Joseph Clark, who was born in Estill County in 1837. He grew up as a farm boy and in 1856 came to Lexington, having only $1 when he got off the stage. Without money or friends he sought his chance and opportunity as a city worker, and for a time was employed in the dry goods store of Allen, Plunkett & Company on Main Street. He swept out the store, slept in a room overhead, and was busy with some task in the service of his employers and for his own advancement all his waking hours. He remained with that one firm for ten years, being advanced in responsibility and income. He then joined J. B. Wilgus in the wholesale grocery business, and by capitalizing all his savings he was able to buy out the Wilgus interests in the early '70s. It was the first wholesale grocery establishment in Lexington. Joseph Clark continued it under his direct management five years, when his brother, Maj. John S. Clark, became his partner. After three years Alex Pearson bought Major Clark's interests, and the firm was Pearson & Clark until 1899, when the business was sold to Bryant, Hunt & Company and is still a well known organization in Lexington commercial affairs. It was the genius of Joseph Clark as a business man that built up this house, and out of the labors of many years he acquired a fortune. He was a director of the Fayette National Bank and helped organize the Security Trust Company and served as its president until his death. He died in 1900. He also acquired a large amount of valuable real estate, but was not inclined to public affairs though an enthusiastic republican. He was a member of the Centenary Episcopal Church. His brother, Major Clark, early gained distinction as a soldier, and subsequently was owner of the present Coldstream Farm and contributed to its fame as a center for thoroughbreds. Alex Pearson, who also for a number of years was connected with the business, subsequently was president of the Lexington Hydraulic Works, and lived in Lexington until old age. He died in Massachusetts in 1920.

The wife of Joseph Clark was Kate Lewis, who was born in Fayette County in 1842 and died in 1882. Her father, Samuel Higgins Lewis, was a prominent farmer of Fayette County. Her brother, Theodore Lewis, was for many years county clerk and was grandfather of the present county clerk of Fayette County. The old Lewis home was a farm on the Nicholasville Pike. Of the children of Joseph Clark and wife five survive: Edward; Otis, a resident of Denver, Colorado; Kate, wife of George K. Graves; Mary, Mrs. Horace G. Knowles, of New York City; and Ruth, wife of Isaac Sutton, a Philadelphia attorney.

Edward Clark, who was born at Lexington March 16, 1871, was reared and educated in his native city and as a young man began work for the firm of Pearson & Clark, and continued with the business until it was sold. Since then he has been in real estate and insurance, conducts a largely patronized general agency for all classes of insurance, and is president of the Lexington Real Estate Board. He is a member of the Union Club, the Board of Commerce, and in politics is a republican.

At the age of twenty-five Mr. Clark married Miss Nancy Beckner. Mrs. Clark is an active member of the First Presbyterian Church.

Mrs. Clark is a daughter of the late William M. Beckner, who was one of the most distinguished of Kentucky's lawyers. He was born in Nicholas County, Kentucky, in 1841, and when he was six years of age his father, Jacob L. Beckner, who had been a merchant, died, leaving practically no property to his widow. W. M. Beckner was greatly indebted to the courage and wisdom of his mother, who played a noble part in rearing her children. He largely educated himself, subsequently attended an academy at Maysville, and also Center College at Danville. He studied law while at Maysville and in 1865 located at Winchester, where he soon became prominent as a leader in the democratic party, was elected and served as county attorney and county judge, established, owned and edited the Clark County Democrat, and built up a practice that made his name widely known all over Central and Eastern Kentucky. He was an authority on land titles and a brilliant orator and advocate. In 1880 he was appointed a member of the Prison Commission, and secured much needed reforms in prison administration. He was appointed a member of the Railroad Commission in 1882 and in 1889 was elected to the Constitutional Convention. In 1894 he was elected to serve a brief unexpired term in Congress. He should be remembered for his life-long devotion to the raising of educational standards and the improvement of schools of all kinds. He was also a leader in such pioneer undertakings as good roads and the building of public utilities in his home city of Winchester. He disagreed with his party during the free silver controversy, and subsequently became an outright republican, and endured much partisan bitterness in his later years. He died at Winchester March 14, 1910. His second wife and the mother of his children was Elizabeth Anne Taliaferro, daughter of Maj. John Taliaferro and related to the distinguished Taliaferro family of Virginia. Judge Beckner's son Lucien P. Beckner is one of the prominent lawyers of Winchester.

JEREMIAH ROGERS MORTON was a Confederate soldier, one of "Morgan's men," and at the time of his death, more than forty years after the close of the war, was one of the oldest, ablest and most popular members of the Lexington bar, and widely known all over Central Kentucky for his services in his profession, on the bench, and in the cause of citizenship.

Judge Morton was born in Clark County, Kentucky, February 10, 1842, and died at his home in Lexington, December 18, 1908, in his sixty-seventh year. His home all his life was either in Clark or the neighboring Fayette County. He acquired a good education, and in early manhood, in the fall of 1862, he enlisted in the Confederate army, becoming a soldier in Company A of the Eighth Kentucky Cavalry, attached to the command of General Morgan. He served throughout the war with courage and honor, doing his part bravely on the battlefield, in the camp and in prison, since he was twice captured and once made his escape and was once exchanged. He came out of the army with the respect, admiration and affection of all his comrades. The war over, he studied law in the law school of Kentucky State University, and thereafter his home was in Lexington, though both as an attorney and as a judge he became well known and his abilities appreciated in all the county seats of his district and at the state capital.

In 1883 he was elected judge of the Fayette Circuit Court to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge B. F. Buckner. He was reelected and continued on the bench for nine years, until 1892. He then voluntarily retired and resumed his private practice, continuing with distinguished success until the time of his sudden death.

Many sincere tributes were paid him as a man, lawyer, judge and public servant. To quote one of them: "As a lawyer he was able, learned and fully equipped for service. As a judge he was painstaking, just, upright and without suspicion of partiality or unfairness, and as a citizen and friend was always ready to do his part, meeting his lot and bearing his burdens in the conflict of life. In all of these capacities he was an exemplar of patience, courage, integrity and capacity, and was possessed of a most kind and lovable temperament, which endeared him to all."

The role he played as a lawyer and citizen was well described by his old time friend, Dr. R. J. O'Mahoney, as follows: "About the time that Judge Morton took up the practice of the law a number of able young men also became members of the Fayette bar. Among them was John T. Shelby, Harry Buford, Phillip Johnston, R. A. Thornton, George Darnall, Robertson of Maysville, John W. Yerkes of Boyle and others. The Fayette bar was already distinguished as the most brilliant in Kentucky numbering among its members F. K. Hunt, Madison C. Johnson, James B. Beck, John B. Huston, R. A. Buckner, the Breckinridges and the Kinkeads, masters of the science of law and oratory. For a man to achieve prominence in such a company was no ordinary accomplishment, but with courage and high aspirations Jere Morton rose to every occasion, availed himself of his opportunities and won success. Added to his own high ideals were the encouraging examples of the men who, like himself, had won fortune and fame from a beginning like his own. Jere Morton from the inception of his career followed lines already traced by returned Southern soldiers. He entered politics and, impossible as it may appear, elevated them at every point of contact. Serving first as city attorney, he succeeded Col. W. C. P. Breckinridge as county attorney. This course led him at last to the high office of circuit judge, the responsibilities of which he deeply appreciated, and whose duties he fearlessly and ably discharged.

"In the practice of the law Judge Morton was eminently successful. He became a leader among his people, his voice being always to defend the right, or what he conceived to be right, and in the unhappy controversy which upset the politics of the state as by an earthquake and tore life long friendships to shreds Judge Morton espoused that cause which appealed to him as representing political and personal honesty. To do this he was obliged to forsake the association of old party friendships and endure contumely and political ostracism. He knew what to expect, for he had fought for principle before. But he lived down the cynical asperity of that period and when people came again to their senses he resumed his place as their leader, counsellor and friend. It is safe to say that no movement in the last forty years for the benefit of the people of Lexington and Fayette County was inaugurated and carried successfully through without Judge Morton's assistance. For such work he was always ready with head and heart and hand. By such means and by his own unsullied life he has made an impress upon this community among whose people his memory will be long revered."

Some of the work he did outside the strict limits of his profession was referred to by Judge Mat Walton, who said: "It has been my pleasure to be associated with Judge Morton in a number of institutions. I served with him for probably a dozen years as a member of the Board of Commissioners of the Eastern Kentucky Asylum for the Insane, and I know that the surviving members of that board will say now that during all that long time we were guided by his wisdom, and by his discernment in the management of the insane. There was no member of that board as particular to see that the superintendent and his assistants, and all the attendants, were careful, and discharged all their duties to the unfortunate wards in their hands as Judge Morton.

"He has for many years been one of the most distinguished members of the Board of Curators of Kentucky University. The board has always relied upon his wisdom and good judgment in solving many difficult problems it has had to solve during the last ten or twenty years. I know that that board now, like this bar, will deeply lament his loss and ever revere his memory.

"Judge Morton as a companion had few, if any, equals. It has been my good fortune to be with him on a number of occasions, especially on what to my mind is the noblest of all sports—that of fishing; and I do not believe that ever a more genuine sportsman cast a line than my lamented friend. I know that of all the disciples of Sir Izaak Walton none ever enjoyed the sport more than he, or was fonder of it, and even when he was busy in the court he would so manage his engagements that he might spend a few hours in that fascinating pastime."

Judge Morton was for many years a sincere Mason and one of the prominent members of Lexington Lodge No. 1, Free and Accepted Masons. For thirty years before his death he enjoyed the happy companionship of his marriage with Miss Mary C. Gratz, a daughter of Kentucky's distinguished journalist, Henry Howard Gratz, for nearly forty years editor of the Kentucky Gazette. Mrs. Morton is still living in Lexington, at 231 North Mill Street. Judge Morton was also survived by one son, Bernard Gratz Morton.

CHARLES Z. CAMBRON. In the course of an active life of over thirty years Charles Z. Cambron has been known in his native county of Union as an enterprising merchant and business man, and for the past twenty years as an equally successful lawyer and leader in local affairs.

He was born on a farm in Union County, August 12, 1864, a son of James Madison and Ann D. (Wathen) Cambron, also natives of Union County. His paternal grandfather, Raphael Cambron, was born in Maryland, and was a child when his parents came West and settled in Washington County, Kentucky. From Washington County Raphael Cambron removed to Union County about 1842, and in early years was a country school teacher and later a farmer. James Madison Cambron took up the vocation of farming after he reached mature years, and was still busy in making provision for his family when he died at the early age of thirty-five, leaving his widow with five children. She survived to the age of seventy-four, and by a second marriage had other children.

Charles Z. Cambron lived in the environment of a farm to the age of seventeen. Up to that time he had only the advantages of the local public schools. He was ambitious for education and for the improvement of his talents, and in order to acquire more learning he worked his way through St. Mary's College in Kentucky. After leaving college he spent about a year in the Uniontown Bank. Then, upon the advice of his uncle, the late Logan Cambron, he left the bank to take up the dry goods business as a member of the firm Jones & Cambron. This was a well known mercantile business in Uniontown from 1885 until 1898. Mr. Cambron had for a number of years cherished an ambition for a professional career, and while a merchant he took up the study of law, and on January 20, 1900, was admitted to the bar of Henderson. He began practice in Uniontown, and for a number of years has enjoyed a reputation as one of the able lawyers of Western Kentucky. For twenty consecutive years he served as city attorney. He has been a life-long democrat and is a member of the Catholic Church.

On November 17, 1885, early in his career, Mr. Cambron married Miss Mary Susan Byrne. She died September 5, 1908, twenty-three years after their marriage, leaving five children. On November 8, 1913, Mr. Cambron married Miss Cecelia D. Spencer. They have two children.

CARL PARVIN COTTINGHAM, M. D. A physician and surgeon with talents and education broadened by years of diversified practice, Doctor Cottingham is one of the ablest members of the medical fraternity in Union County, and is the son of a physician who earned a high degree of honor in his profession in Henderson County, Kentucky.

The Cottingham family was established in Western Kentucky by his grandfather, Isham Cottingham, who came from Virginia and for many years conducted a large farm and plantation near Dixie in Henderson County. He was a man of prominence in public affairs, serving in the State Legislature. Doctor Leven Cottingham was one of his family of five sons and two daughters, was reared on the farm, was educated at South Carrollton and graduated in medicine at the University of Louisville. For twenty-five years he performed the arduous duties of the physician and surgeon at Robards in Henderson County, and died there at the age of fifty-five. Doctor Leven Cottingham married Nancy McMullin, who was born in Henderson County and is still living. Of the nine children two are deceased.

Carl Parvin Cottingham was born at Robards in Henderson County September 26, 1882, grew up in his native town and attended the village schools, prepared for college in the Vanderbilt Training School at Elkton, attended the State Normal School at Bowling Green, and in 1904 graduated in medicine at the University of Louisville. For two years he practiced at Providence, but for nearly fifteen years has handled a busy routine as a professional man at Uniontown. He is a member of the County, State and American Medical associations, is a Master Mason and a democrat in politics. In 1905 Doctor Cottingham married Miss Margaret Zora Mattingly, of Uniontown.

EDWARD A. WISE is owner and proprietor of the Southern Tent and Awning Company at Lexington, manufacturers of tents, awnings, tarpaulins and all specialties in duck, also dealers in duck, sail duck, wide duck, awning stripes and cordage. Mr. Wise took this local industry when its chief ambition was to serve the demands of a limited trade in Lexington. Fully half of its business now comes from outside the state. This interstate business has been developed largely as a mail order proposition. Over the State of Kentucky two traveling men handle the orders, and there are also two local salesmen at Lexington. The company has a large and well equipped plant at 159-165 East Short Street, and the pay roll runs between $12,000 and $15,000 a year.

During the World war they established a plant separate from the local plant for the purpose of taking care of some of the requirements of the Government. In this particular plant was manufactured for the Government such articles as tents, truck covers and paulins, to the amount of over half a million dollars.

The business was established originally as the Lexington Tent & Awning Company. After several years it was changed to the Southern Tent and Awning Company, and has been so conducted for fifteen years. Mr. Edward A. Wise is a native of Cincinnati, but during his infancy his parents moved to Kentucky. His father was a native of Frankfort, Germany, and his mother of Switzerland, and they were married in this country. His father spent thirty years as a merchant at Midway in Woodford County, where he died at the age of sixty-two. The widowed mother survived him more than twenty years, to the age of eighty-four.

Edward A. Wise grew up at Midway, was educated in the common schools there and from boyhood was trained to business in his father's store. The old store, established half a century ago, is still continued by his brother John, and is one of the oldest business concerns in Woodford County. Edward A. Wise after a long and thorough apprenticeship as a merchant at Midway opened a business of his own at Henderson, and was there for ten years. Then for three or four years following he was in business at Versailles, and from there came to Lexington to take charge of the Southern Tent and Awning Company, and his personal enterprise and resources have been largely responsible for the broad development and prosperity of that local concern.

Mr. Wise has never participated in politics, has sought no public office, is active in the Board of Commerce and the Rotary Club, and is a stockholder in several other business enterprises. He is a member of the Central Christian Church.

At the age of twenty-nine he married Frances Mason, of Henderson, Kentucky, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John O. Mason, who are still living in that city and recently celebrated the sixty-sixth anniversary of their wedding. Her father for a long period of years was a well known tobacco dealer. The four children of Mr. and Mrs. Wise are: Edward, Jr., who finished his education in the State University, is a civil engineer with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad at Louisville; Thomas Mason is a graduate of the Lexington High School and associated in business with his father; Charles G. is a graduate of the Lexington High School, and is an employe of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company; Anna Louise is still in high school.

THOMAS D. CASSIDY, a resident of Lexington since 1897, is one of Kentucky's oldest and foremost coal operators, and has given the closest personal supervision to his extensive coal mining interests for upwards of forty years. The Cassidy Coal Company, of which he is president, has been one of the leading corporations in the Kentucky mining districts for thirty-eight years. He is also president of the Bell-Jellico Coal Company.

Mr. Cassidy was born in Fleming County, Kentucky, July 1, 1856. He is a great-grandson of one of Kentucky's most distinguished pioneer characters, Michael Cassidy. Collins' History of Kentucky says that Michael Cassidy was a native of Dublin, Ireland, and being refused school books he ran away from home and hid in the hold of a vessel and was not discovered until the ship was two days from port. On arriving in Virginia he was bound out to the age of twenty-one to pay his passage money. He came overland to Kentucky as a companion of Daniel Boone and was one of the original settlers at Bryant Station. Many stories have been told of his prowess as an Indian fighter. He was one of a party of eight which went to Blue Licks to get a supply of salt. They were set upon by Indians, and all of them killed except Michael. He was so small of stature that he was thought to be a boy, and his captors tied him to a stake. In order to give one of the youthful Indians experience in barbaric warfare a knife was given him and he was instructed to cut loose the captive and scalp him. When his bonds fell Michael Cassidy knocked the Indian boy into the camp fire and ran toward the river, but as he ran a tomahawk broke his jaw. On reaching the bank he jumped into the water and swam underneath until he reached the shelter of some bushes, where he remained all day and finally reached home safely. This Indian fighter enjoyed a high position in public affairs, and for twenty-eight years was a member of the State Legislature, dying while in that office. His death occurred at the age of sixty-two. At one time he shot a friend, Sparrs, of Lexington. Sparrs in visiting his friend disguised himself as an Indian and before the mistake was discovered Cassidy had shot him. Michael Cassidy is buried in the Brick Union Cemetery. His son Frank lived all his eighty-four years in Fleming County, and other sons lived in the same community.

Andrew Jackson Cassidy, a grandson of the pioneer and father of Thomas D. Cassidy, spent the greater part of his life in Fleming County and died at Lexington at the age of sixty-four. His brother Michael M. Cassidy was a well known citizen of Mount Sterling who died in advanced years. Another brother was W. H. Cassidy, who for thirty-five years was a member of the mercantile firm of Ford & Cassidy at Lexington. A great-grandson of a brother of Michael Cassidy was a former mayor of Lexington. A grandson was Gilbert A. Cassidy, for many years a leading attorney at Flemingsburg.

Andrew J. Cassidy spent his active life as a farmer. He married Luella Darnell, daughter of Thomas Darnell. The Darnells were an old family of Fleming County and were neighbors of the Cassidy's.

Thomas D. Cassidy spent his early youth on his father's farm in Fleming County. He attended common schools and Smith's Commercial College at Lexington. For many years he had his home at Mount Sterling, until he moved to Lexington in 1897. The Cassidy Coal Company is one of the oldest mining organizations in the Jellico and Elkhorn coal fields. This company employs a thousand men and has four mines and about 5,000 acres of lease and owned lands. The company has maintained stores, schools and other facilities in its mining communities, and has also built several branch railroads to the coal fields. The Bell-Jellico Company is also an old mining corporation, operating in the Jellico district on about 1,800 acres. Mr. Cassidy for ten years had some extensive lumber manufacturing interests in Kentucky, and still owns a mill that cuts 200,000 feet annually.

An extensive business of this kind is of itself a contribution to the public welfare, and Mr. Cassidy has found neither time nor inclination for public office. He votes as a democrat, and is a member of the Walnut Street Christian Church of Lexington. In 1881 he married Miss Nannie Tilton, of Carlisle, Kentucky. The son, Tilton J. Cassidy is secretary and treasurer of the Cassidy Coal Company. The other son, William A., who died in 1917, at the age of twenty-one, was educated in public schools and the State College, and for two years was employed in the office of the Cassidy Coal Company.

EDWARD HENRY LONG. A long and busy life, spent largely in one community in Western Kentucky, industry and capable service rendered in every relationship, is a brief epitome of the history of Edward Henry Long of Sturgis, now retired.

Mr. Long was born at White Sulphur Springs in Union County July 28, 1848. His parents, Albert Gallatin and Maria (Crawley) Long were born and married in Virginia, and some of their children were born there, and when they came to Kentucky they settled in Union County, at White Sulphur Springs. Of their seventeen children Edward H. is the last survivor.

When he was a small child his parents moved to Caseyville, where he grew up, and attended the common schools, and early in life took up farming, a vocation which he has never deserted, though some other interests have bulked large from time to time. In 1884 he also engaged in the manufacture of brick and tiling at Sturgis, and made his business one of the important industrial assets of the town for nearly forty years before he retired. Mr. Long has been a successful business man, earnest and energetic in all his undertakings and has earned the prosperity he enjoys. He lives in a fine residence on his farm, just a mile west of Sturgis.

He has never sought offices, though he has held several minor positions, is a democrat and a member of the Christian Church. When about thirty-six years of age he married Miss Augusta Talbot, who died sixteen months later. Her only child, Augusta, is also deceased. In 1888 Mr. Long married Virginia L. Calloway, daughter of John M. Calloway. She was born in Virginia. Her father came to this state just after the Civil war and located in Union County, Kentucky. Mrs. Long is a member of the Presbyterian Church. To their marriage were born seven children, and the four still living are Mary Eleanor, Elizabeth, Aranna and Edmond Randolph.

EARL LEWIS FOWLER who was with the Marines during the World war, resigned as county attorney of Union County to get into the service, and is now filling an unexpired term in the same capacity. He is one of Morganfield's most brilliant young attorneys, and has had some exceptional experiences for a man of his age.

Mr. Fowler was born January 5, 1894, on a farm near Waverly in Union County, a son of Thomas D. and Elizabeth (Compton) Fowler. His great-grandfather, Thomas Fowler, was the founder of the family in Kentucky, coming from Maryland and settling at Winchester. The grandfather, James Fowler, was a native of Maryland and was a boy when brought to Kentucky. Soon after his marriage and when his son Thomas was two years of age, he moved to Union County. Thomas D. Fowler has given his active life to agriculture, and he and his wife are still living on the old Harold farm in Union County. They have two children, Earl L. being the only son.

Growing up as a farm boy and beginning his education in country schools, Earl L. Fowler had ambitions which a country environment could not satisfy. He attended high school at Corydon and graduated in law with the LL. B. degree from Kentucky State University in 1915, at the age of twenty-one. He was admitted to the bar at Georgetown in the spring of the same year. Before beginning practice he went East and entered Yale Law School, from which he received the Master's degree in law. Another year he spent as law clerk in the office of a prominent Evansville, Indiana, attorney, William P. Wiedreich.

Mr. Fowler opened his law office at Morganfield in the spring of 1917 and in November of the same year was elected county attorney. This office he resigned in the spring of 1918 to enlist in the United States Marines, and three months later was sent overseas with the Fifth Brigade. He was in France ten months, being stationed at various places, but without getting into front line duty. For four months after the signing of the armistice he was one of the American soldier students at the University at Grenoble, France.

Returning to the United States, Mr. Fowler was discharged August 12, 1919, at Quantico, Virginia, and soon returned home and began the task of rebuilding a law practice. At the resignation of the incumbent of the county attorney's office he was appointed to fill out the unexpired term. Mr. Fowler is a democrat, a Master Mason and Knight of Pythias and a member of the Christian Church. In 1919 he married Miss Mary Crome, of Albion, Illinois.

ERNEST B. ELLIS. Recent years have marked a gratifying tendency to give honor where honor is due with the recipient alive to appreciate it. The lesson and inspiration of such an act have an obvious value and influence above any of the most sincere tokens of former memorials. A pleasing demonstration of this tendency was an interesting ceremony of December 7, 1920, when a life size portrait of Maj. Ernest B. Ellis was formally presented to the Fiscal Court of Fayette County and ordered hung on the walls of the county courtroom as an inspiration to future generations. This act was performed in commemoration of the valued public services and noble deeds of charity of one of Lexington's most prominent philanthropic, useful and beloved citizens, who during an eventful life of fifty-nine years has filled numerous positions of trust and service and because of his noble generosity in aiding various civic and charitable movements for the good of the community has won the esteem of all classes and is affectionately referred to as "a friend of the needy." The portrait, painted by the noted American artist, Miss E. Sophonisba Hergesheimer, was presented to the Fiscal Court by Col. Thomas M. Owsley, an old friend and admirer of Major Ellis.

Ernest Brennan Ellis, named for a former clerk of the Fayette County Court, was born December 7, 1861, youngest and only survivor of five children, three sons and two daughters. His parents William H. and Zillah (Lackey) Ellis were natives of Clark County, Kentucky, and the father was a carpenter and contractor, a republican in politics, a member of the Christian Church, while the mother was a Baptist. The Ellis ancestry goes back to Wales. The great-grandfather of Major Ellis was Capt. William H. Ellis who on coming to this country first located in Virginia and then at an early date came to Kentucky. At that time, four miles from Lexington, Bryan Station was doing duty as an outpost for the protection of the scattered inhabitants against Indian raids. While Captain Ellis lived in Clark County the Indians surrounded this fort, permitting only the women and children to leave it and retire in safety. Captain Ellis and a company of Rangers hearing of the situation hurried to the scene and relieved the besieged men. In honor of this event the Daughters of the Revolution have erected a tablet in honor of the captain. Major Ellis was only five years of age when his father died, and his mother died twelve years later.

An interesting review of the life and achievements of Major Ellis is found in the address delivered to the County Court by former Congressman W. P. Kimball, whose words are used in the following paragraphs:

"At the age of ten years by picking up old nails and pieces of barrel hoops in a contracting plasterer's yard here in Lexington he procured the sum of ten cents by selling the same to a local junk dealer. With the few cents thus acquired he embarked in the business of a newsboy, buying five copies of the Lexington Daily Press, which was then published at the corner of Short and Market streets, now occupied by the Lexington Leader, of which company Major Ellis is now secretary and treasurer.

"Finding the business of selling newspapers unprofitable he accepted a position with Wright & McMeekin, butchers, on West Short Street near Broadway, for whom he delivered meat in a basket to their various customers. Prior to this time he attended the public schools of Lexington for two short sessions. After leaving Wright & McMeekin he sought a position at the Phoenix Hotel in a minor capacity, which he held from 1875 to 1879 when he received a promotion.

"The old Phoenix was burned in May, 1879, and when it was rebuilt he reentered the service of the hotel under the management of Charles F. Simonds as assistant steward and keeper of the storeroom. The duties of this position not being to his liking, he sought a position with Treacy & Wilson as clerk in their livery stable and compiler of trotting horse pedigrees. Later on he was employed by Maj. P. P. Johnston and became a bookkeeper and writer of the column known as 'Turf News.'

"In 1886 he entered into partnership for the conduct of a grocery business. After a short period of time he purchased the interest of his partner and conducted the grocery alone for thirteen years. During this period he was appointed a member of the Police and Fire Commission of Lexington by Judge Frank A. Bullock. Upon the adoption of the present charter of the city of Lexington he was reappointed by Hon. H. T. Duncan, Mayor, and continued in that position during his administration, and afterward under the administration of Mayor Joseph B. Simrall.

"He resigned as commissioner in 1898 and organized the Home Construction Company, of which he was general manager and the dominant spirit. His associates in this venture were the late Maj. John M. Bullock and Thomas Smith. The Home Construction built the first mile of water bound macadam road ever built in Kentucky. It was the first company to successfully oil a macadam road in America. Out of these experiments has grown the numerous types of asphalt road construction now generally used in this country. Mr. Ellis was connected with this company for fifteen years, when he retired.

"During this period he became vice president of the Lexington Water Works Company, which position he now holds, and also a director in the City National Bank, and was retained as director when the bank merged as the First National Bank. He is now a director of the First & City National Bank. Mr. Ellis was until recently a director in the Phoenix Hotel Company.

"During the World War Mr. Ellis was associated with Mrs. Madge McDowell Breckinridge, recently deceased, and others, in establishing the Blue Grass Sanatorium for the cure of tuberculosis. He was the largest contributor to the establishment of that institution, his subscription amounting to five thousand dollars. During the war he was also adviser of the United States Board of Exemptions, which covered sixty-seven counties in this State. He was also an active member of the Council of Defense in this county and assistant chief of the American Protective Association. He has always been a generous contributor to all charitable causes and during the coldest winter within the recollection of the oldest inhabitants, 1917-18, fed at his own expense in this city over four thousand hungry men, women and children."

In politics Major Ellis is an independent democrat, and has served Fayette County frequently and with great efficiency as a member of the Board of Tax Supervisors, usually as chairman of the board. April 8, 1890, he married Mary L. Owings, who was born and reared in Lexington, the daughter of Elkaniah and Mary (Thurman) Owings, and related to the Francis family, one of the most noted in Kentucky and Missouri.

While his fame rests secure in his home county, his pioneer work in demonstrating the successful use of oil on water-bound macadam roads to make them dustless and waterproof might properly give him a place among inventive Americans of his generation. Some further interesting details of his work in this direction were recently published in the Lexington Leader, from which the following paragraphs are taken: "It was recalled today that Major Ellis was the pioneer of America in road oiling. The first successful test of oil on waterbound macadam was made on the Newtown road in 1901. The work was done by the Home Construction Company, of which he was manager. In addition to overcoming popular prejudice against an innovation he persevered in the face of opposition by directors of his own company. In order to make the experiment, he bought an oil spreader in California and had it shipped to Lexington."

ton. The cost of this machine alone was several times the amount of the first contract.

"Major Ellis predicated his conviction that macadam roads could be rendered dustless and made weather-proof on experiments with Ragland oil, which contained 44 per cent asphaltum. Experiments made elsewhere had been with oils having paraffine for a base and these experiments were failures. His calculations not only were verified, but the success of asphalt oil here was the beginning of asphalt highway construction in the United States.

"Highway engineers from all over the country, and State and City Commissions came to inspect the oiled road system. The entire general assembly of Ohio made up one notable delegation. The landscape architect "Wizard" Keppler, who laid out the World's Fair grounds at St. Louis and was the designer of noted park systems in the East, made a special trip to Fayette. One of the strongest features of the oiled road advanced by Major Ellis was the curbing of disease, particularly tuberculosis, through elimination of dust, and this proven theory has received wide recognition among health crusaders.

"Following local experiments, Major Ellis organized a company with headquarters in Cincinnati which conducted operations on a country-wide scale. It oiled the Park roads of Pittsburgh, Boston, Cincinnati and many other cities, and made the highways of Ohio and Indiana monuments to a new era in good roads achievement."

The Ellis Drinking Fountain, which in a letter to the County Court and city commissioners on June 4, 1921, Mr. Ellis proposed to build and present, was officially dedicated November 12th of that year. Signor Bertoli of Louisville was the sculptor, and the total cost of the fountain was $10,000. On one face of the pedestal is a bronze tablet with the following inscription:

"Presented by E. B. Ellis to the City of Lexington and Fayette County, 1921."

Mr. Harry Giovannoli, who formally presented the fountain, and Judge R. C. Stoll, who accepted it, each used the opportunity to express some of the grateful appreciation felt by all citizens of Fayette County for the generous purpose and fruitful activity that have been a characteristic of Mr. Ellis' citizenship in the community. The editorial comment of the Lexington Leader on the gift is as follows:

"The beautiful drinking fountain given to the people of Lexington and Fayette county by Ernest B. Ellis was formally presented yesterday to the judge and members of the fiscal court and the mayor and city commissioners.

"This fountain, located on Main Street, directly in front of the court house, is at once an ornament to the thoroughfare and a blessing to the passerby. The service which this drinking fountain will render will be unusual and unique. Instead of the tepid and unsatisfying beverage which one usually finds flowing from drinking fountains the world over—the hotter the day, the warmer the water—the fluid from the Ellis fountain will be cooled automatically in all seasons by a hidden refrigerating apparatus, thus assuring a refreshing draught to every seeker, man, or dog, or bird.

"This gift from Mr. Ellis is characteristic. It springs from his sympathy, often displayed, with all humanity, and is one of the many benevolences at his hands which will keep his memory green in the minds of his fellow-citizens long after he and those who were present at the dedication Saturday afternoon have passed away."

REV. OSCAR M. HUEY, superintendent of the Louisville Baptist Orphans Home, was pastor of a number of churches in Kentucky, but his work as a minister has been distinguished chiefly by the zeal and success of his efforts in evangelical work and in the constructive work of building up membership and extending the institutional benevolences of his denomination.

Rev. Mr. Huey was born in Boone County, Kentucky, May 24, 1862, a son of George W. and Sallie (Williams) Huey. His father who was born in the same section of Kentucky May 2, 1824, gave all his active life to his farming interests in Boone County. He was a devout Baptist and a democrat in politics. George W. Huey, who died January 27, 1889, married Miss Sallie Williams, who was born in Gallatin County, Kentucky, February 22, 1841, and died in August, 1915. Oscar is the oldest of their four children, three of whom are still living.

Oscar M. Huey received his early educational advantages in Union and Boone counties and attended Georgetown College and the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. His first regular pastorate was at Erlanger, and successively he was pastor of churches at Carrollton, Stanford, Sommerset, Crescent Hill and Louisville. He early showed especial interest in evangelical work and held many meetings with various churches, his abilities and broadening experience bringing him increasing usefulness in this field. For this work over 5,000 united with the Baptist denomination besides 1,200 that united with the Sommerset Church while he was stationed there, and where he built a $40,000 church. He has been superintendent of the Louisville Baptist Orphans Home since 1919. During 1917-18 he was chairman of the Executive Committee of Long Run Association and for five years was a member of the State Missionary Board and was president of the Baptists Ministers Conference one year.

Mr. Huey has had the invaluable assistance for many years of his devoted wife, Mrs. Huey being equally interested with him in missionary efforts, and has done much to promote this branch of work among Baptist women. Mr. Huey and Miss Katherine Kennedy were married March 11, 1885. She was born at Walton in Boone County November 25, 1865, being second of four children, three of whom are still living, born to James W. and Elizabeth (Dorman) Kennedy. Her mother died in August, 1918. The father, who is still living in Cynthiana, Kentucky, was a merchant in Boone and Grant counties, and as a democrat was twice honored with election as representative to the Legislature. He is also a Baptist. Mr. and Mrs. Huey have four sons: Lee M., who married Miss Mable Childers and resides in Corinth, Kentucky; Samuel L. who married Miss Margaret Scott, and lives in Lexington, Kentucky; George W., of Detroit, Michigan, who married Miss Louise Marshall, and Edward, who married Miss Louise Wilson and resides at Eminence, Kentucky.

REV. E. Y. MULLINS, D. D., LL. D., is president of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary at Louisville. This office, one of great responsibility and of influence affecting Baptist organizations all over the South, has been held by him for over twenty years. Doctor Mullins is a southerner by birth, received part of his education in the institution over which he now presides, but his early work as a minister was in Kentucky and Maryland. Later he was pastor four years in Newton Centre, Massachusetts. He returned to the South in 1899 to accept his present position.

He was born January 5, 1860, in Franklin County, Mississippi, son of Rev. S. G. and Cornelia B. (Tillman) Mullins. His parents were both devout Baptists, and his father held pastorates of that church for many years in Mississippi and Texas. His maternal grandfather, Stephen Tillman, was a prominent Baptist layman in Mississippi and Texas, and also had a record of service in the Mississippi Legislature.

Rev. Dr. Mullins after the common schools entered the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, later was a student in Johns Hopkins University at Baltimore and finished his theological studies in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. His first pastorate was the Harrodsburg Baptist Church at Harrodsburg, Kentucky. This church he served four years, and was then called East and enjoyed a successful seven years pastorate in the Lee Street Baptist Church of Baltimore. While a pastor at Baltimore he was chairman of the City Mission Society, one of the editors of the Baltimore Baptist and also a correspondent of the New York Examiner.

His next post of duty was with the Foreign Mission Board in Richmond, Virginia, becoming associate secretary of the board in 1895. From there in 1896 he was called to the pastorate of the First Baptist Church of Newton, Newton Centre, Massachusetts. The three and a half years he spent there constituted a time of busy labors and service outside his immediate pastorate, since he acted as a member of the executive committee of the American Baptist Missionary Union, whose headquarters are in Boston, and was on the examining committee of Newton Theological Institution.

Doctor Mullins was called to the presidency of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in June, 1899. In addition to the burdens of administration that devolves upon him as president he has been the recipient of a great number of honors and responsibilities from his church and has also accepted calls to special service in connection with civic and moral movements in his home city and state. He is a former president of the Baptist Young People's Union of America.

Doctor Mullins, while perhaps best known for his work in the practical ministry and educational departments of his church, has also found time for authorship, his published works including a number of titles of which the following are perhaps the best known: Why is Christianity True, The Axioms of Religion, Baptist Beliefs, Commentary on Ephesians and Colossians, Freedom and Authority in Religion, The Christian Religion in its Doctrinal Expression, Spiritualism a Delusion, Talks on Soul Winning, the Life in Christ. In May, 1921, Doctor Mullins was elected president of the Southern Baptist Convention at its annual meeting in Chattanooga, Tennessee.

In 1886, at Louisville, Doctor Mullins, then a young minister, married Isla May Hawley, daughter of A. W. Hawley. Mrs. Mullins shares in her husband's literary tastes, and is author of several books with wide circulation. To their marriage were born two sons, one of whom died at the age of seven and the other in infancy.

HARRY STANTON PERKINS has been associated with the great Louisville wholesale and manufacturing institution of the Belknap Hardware & Manufacturing Company for nearly thirty years. He comes of a family of notable business men and manufacturers.

He was born at Coldwater, Michigan, November 17, 1868, son of William D. and Lavina H. (Wemple) Perkins. His maternal grandfather James Van O. Wemple, is said to have manufactured the first threshing machine in the West, at a little factory on Sangamon Street in Chicago. Through his mechanical genius he became associated with the old head of the famous Westinghouse family. He also founded the Town of Wemple, which is now included in the City of Rockford, Illinois. William D. Perkins was born at Danbury, Connecticut, in 1826, and as a young man went to Chicago, and he was perhaps the first traveling salesman out of Chicago in the clothing business, and later for many years was a clothing manufacturer, continuing active in that business until his death, at the age of eighty-nine. During the '50s and '60s he also directed some of his capital and enterprise to quartz milling in the Pike's Peak region of Colorado. He was a member of the Episcopal Church and a republican in politics. His wife was born at Fonda, New York, in 1831, and died at the age of thirty-one. They had three daughters and one son, and three of the children are still living.

Harry Stanton Perkins, the youngest of these children, was reared in Coldwater, Michigan, and in 1887, at the age of nineteen, entered the wholesale hardware house of A. F. Seeberger & Company at Chicago. Mr. Perkins acquired a thorough knowledge and a broadened acquaintance in hardware circles of Chicago, and in 1892 came to Louisville to join the W. B. Belknap Hardware Company, and has been with that corporation ever since, now the Belknap Hardware & Manufacturing Company. Mr. Perkins is a director and second vice president of the company and has charge of all the purchasing departments. For the past ten years he has also been second vice president of the Kentucky Manufacturers Association and is a past vice president and president of the Merchants Association of Louisville.

He is a republican, a member of the Louisville Country Club and the Pendennis Club. On October 30, 1895, he married Eliza Yandall Singleton, second of the three children of Col. Otho R. and Rhoda (Peter) Singleton. Her father was a colonel in the Confederate army, and for thirty-two years represented his district in Congress, including his home town of Canton, Mississippi. Mr. and Mrs. Perkins have three children named William David, Henry Singleton and Virginia Cary.

FOSTER HERBERT EMBRY. For a number of years the name Embry has had an important significance in Kentucky and elsewhere as representing the facilities of livestock markets. The older generation of Kentucky stockmen knew the late Henry F. Embry as one of the pioneers in the shipping and export trade, and his son, Foster Herbert Embry has extended his relationship until he is an official in stockyards organizations in many of the leading cities of the Middle West.

The late Henry F. Embry was born at Richmond, Kentucky, in 1858, supplemented his public education by a course in Center College at Danville, and as a young man began buying and shipping livestock to the island of Cuba. In 1877 he established the firm of Tatum & Embry Company, one of the pioneer livestock marketing firms in Kentucky. They built the stockyards at Wichita, Kansas, at Havana, Cuba, Peoria, Illinois, Evansville and Lafayette, Indiana, and Dayton, Ohio, and also Cleveland, Ohio. Henry F. Embry, who continued active in business until his death in 1909, was a democrat and was affiliated with Preston Lodge No. 281, Free and Accepted Masons at Louisville. He married Laura C. Baker, who was born in Jefferson County in 1861 and is still living at Louisville. Of her eight children, five sons and three daughters, six survive.

The second in age is Foster Herbert Embry, who was born at Louisville August 5, 1882, and received his early training in the schools of his native city. He was only fourteen when he became actively associated with his father, and he practically grew up in the livestock business. In 1909, at the death of his father, he and his uncle, G. W. Embry, incorporated their business, his uncle being president and Foster H., vice president. Foster H. Embry is also president of the Dayton Union Stock Yards Company, is president of the Stock Yards of Evansville, Indiana, the Stock Yards at Lafayette, the Bourbon Livestock Commission Company, is vice president and director of the Peoria Stock Yards, a director in the Union Stock Yards at Montgomery, Alabama, and is a director of the Stock Yards Bank at Louisville.

Mr. Embry is affiliated with Crescent Hill Lodge No. 280, Free and Accepted Masons, with the Grand Consistory of the Scottish Rite and Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine. He is a captain in the Louisville Boat Club, is an independent voter and a member of the Christian Church. On October 7, 1909, he married Miss Margaret Moses, of San Francisco, California.

EDWARD STOCKTON JOUETT. Great responsibilities assumed and duties well performed in the course of his active career distinguish Edward Stockton Jouett as one of the prominent lawyers and citizens of the state. Mr. Jouett for the past ten years has been a resident of Louisville, and is now the head of the legal staff of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, holding the position of vice president and general counsel.

Jouett is a family name associated with some of the best traditions of old Virginia and Kentucky and is of Huguenot origin, the first Jouetts locating in North Carolina and later in Virginia. They were staunch patriots during the Revolution, and about the close of that war some of them came into pioneer Kentucky.

The Louisville lawyer was born at Winchester, Kentucky, October 21, 1863, a son of Edward Stockton and Kate (Reed) Jouett. His father was a man of prominence, who died in 1893. His mother is still living in the original family home at Winchester at the age of fourscore. Edward S. was the third among five children, of whom only one survives, Beverly R. Jouett, a successful lawyer of Winchester.

Edward Stockton Jouett had splendid advantages of education and early training. He attended private schools at Winchester, and pursued both his classical and law studies at the University of Virginia, graduating in the law school in June, 1885. From the time of his admission to the bar he practiced at Winchester and throughout Central Kentucky. Soon after he began practice he was elected successively city attorney, county attorney of Clark County and city judge of Winchester. His time, however, was soon taken up with an unusually heavy private practice, and in 1912 he removed to Louisville to become general attorney for the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company. He was general solicitor in charge of the Law Department for the Government during the war. Upon the return of the property to private control he was made assistant general counsel, and in 1921 was promoted to his present position.

Mr. Jouett is a democrat, a member of the Pendennis Club, Louisville Country Club, Transportation Club, Rotary Club, Lawyers Club and Conversation Club. For many years he has been active in the laymen's work of the Christian Church, and is the president of the State Convention of that church. He is also vice president of the state Young Men's Christian Association.

On September 28, 1887, Mr. Jouett married Miss Annie Ecton, a native of Winchester, Kentucky. They have three children, Beverly Jouett Davis, Flournoy Jackson Jouett and Virginia Jouett Winn.

COL. LUDLOW F. PETTY, chief of police of Louisville, has devoted many years to public affairs, having served as postmaster, collector of internal revenue and head of the police department of Louisville, Kentucky.

Colonel Petty was born in Mercer County, Kentucky, July 11, 1874, being the eldest of seven children born to Charles W. and Elizabeth (Colter) Petty. His father was born in Anderson County, Kentucky, May 10, 1847, and was reared and educated there. The greater part of his time was spent in farming, but for many years he was connected with the internal revenue service, and was engaged in this work at the time of his death, May 22, 1904. Colonel Petty's mother was born in Washington County, Kentucky, October 3, 1854, and died December 24, 1914. As a girl she attended the schools of Anderson County and completed her education at Midway, Kentucky.

Colonel Petty attended the schools of Anderson County, and when fifteen years of age received a certificate as teacher. He taught for one term and attended Prof. John C. Willis' private school at Lawrenceburg, Kentucky. He acquired the fundamentals of business during his employment in stores at Shelbyville and Lawrenceburg and as a traveling salesman.

In 1898 he was appointed postmaster of Shelbyville by President William McKinley, and by re-appointment held that office until he resigned in 1909 to become private secretary to United States Senator William O. Bradley, and clerk of the committee of which Senator Bradley was chairman. In 1910 he was appointed collector of internal revenue by President William Howard Taft, with headquarters at Louisville. Colonel Petty is one of the leading republicans of Kentucky. During 1916 he was chairman of the Republican Campaign Committee of Kentucky, and in 1917 was appointed chief of police of Louisville, serving during the war period, when problems were many and difficult. One of the acts of his regime has been the establishment of a successful police training school.

In 1895 he married Miss Jennie Logan, a native of Shelbyville, Kentucky, third among the six children of Alexander and Charlotte (Bell) Logan.

Colonel and Mrs. Petty had two children, Elizabeth and Charlotte. The latter died in infancy. Elizabeth, who died in 1919, was the wife of Robert E. Hannay, Captain U. S. A. Her surviving daughter, Katherine Donaldson, now three years of age, makes her home with Colonel and Mrs. Petty.

THOMAS STEVENSON PETTIT. Ceaselessly to and fro flies the deft shuttle which weaves the web of human destiny, and into the vast mosaic fabric enter the individuality, the effort, the accomplishment of each man, be his station that most lowly or one of influence and power. Into the great aggregate each individuality is merged, and yet the essence of each is never lost; being the angle of its influence wide-spreading and grateful, or narrow and baneful. In his efforts he essays biographical writing finds much of profit and much of alluring fascination when he would follow out, in even a cursory way, the tracings of a life history, seeking to find the keynote of each respective personality. One cannot contemplate the life record of the gentleman whose name forms the caption to this paragraph without exciting genuine admiration, for his career has not only been successful in a material way, but, what is of far more importance, it has been characterized by a depth of character and strict adherence to principle which has called forth the esteem and confidence of his contemporaries.

Thomas Stevenson Pettit, of Owensboro, is a native son of Kentucky, having been born at Frankfort on December 21, 1843, and he is a son of Franklin Duane and Elizabeth (Zook) Pettit. His father was born at Fredericksburg, Virginia, of French-born parents, his father, who was an ardent admirer of the Napoleon, having fled to the United States after Napoleon's army was defeated at Waterloo, settling at Fredericksburg, where he was an educator, as he had been in France, being a man of letters and literary attainments. Franklin Duane Pettit as a young man went from his native town to Frankfort, Kentucky, where he met and married Elizabeth Zook, who was of Pennsylvania Dutch parentage. At Frankfort Franklin Duane Pettit and Thomas B. Stevenson became owners and publishers of the Kentucky Farmer. Mr. Pettit died rather early in life, and not long afterwards his wife also passed away, the subject of this sketch therefore being left an orphan when but a boy, being but ten years of age when his mother died. At that tender age he was thrown upon his own resources, and from that time on made his own way in life. The boy's first opportunity to make a definite start in life was found in the print shop, where he showed remarkable aptitude, for while yet in his teens he had become an expert in all of the mechanical work of the printing office. His only educational advantages were confined to the schools of Frankfort and a brief attendance at Georgetown College, but in the printing office, which has aptly been termed, "the poor man's college," he absorbed a fund of general information which made him an equal of many who had greater opportunities for academic study. In 1864, when he was not yet twenty-one years old, he went to Owensboro and purchased the Monitor, a newspaper, from a Mr. Woodruff, in which transaction he incurred an indebtedness of $1,500. This obligation he was not enabled to meet until after years, for when he assumed the role of a newspaper publisher and editor he changed the politics of the Monitor and ably supported the policies and measures of the democratic party, freely and fearlessly criticising the republican party and its war policy. His writings on such topics brought down upon him the wrath of certain government authorities and resulted in his arrest on November 17, 1864, by order of Gen. Stephen G. Burbridge, of the Federal army. He was "banished to the Southern Confederacy," under the general charge of being "notoriously disloyal," and was sent under escort to Memphis and there transferred across the lines. The following months, until May, 1865, Mr. Pettit spent in traveling within the Confederate lines, and then, the war being over, he returned to Owensboro, to find that his printing office had been destroyed by the Federal military authorities.

Mr. Pettit at once went to Cincinnati, there to arrange for the purchase of a new printing outfit. Telling his story there in a plain and straightforward manner, together with his own pleasing personality, Mr. Pettit made the friendship of a Mr. Allison, manager of a printer's equipment company, who extended him more credit than he asked for and induced him to take a much better and more complete outfit than he had planned. The result was that Mr. Pettit returned to Owensboro with ample equipment for a printing office, far better than had ever before been in Owensboro. The outfit included a Gordon and a power press, this being the first Gordon press to be set up in this locality.

Now, fitted out for publishing a first-class newspaper and for high-grade job printing, Mr. Pettit began anew his business career, though heavily in debt. He revived the Monitor, his old newspaper, and made it very early popular paper, increasing its circulation by means of popular editing and the publication of interesting articles reviewing his travels in the southland while in banishment, which were followed by able articles from the pen of the then distinguished Thomas C. McCreery, afterward United States senator from Kentucky. Business success attended Mr. Pettit's efforts and eventually he was enabled to wipe out his indebtedness, including the old debt he owed Mr. Woodruff. The Monitor soon became known as one of the brightest newspapers in Kentucky and Mr. Pettit was recognized as one of the ablest newspaper editors and publishers of the state. He was the first man to establish a successful newspaper in Owensboro, and continued to publish the Monitor for many years. He afterward sold, when it became the property of Urey Woodson, who changed it to the present Owensboro Messenger.

As the editor of a successful and influential democratic newspaper Mr. Pettit very early was drawn into the field of politics. In 1868 he was elected assistant reading clerk of the House of Representatives, which position he held for six years, and was then appointed private secretary to Governor James B. McCreery. Later he resigned this position to accept that of reading clerk of the National House of Representatives at Washington, where he quickly won the distinction of being the best reading clerk who had ever held that position. His strong voice and clear and distinct enunciation enabled him to read so as to be heard from all parts of the house, and he also had a ready perception and quick understanding, which enabled him to read intelligently documents which he had never seen before. His services in the House ended when the republicans regained the ascendancy. In 1869 President Johnson had appointed Mr. Pettit collector of internal revenue for the Second District, which position he held with ability until the close of President Johnson's administration.

In the fall of 1882 Mr. Pettit was defeated by J. B. Clay, of Henderson, as a candidate for Congress by less than 150 votes, after an exciting race. Perhaps Mr. Pettit has attended more state conventions of his party than any other man in Kentucky, and was for years, time after time, elected secretary of the conventions. In this capacity he rendered the democratic party valuable services, which have been appreciated and highly complimented. He was one of the secretaries in the national convention which nominated Grover Cleveland the first time for President, and four years later he served in the same capacity, and was also selected as a member of the official notification committee to inform Cleveland and Thurman of their nominations for President and Vice President.

Mr. Pettit was elected a member of the Kentucky Constitutional Convention of 1891-2, and his services rendered in that capacity were perhaps the most conspicuous and helpful ever rendered by him in a public capacity, for he was a leader in that convention, advocating such reforms as the secret official ballot, the taxing of corporations like individuals, and the two-thirds verdicts of juries in civil cases. He was afterward elected by an overwhelming majority, not as the regular democratic nominee, but as an independent candidate, as representative from Daviess County in the General Assembly, there to put into effect and practical operation the provisions of the new Constitution. His election in this instance was in the face of strongest opposition in his county and followed one of the most exciting and bitter contests ever known in the state. The independency of his candidacy naturally estranged him from the organized democratic party and he became in 1895 the people's party candidate for governor. He made a strong campaign, but was not successful of election. However, his candidacy so divided the democratic party as to elect a republican governor. Mr. Pettit has never lost interest in politics, keeping at all times in close touch with political conditions and the course of public thought and opinion.

He has always been a man of strong convictions and had the courage to stand up for them. His actions have ever been the result of careful and conscientious thought, and when once convinced that he was right no suggestion of policy or personal interests could swerve him from the course he had decided upon. And this has been one of the secrets of his strength with the people, who have reposed the utmost confidence in his integrity and sincerity.

For many years Mr. Pettit was interested in the clearing and developing of extensive land areas in the vicinity of Pettit, Daviess County, which village was named in his honor, and here he developed fine farm lands, much to his credit as a man of enterprise and foresight. He has given financial support to a number of business enterprises in Owensboro and has been successful in the accumulation of a fair share of this world's goods.

Religiously Mr. Pettit has for many years been an earnest member of the Presbyterian Church, and is also a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, in which order he has received distinctive preference, being a past grand master of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, and the imposing Masonic Temple in Owensboro stands as a monument to his enterprise and fraternal fidelity. He has always been its president.

Mr. Pettit has been twice married, first in 1870, to Margaret Blair, the daughter of J. H. Blair, who in his day was a prominent merchant of Owensboro. To this marriage was born a son, Harvey Blair Pettit, a graduate of Rose Polytechnic Institute at Terre Haute, Indiana, and now an electrical engineer, residing in Chicago. Mrs. Pettit died in June, 1913, and in September, 1916, Mr. Pettit was married to Miss Alice Frakes, of Owensboro.

RUSSELL JOHNSON PIRKEY, of Louisville, is one of four brothers, the other three being physicians and surgeons, two of them well known in the profession at Louisville. His own career has been that of a minister of the Baptist Church, and for several years he performed an interesting service for his church, the Government and moral efficiency in general in the Panama Canal Zone. Mr. Pirkey is now pastor of one of the largest churches in Kentucky, the Broadway Baptist Church.

He was born at Winchester, Virginia, September 8, 1883, a son of Stephen and Fanny M. (Johnson) Pirkey. His father, who was born at Strasburg, Virginia, August 10, 1852, was an able educator. He received his schooling in Virginia, where he taught school, and afterward became identified with school work in the State of Missouri, and for twenty-four years was a superintendent of schools in that state. Later he entered the service of the New York Life Insurance Company, and was agency superintendent for its great middle department, with jurisdiction over the agents in Missouri, Kentucky, Indiana and West Virginia. He retired from this work two years before his death, which occurred March 15, 1916. He was a member of the Christian Church, and as a democrat twice refused important nominations for office in Missouri, being tendered the nomination for Congress and also that of state superintendent of schools. Fanny M. (Johnson) Pirkey was born near Oklahoma, Mississippi, May 18, 1856, and died December 18, 1918. The oldest of the five sons died in infancy. Russell J. and his twin brother, Dr. Everett L. live at Louisville, the latter a physician. The other two brothers are Dr. Marion Ely, of Louisville, and Dr. Frank Wood, now an interne in the New York Eye and Ear Institute at New York City.

Russell Johnson Pirkey attended for a time Transylvania University at Lexington, and completed the course of the schools of Law, Journalism and Bible College at the University of Missouri at Columbia, graduating in 1910. After doing religious work as state evangelist, district secretary and pastor of another denomination for some years, for doctrinal reasons he joined the Baptist denomination and accepted the pastorate of the First Baptist Church at Roswell, New Mexico, going from there to the First Baptist Church at Longview, Texas. In 1917 he was called from pastoral work to the duties of superintendent of missions in the Panama Canal Zone. During the World war he had charge of the religious work among the soldiers and marines, and also volunteered as a chaplain in the Regular Army, receiving a commission as first lieutenant and subsequently being commissioned chaplain and finally major, attached to the staff of Brig.-Gen. R. M. Blatchford, commander in chief of the Panama Canal and military governor of the Canal Zone. He was also department recreation and morale officer. While on the Zone he was appointed state director of minute men, committee of public information for Canal Zone, and at the request of the President of the Republic of Panama organized the Four-Minute Men of that Republic.

Chaplain Pirkey received his honorable discharge in February, 1919, and then returned to the United States and was pastor of the First Baptist Church at Monroe, Louisiana, until taking up his duties with the Broadway Baptist Church of Louisville. Mr. Pirkey received his first degrees in Masonry in Missouri, and while on the Panama Canal Zone became a thirty-second degree Scottish Rite Mason and a member of the Mystic Shrine. He is a member of the college fraternity Beta Theta Pi.

On August 10, 1908, he married Martha Linton Winn, a native of Columbia, Missouri. They have two children: Russell Johnson and Mary Frances.

JOHN HENRY HANLY is a member of the Lexington business firm John Henry Hanley & Brother, coal and feed merchants. They began this business as a firm in 1898 and have kept the service up to a high point of efficiency and a steady and wholesome growth. Their business is entirely retail, and they have a complete and adequate organization for handling feed and coal.

Both brothers are natives of Fayette County, Kentucky, and sons of Thomas H. Hanly, who was born in County Roscommon, Ireland, and married Mary Doyle. Soon after their marriage they came to America and settled in Kentucky, where the father spent a long and active life as a building contractor and farmer. His home was on Newtown Pike, where he died in 1901, at the age of seventy-five. His widow survived him until 1912, and was then past eighty. They were very devout and regular communicants of St. Paul's Catholic Church, and reared their children in the same faith. These children consisted of six in number, two daughters, Mary and Fanny Hanly, and four sons: Dennis J.; Thomas P., who for twenty-four years has been a member of the Lexington detective force; John Henry; and James A., who is an inspector for Fayette County in road and other public improvement work.

John Henry Hanly was born in 1868. He has taken much part in democratic politics, though not as a candidate himself. He has been a precinct committeeman. He married Mary Holmes, daughter of E. A. Holmes, of Lexington. They have one daughter, Gertrude, now attending school.

Dennis J. Hanly married Lizzie Algier, of Lexington. Their family consists of five children: Thomas R., who was in the overseas service in France and is now a student in a Government school; George A., who was also in the service several months and is now office man with the firm of his father and uncle; Mary Joseph, Anita Frances and Catherine Sevelle.

WILLIAM HENDERSON SOAPER is a business man of the City of Henderson who to an unusual degree has created his opportunities and made his enterprise count in a commercially constructive manner. He is one of the most popular citizens, and is widely known among his friends and business associates as "Pete" Soaper.

He was born in Henderson January 29, 1876, and is a son of Robert C. and Anna (Pringle) Soaper. His parents had five children, all of whom are still living. Mr. Soaper attended the schools of Henderson and is a graduate of the University of the South at Sewanee, Tennessee. Following his college career he became office manager of a Henderson coal mining company. He then engaged with a modest capital in the transfer and hauling business, but gradually concentrated his facilities in the unique business of gathering, buying and shipping mussel shell, an industry which has grown and developed until Mr. Soaper is one of the largest if not the largest dealer and handler of this product in the country. Besides this business Mr. Soaper for five years or more has been interested in tobacco, operating a loose leaf floor at Henderson.

He is a democratic voter, affiliated with the Elks and is a member of the Episcopal Church. In 1906 he married Miss Lucy H. Sneed, of Henderson, and they have two children.

LONDON CABELL FLOURNOY. By reason of his long continued and useful service as a lawyer, business man and public official, it is doubtful if Union County has within its borders a citizen more favorably known and esteemed than Landon Cabell Flournoy of Morganfield.

Judge Flournoy came to Kentucky nearly half a century ago in the role of a teacher. He was born at Farmville, Prince Edward County, Virginia, March 4, 1850, a son of William Cabell and Martha Watkins (Venable) Flournoy, life-long residents of Prince Edward County, the former a French Huguenot and the latter of English ancestry. William C. Flournoy was a Virginia lawyer and died at the age of fifty-two. His wife survived him many years, passing away at the advanced age of eighty-nine.

Landon C. Flournoy was reared in Virginia, his boyhood coinciding with the period of the Civil war and restricting many of the advantages and opportunities the family would otherwise have provided him. He attended the old Field schools, also Hampden-Sidney College, and left college in June, 1872, and in the latter part of the following August arrived in Kentucky. His first occupation here was teaching in Boone County and from there he came to Union County and was a teacher in the Morganfield Academy during 1873-74. Influenced in part by the example of his father, he had planned a career as a lawyer and studied law while teaching. He was admitted to the bar at Morganfield in 1875, and is now one of the oldest members of that bar in active practice. In 1876 he was elected superintendent of schools of Union County, and made that office an opportunity for some effective service in behalf of the local school facilities during the next two years. He then engaged in private practice until 1886, when he was elected judge of Union County Court. He handled the various judicial and administrative affairs of the office through three consecutive terms, altogether eleven years. In 1897 Judge Flournoy was chosen commonwealth attorney for the Fifth Judicial District, comprising Union, Henderson and Webster counties, and in this office he likewise distinguished himself during his six year term.

Since leaving the office of commonwealth attorney Judge Flournoy has given uninterrupted attention to his practice as a lawyer and to his farming and other business interests. He is attorney for and a director of the Peoples Bank & Trust Company of Morganfield. He is a democrat, a Royal Arch Mason, Odd Fellow and for many years has been a ruling member of the Presbyterian Church. The Town of Flournoy in Union County was named in his honor.

In 1877 Judge Flournoy married Mattie Givens, of Morganfield. She died in 1884, leaving three children: Mrs. Bessie F. Brown, Mrs. Sarah F. Butts (now deceased), and Miss Martha W. Flournoy. In 1888 Judge Flournoy married Miss Susan F. Cobbs, of Virginia. They have five children: Mrs. Mary F. Ward, of Columbia, South Carolina; Patterson F. Flournoy, a farmer in Union County; Mildred F., wife of W. T. Woodson, attorney for Swift & Company, Chicago; Landon C. Flournoy, Jr.; and Thomas Stanhope Flournoy. Both the younger sons were soldiers in the World war.

Landon C. Flournoy, Jr., was educated at Washington and Lee University, completed his law course in the University of Kentucky at Lexington, was admitted to the bar in 1916, and is actively associated with his father in practice. During 1916-17 he served as city attorney for Morganfield. On August 27, 1917, he entered the Officers Training School at Fort Benjamin Harrison, Indianapolis, was commissioned a second lieutenant November 27, 1917, and on December 15th reported for duty at Camp Dodge, Iowa. In June, 1918, he was commissioned a first lieutenant of infantry, and in September was promoted to captain. In November, 1918, he was sent to Camp Cody, New Mexico, and while discharged from active service November 13, 1918, he was selected for duty in the Reserve Corps with the rank of captain. On August 7, 1921, he was selected county attorney of Union County and has entered upon his duties as such. Captain Flournoy is a member of the American Legion, is a Royal Arch Mason and a member of the Presbyterian Church.

The youngest son, Thomas Stanhope Flournoy, is a graduate of the University of Michigan and is now with the Department of Forestry of the Government, stationed at Tres Ritos, New Mexico. During the World war he was trained for service in the field artillery at Camp Taylor, Louisville.

WILLIAM TRUMAN DRURY has been one of Morganfield's lawyers for a quarter of a century or more. He was born on a farm in Union County October 15, 1871, a son of George H. and Lou Ellen (Harris) Drury, also natives of Union County, where his father died January 28, 1919, at the age of seventy-two, and his mother August 21, 1918, aged seventy. The grandfather, Ignatius Drury, settled in Union County in 1826, and the maternal grandfather, William Truman Harris was also of a pioneer family in this section of Kentucky. One of the great-grandfathers of the Morganfield lawyers was James Pratt, who served in the War of 1812, and after the battle of New Orleans bought a farm in Union County. There his family in the various branches has been well known in this section of Kentucky for a century.

William Truman Drury grew up on his father's farm, attended country schools, and completed his literary education in the University of Kentucky. He left the University before graduating to become principal of the Morganfield schools. He was at the head of the local school system two years, in the meantime was studying law, and on July 7, 1896, was admitted to the bar. He has now completed a quarter of a century of continuous and successful practice at Morganfield. Mr. Drury is a democrat, a Catholic and a Knight of Columbus. When America entered the war with Germany he tried to secure some service in the military establishment. Failing in that, he offered himself to the Knights of Columbus for war work and spent eight months with that splendid organization in France.

Among local interests with which he has been identified Mr. Drury has assisted in developing the coal industry of Union County. For many years he has been secretary of the board of directors of the Morganfield National Bank.

In 1895 he married Miss Katherine Wimberg of Evansville, Indiana. They are the parents of three sons and two daughters.

JOHN GOAD WYNNS, M. D. A widely known and successful physician and dentist of Union County, Doctor Wynns makes his home and has his offices in Sturgis, a community where he has been known practically all his life.

He was born on a farm near Sturgis June 26, 1876, son of Rev. William Watkins and Nancy (Wallace) Wynns. His grandfather was a native of North Carolina and a pioneer settler in Webster County, Kentucky. Rev. W. W. Wynns was born near Providence in Webster County, and when about twenty-one he married and moved to Union County, and for many years was a thrifty and industrious farmer. As a young man he was ordained a minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and while he always lived on his farm he was pastor of a number of local churches and it is said that he married more people and had more conversions; the latter aggregating about 15,000, under his preaching than any other minister in Western Kentucky. He died on his farm in Union County October 2, 1900, at the age of sixty-two. His widow is still living, at the age of eighty-one and lives among her children. She has thirty-five surviving grandchildren, and seven great-grandchildren. Doctor Wynns is the youngest son among her family of four sons and four daughters, all but one daughter still living.

Jesse F. Wilder M.D.

Doctor Wynns grew up on a farm, attended the country schools, and was also a student in the Ohio Valley College at Sturgis, and as a young man spent five profitable years as a teacher. He studied medicine in the Hospital Medical College at Louisville, and graduated in the class of 1903. He began practice at Sturgis the same year. He also took up the study of dentistry, and in 1916 received the degree D. D. S. from the University of Louisville, and has since combined the work of the two professions and is one of the busiest professional men in Sturgis.

He is a member of Union County and Kentucky State Medical Associations. Doctor Wynns is a Presbyterian, while Mrs. Wynns is of the Catholic faith. He married Miss Ella Rankin, of Louisville, in 1911, and they have a family of two daughters and one son.

JESSE F. WILDER, M. D., who is engaged in the practice of his profession in the City of Corbin, Whitley County, is a native son of this county, a scion of a sterling pioneer family of this section of the state, and for more than a quarter of a century he has held place as one of the representative physicians and surgeons of his native county. Though his large practice is of general order, he gives special attention to the diagnosis and treatment of diseases of the eye.

Dr. Jesse Franklin Wilder was born in the old family homestead on the banks of Jellico Creek, six miles south of Williamsburg, Whitley County, and the date of his nativity was December 15, 1864. His paternal grandfather, Jesse Wilder, was born in North Carolina, in 1801, and died at Tidalwave, Whitley County, Kentucky, in 1891, at the patriarchal age of ninety years and honored as one of the last representatives of the old regime of pioneer farmers in this county, where he developed the fine old family homestead farm which was the birthplace of his grandson, Doctor Wilder of this review. Jesse Wilder was a man of strong mentality and inviolable integrity in all of the relations of life. He was influential in community affairs during the course of a signally long and useful life, was originally a Whig in politics and later a republican, and both he and his wife were zealous members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Family records indicate that the Wilders originally were established in Holland, whence members went to England, from which latter company the original American representatives came over on the historic ship "Mayflower." These founders probably settled in New England, but representatives of the name early established themselves in North Carolina. Jesse Wilder married Miss Sarah Prewitt, who was born in Whitley County, Kentucky, in 1812, a member of one of the prominent pioneer families of this section of the state, and her death occurred on the old Wilder homestead in 1876.

William W. Wilder, father of the Doctor, was born on the old home farm mentioned above, and the date of his birth was February 15, 1838. On that farm he continued to reside until 1869, when he removed to Laurel County and became the owner of a large tract of land near Boreing, where he long continued farm enterprise on an extensive scale and where he continued to reside until his death, which occurred January 18, 1920. He represented the best in the civic and material activities of the community, commanded the confidence and respect of all who knew him, and made his life count for good in its every relation. He was a republican but had no desire for political office, though he consented to serve one term as assessor of Laurel County. He was a zealous member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, as was also his wife, whose maiden name was Jane Higginbotham, and who was born in 1845, in that part of Whitley County that is now included in McCreary County. Her death occurred on the old home place in 1889. Of the children Doctor Wilder, of this sketch, is the eldest; Susan is the wife of A. T. Brewer, a prosperous farmer in Texas, near the Arkansas state line; Samantha E. is the wife of James E. Woodward, of Boreing, Whitley County, where he is a prosperous merchant, agriculturist and stock-grower; John C. is engaged in the mercantile business at Jellico, Tennessee; Andrew S. is a leading merchant and real-estate dealer at Corbin, Whitley County; James S. is identified with coal mining at Kettle Island, Bell County; Martha, the wife of John Morgan, died at Boreing when twenty-eight years of age, and Mr. Morgan now resides at Williamsburg, county seat of Whitley County; Amanda is the wife of Edward Hopkins, a farmer near Boreing, this county; William S., who was formerly engaged in independent mercantile enterprise, is now employed in a hardware establishment at London, Laurel County; Mary is the wife of Frank Richardson, of Hazard, Perry County, where he holds the position of foreman of a coal mine, after having previously been engaged in farming.

Doctor Wilder is indebted to the rural schools of Laurel and Whitley counties for his early education, and by careful study and reading in a private way he rounded out his academic education, so that he was well fortified in this respect when he initiated his preparation for the exacting profession of his choice by entering the medical department of the University of Louisville, in which institution he was graduated on the 13th of March, 1894. After thus receiving his degree of Doctor of Medicine he established himself in practice at Woodbine, Whitley County, where he continued his effective professional services over a wide surrounding territory until 1903, since which year he has maintained his residence and professional headquarters in the City of Corbin, where he controls a large and representative practice and, as previously noted, specializes in the treatment of diseases of the eye. By recourse to the best standard and periodical literature of his profession and by effective post-graduate work the Doctor has kept himself in close touch with the advances made in medical and surgical science, and thus brings to bear in his practice the most approved modern methods and remedial agencies. In 1903 he took a post-graduate course in the Philadelphia Polyclinic, where he gave special attention to study and clinical work in connection with diseases of the eye, and in the autumn of 1920, for the purpose of making a general review of professional work, he attended the Chicago Post-Graduate School of Medicine. Doctor Wilder maintains his office at 109 East First Street in the City of Corbin, and is the owner of his attractive residence property, at the corner of Kentucky and Center streets. He is an active member of the Whitley County Medical Society, the Kentucky State Medical Society, and the American Medical Association.

Aside from his professional service Doctor Wilder has proved himself a loyal and progressive citizen of his native county and state. He is a stalwart in the local ranks of the republican party and has served as a member of the city council of Corbin during the greater part of his period of residence in this vital little city. He is local register of vital statistics. He and his wife are active members of the Methodist Church in their home city, and he is serving as a member of its board of trustees. He is affiliated with Cooper Lodge No. 668, Free and Accepted Masons, at Corbin, and is a past master of the same, and he holds membership also in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

Doctor Wilder was one of the most influential figures in effecting the organization of the Whitley National Bank in 1910, and was its first cashier, an office which he resigned at the expiration of five months, after which he served as vice president of the institution until 1919, when he sold his stock in the bank. He is the owner of the business building in which his office is established, and here also are the offices of the Corbin Hospital Association, of which he is a leading member, the local hospital having modern equipment and facilities for the accommodation of five patients simultaneously, besides having excellent provisions for emergency service. The ground floor of the doctor's building at 109 East First Street is used for mercantile purposes. He is the owner of a dwelling house property on Main Street and of 600 acres of valuable coal land in Clay County.

As may readily be understood, Doctor Wilder took an important part in local war activities in the climactic period of the World war. He aided loyally in the various campaigns in Whitley County in support of the Government war bond issues, savings stamps, etc., gave most liberal personal subscriptions, helped in the Red Cross and other branches of constructive war service and made no charge for his professional examination of volunteers and others called into the nation's military and naval service.

In 1898 was recorded the marriage of Doctor Wilder to Miss Lida M. Brummett, who was born and reared near Brummett Station, Whitley County, a daughter of Henry L. and Elizabeth (Meadors) Brummett, who now reside on their fine farm near Harrodsburg in Mercer County. Mr. Brummett served as a soldier of the Union in the Civil war. Doctor and Mrs. Wilder have three children: Edgar W. remains at the parental home and is a progressive exponent of farm enterprise in Whitley County; J. Arthur likewise remains a member of the home circle and is in the employ of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company; Lillian Elizabeth was graduated from the Corbin High School as a member of the class of 1921, and is a popular factor in the social activities of the younger folk in her home city.

REV. HENRY HAYES SWEETS is one of the widely known officials of the Presbyterian Church in the south. He began his pastoral work at Louisville, but for many years past has been engaged in executive duties as secretary of the Board of Education and Ministerial Relief of his denomination.

Doctor Sweets was born at Elizabethtown, Kentucky, October 6, 1872, a son of Michael and Sarah K. (Matthis) Sweets. The foundation for his life work was supplied by a liberal literary as well as a theological training. He graduated A. B. from Center College at Danville in 1894, and with the degree Bachelor of Divinity from the Kentucky Presbyterian Theological Seminary in 1898. He was ordained to the ministry in 1897, and immediately undertook a work requiring independent action and executive ability as organizer of the James Lees Memorial Church at Louisville, which he served as pastor until 1904. In the latter year he was appointed secretary of the Board of Education and Ministerial Relief of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, and the duties of that office have been his chief responsibility ever since.

He is also trustee of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, a member of the Board of Corporators of the Presbyterian Ministers' Fund for Life Insurance of Philadelphia, is president of the Presbyterian Educational Association of the South, Council of Church Boards of Education of the United States, and is also secretary of the Council of Secretaries of Ministerial Relief and Pensions of America.

These various duties have given Doctor Sweets a wide and influential acquaintance both in and outside his denomination over many states. His attainments have been recognized in this scholastic field, and he holds the degree Doctor of Divinity conferred by Center College in 1909 and the Presbyterian College of South Carolina in the same year, while in 1918 Austin College of Texas conferred upon him the honorary degree LL. D. Dr. Sweets is a member of the Delta Kappa Upsilon fraternity and the Masonic order, and he is a member of the Filson Club of Louisville. On November 27, 1907, he married Douschka Martin, of Newberry, South Carolina.

JOHN DAVID TRAWICK, M. D. During his professional career at Louisville Doctor Trawick has confined his practice almost altogether to orthopedic surgery, and his successful work among crippled children has brought him a reputation in professional circles mingled with a high degree of esteem with the general public.

Doctor Trawick is a man of broad experience and has had associations with the great men in his field both at home and abroad. He was born in Stewart County, Tennessee, June 25, 1873, a son of Dr. Andrew M. and Martha (McSwain) Trawick, being fourth among the thirteen children, of whom four sons and two daughters still survive. Dr. Andrew Trawick was also a physician, gaining his medical education after an arduous experience as a Confederate soldier. He was born in Arkansas in 1844, and obtained his early education from the Hills schools in that state. As a youth he volunteered in the Sixteenth Arkansas Regiment of the Confederate Army and served as a non-commissioned officer. In 1863 he was made a prisoner, and was held on John-son's Island in Lake Erie until the close of the war in 1865. He began the study of medicine with Dr. A. J. Weldon at Paris in Henry County, Tennessee, and subsequently attended the medical schools of the University of Louisville, and graduated in 1866 from Vanderbilt University at Nashville. He began practice in Henry County, Tennessee, later was located in Stewart County for about fifteen years, and in 1880 moved to Clarksville and finally to Nashville, where he achieved high rank as a general practitioner. He was a member of the County State and American Medical Associations. Dr. Andrew Trawick died in 1911. He was a devoted member of the old McKendree Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and was affiliated with the Masons, Knights of Honor and Knights of Pythias, and in politics was a democrat. The wife of Andrew Trawick, Martha McSwain, was born in Carroll County, Tennessee, in 1846, and died in 1889.

John David Trawick was reared in Tennessee, attended public schools at Nashville, and in 1899 received his medical degree from Vanderbilt University. He did post-graduate work in the Polyclinic Hospital of New York, and then accepted a post which brought him opportunity for world travel and useful service under the Missionary Board of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He was superintendent of the Mission Hospital at Soochow, China, during 1900-02. On his return from the far East he spent part of the year 1903 at Vienna in further study and began his regular practice at Louisville. During 1912 he again went abroad, and attended some of the great children's clinics at Edinburgh and Liverpool, and for the past ten years his work has been entirely orthopedic surgery. He is orthopedist on the staff of four hospitals, and his work has gained him high standing among a number of professional organizations, including the Jefferson County Medical Society, Kentucky State Medical Association, American Medical Association, Southern Medical Association, Mississippi Valley Medical Association, and the Central States Orthopedic Society. He is a member of the Executive Committee of the Louisville Council of Boy Scouts, is an active member of the American Legion, and was chairman of the committees on first aid and teaching activities on the local chapter of the American Red Cross. Richard Henderson Rivers, widely known in the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Doctor and Mrs. Trawick had three children; Arch Kendrick, who died in 1907, at the age of four and a half years; Elizabeth Kendrick and John D., Jr.

CHARLES ROBERT PETER. Though trained and qualified for the legal profession, Charles Robert Peter has instead of the practice of law found a congenial and profitable work in real estate, and his standing in Louisville real estate circles is well indicated by the fact that he is president of the Real Estate Board.

He was born July 7, 1888, on the farm of his maternal grandfather in Jefferson County, Kentucky, a son of Edward F. and Lydia (Baringer) Peter. His father is a native of Louisville while his mother was born on the old homestead near that city. Edward F. Peter has long been one of Louisville's substantial citizens, was for many years an active contractor and builder and had to his credit a number of leading structures in Jefferson County. He has been retired from business since 1915, but is still a bank director and sustains an active part in local affairs. He is a member of the Methodist Church.

Charles Robert Peter is the second in the family of four children, three daughters and one son. He acquired his education at Louisville, attending the Manual Training High School four years and making a high record for scholarship. Since then he has been in the real estate business under the name C. Robert Peter & Company and his offices are in the Realty Building. He was vice president of the Real Estate Board in 1920, and elected president in 1921. On October 25, 1916, Mr. Peter married Corinne J. Clement, a native of Louisville. They have one son, Charles Robert, Jr.

JOHN LEWIS LETTERLE. Of agriculture as a business as well as a science and art one of the men of distinctive achievement in Kentucky is John Lewis Letterle, of Harrods Creek, Jefferson County. For a number of years he has enjoyed the confidence and leadership of the farmers and stockmen of the state in various organizations and movements affecting their interests as a whole.

Mr. Letterle was born at Louisville, June 7, 1870, only child of Gottlieb and Elizabeth (Rehn) Letterle. His parents are also natives of Louisville, his father born January 5, 1843, and his mother December 20, 1848. His father in early life conducted a meat market and later became well known as a livestock commission man, retiring in 1896. He is a democrat and a member of St. Paul's Evangelical Church.

John Lewis Letterle completed his literary education in the Male High School of Louisville, and after a course in the Ben C. Weaver Business College chose farming as the vocation whithermost of his efforts, and it was his success as a practical farmer, seed corn raiser and stockman that attracted attention to him and brought him leadership in agricultural affairs. For a number of years he produced the widely known Letterle Standard seed corn, the Boone County White and Reid's Yellow Dent and also raised registered Short-horn cattle and Berkshire hogs. His farm, Walnut Hills, which became justly celebrated, contained a 140 acres six miles east of Louisville, and was sold in the spring of 1921 to Judge R. W. Bingham.

Mr. Letterle was appointed a member of the State Board of Agriculture by Gov. James B. McCreary in 1912, and in 1916 was reappointed by Gov. A. O. Stanley and in 1920 by the present Governor Morrow. He is treasurer of the State Board of the Agricultural Bond issue of $300,000. He is a member of the State Live Stock Sanitary Board, served as a trustee of the Kentucky State University in 1917-18, also served three years as president of the Kentucky State Swine Breeders Association, is president of the Jefferson County Farm Bureau, was elected its first president in 1920 and re-elected in 1921, and is a member of the executive committee of the Kentucky Farm Bureau Federation and treasurer of that committee. Mr. Letterle is vice president and a director of the Bank of Prospect, a director of the Louisville Trust Company, of the Louisville Title Company, the Henry Clay Fire Insurance Company, Lexington, Kentucky, and a director of Wood Stubbs & Company, seedmen. He is a member of Highland Chapter No. 150, Royal Arch Masons, Louisville Commandery No. 1, Knights Templar, Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine, and in politics is a democrat.

On May 5, 1892, Mr. Letterle married Lottie M. Roth, a native of Louisville. They are the parents of two daughters. The elder, Irma Theresa, is the wife of James M. Laird, and they have two children, Margerite Elizabeth and Bettie Ann. The younger daughter, Elizabeth Lottie, is the wife of Burgess B. Mason, and they have one daughter, Dorothy.

THOMAS E. JENKINS, vice president of the West Kentucky Coal Company at Sturgis, has been in the coal industry in some capacity since early youth. He has performed practically every essential occupation in connection with coal mining, both under and above ground, has been in many of the executive and financial branches of the service, and has done much to build up the West Kentucky Coal Company as one of the largest producing organizations of its kind in the state.

Mr. Jenkins was born in Wayland, Portage County, Ohio, October 6, 1876, son of Evan T. and Mary (Phillips) Jenkins. He is of Welsh ancestry. He was reared and educated in eastern Ohio, attending common and high schools and a business college, and lived in his native community until 1895. He then became a workman around coal mines, subsequently for two years had charge of a small mine in Iowa, for several years was at Danville, Illinois, in charge of the mechanical department of one of the extensive mining corporations there and for eight years was in charge of the inspection and claim department of a liability insurance company at Chicago.

Mr. Jenkins came to Kentucky in February, 1912, to accept the post of general superintendent of the West Kentucky Coal Company. He was promoted to manager, and is now vice president of this great industry. Mr. Jenkins is a republican in politics, and is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner and a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In 1912 he married Miss Martha Onan. They have two children.

MARLIN LUTHER BLACKWELL is a lawyer at Dixon. Soon after graduating from law school and getting admitted to the bar he located at the county seat of Webster County and has achieved recognition and substantial success in a community that has known him from his earliest years.

Mr. Blackwell was born on a farm in Webster County, November 1, 1879, son of George Washington and Sallie I. (Pride) Blackwell, the former now sixty-three and the latter sixty, both living at Clay. His father has always been a farmer and a very successful one, combining agriculture with stock raising. Both parents were born in what is now Webster County, then a portion of Union County. The Blackwells came to Kentucky from Virginia in early times. The original settlement of the Blackwell family in America was made by three English brothers who came over in Colonial times, one settling on the island in the harbor of New York since known as Blackwell's Island, while one went to North Carolina and the other to Virginia. The Pride family is also a numerous one in western Kentucky. George W. Blackwell has always been a democrat in politics, and he and his wife are members of the Missionary Baptist Church. They had two children, Marlin L. and Roe, wife of J. E. Taylor of Madisonville.

Marlin Luther Blackwell had the sturdy training and environment of a farm boy during his youth. Besides the common schools he attended Ohio Valley College located at Sturgis, and completed his law studies in the famous Cumberland University Law School at Lebanon, Tennessee. He graduated in 1903, was admitted to the bar at Madisonville in February of that year, and since 1904 has had his home at Dixon. He has been junior partner of the law firm of Bourland & Blackwell for the past eight years. His partner is one of the veteran lawyers of western Kentucky and Mr. Blackwell, like Mr. Bourland, has devoted his time to his profession, never seeking the honors or duties of politics. He is a democrat and has made some campaign speeches and interested himself in the success of the party since he reached his majority.

During the World war Mr. Blackwell considered his patriotic duties paramount, and served as a member of the Council of Defense, the Legal Advisory Board, and was food administrator for Webster County. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias and the Elks, and is a member of the Missionary Baptist Church. In 1908 he married Miss Ora Baker, who died less than a year later. In 1917 Miss Lide Mason, of Morganfield, became his wife.

EUSEBIUS THEODORE HUTCHINGS. Louisville has developed an architecture worthy of the name during the past several decades. As a result of many influences, directed by an increased appreciation and demand for the artistic in exterior aspects of the city, a new order has been brought about within the business district, where commercialism rules supreme, as well as in those portions of the city where individual taste has greater latitude. Among the architects who have shared in the work that has contributed much to the city's beauty and worth, one who has made a place for himself among the leaders of his profession is Eusebius Theodore Hutchings, a veteran of the World war.

Mr. Hutchings was born at Louisville, March 19, 1886, a son of John Bacon and Lena (Schwartz) Hutchings. There were four children in the family: John Bacon, Jr.; Eusebius Theodore; Carolyn, the wife of Street Russell; and Anne, the wife of Monroe Bush. Eusebius T. Hutchings received his early education in the Ward School and a manual training school, following which he pursued a course at the Kentucky State University and subsequently at Cornell University. For his further training he went to Hannover, Germany, where he had the opportunity of becoming familiar with foreign architecture, and upon his return to the United States, in November, 1909, embarked in the practice of his profession in association with his father and brother, under the firm style of John Bacon Hutchings & Sons. He remained with this firm until September 7, 1917, when he volunteered for service in the United States army, receiving a commission as Captain of Engineers. He was called into active service December 28th following, and first reported at Camp Lee, Petersburg, Virginia, whence he was ordered to duty at Washington, District of Columbia, February 28, 1918, on detached service as supervising constructing quartermaster in the Construction Division Headquarters. He was subsequently re-assigned to duty with the Engineer Corps and ordered overseas July 5, 1918, sailing from Hoboken, New Jersey, July 15th and landing at Liverpool, England, July 31st. Later he went to Cherbourg, France, and was assigned to Tours, with the Division of Construction and Forestry. In October, 1918, Captain Hutchings was ordered to Savenay, France, as engineer officer in charge of construction of Savenay Hospital, a work in which he was still engaged when ordered to the United States on February 22, 1919. He was honorably discharged and mustered out of the United States service at Washington, District of Columbia, March 11, 1919, at that time returning to Louisville, where on March 19, 1919, he engaged in the practice of his profession as an independent architect, with offices at 310 Columbia Building, where he is still located. His services are in great and continuous demand and his assignments are numerous and important.

Mr. Hutchings has risen to a meritedly high position in his calling, and is a member of the American Institute of Architects and the American Society of Military Engineers. He belongs likewise to the Louisville Rotary Club, the Louisville Board of Trade, The Pendennis Club, the Kentucky Society Sons of the American Revolution, the Kentucky Historical Society, the Jefferson Post of the American Legion, and the Kappa Sigma fraternity. His religious connection is with the Presbyterian Church, and in political matters he gives his allegiance to the republican party.

On June 5, 1912, Mr. Hutchings was united in marriage with Miss Heloise Kennedy Bullett, the daughter of C. Malcolm and Heloise (Kennedy) Bullett, natives of Kentucky. Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Bullett: Heloise K.; Virginia, the wife of Richard Barker; Clara, who died when a young lady; and Hugh. Mr. and Mrs. Hutchings are the parents of two daughters: Heloise and Dorothea.

NELSON WOOLCOTT. The Woolcott Flour Mills are among the institutions that swell the volume of Lexington's commerce, and the business is one that reflects credit upon the man who founded the mills and has given almost his undivided attention to their management, Nelson Woolcott.

For half a century or more flour milling has been a family occupation with the Woolcotts. In milling circles and in trade journals the name is a familiar one, and in many of the grain producing centers of the middle west the enterprise of the Woolcotts has been responsible for the mills that have converted the grain into merchantable products.

The Woolcott Flour Mills at Lexington as originally established were started in 1910. The first mill had a capacity of a 100 barrels per day, but since then additions and improvements have been made until the capacity is doubled. Nearly all the flour and meal comes from Blue Grass wheat and corn, and the output has a deservedly high reputation. The product is sold wholesale to the Kentucky retail trade, there being four salesmen who represent the mills on the road. The business is owned by Woolcott Brothers, Nelson and William Woolcott. Nelson Woolcott has had charge of the building and the operation of the mills throughout the eleven years of their existence. He has kept the mills in steady operation, and usually employs about twenty-five men in the business.

Nelson Woolcott was born at his father's country mill in Franklin County, Pennsylvania, in 1873. His father, John Woolcott, was a native of England and learned the milling trade when a youth. For several years he was employed as expert miller in what was then the largest flouring mill in the world, at Bristol, England. After coming to America he operated a number of mills and was well known in the business in Kentucky. He died at Harrisburg, Illinois. All his five sons learned the milling trade under their father and have since been active heads of mills. One of these sons, Fred, is at Coffeyville, Kansas, another, H. J. Woolcott, is at Steelton, Pennsylvania, John Henry is a miller at Harrisburg, Illinois, while William Woolcott, the partner of Nelson, is in the milling business at Winchester, Kentucky.

Nelson Woolcott had his early experience in the milling industry at several points in the West, and for a time was a partner with his brother, John Henry, in the mill at Harrisburg, Illinois. Subsequently he became associated with his brother William at Winchester, Kentucky, and for ten years they had studied conditions at Lexington before they made the move which resulted in the establishment of the Woolcott Flour Mills there.

Nelson Woolcott married Clara Seaton, daughter of a Harrisburg, Illinois, merchant. They have three children, George, Virginia and Dorothy.

JAMES D. HARPER. After he had put in several years at his trade as a tin and sheet metal worker, James D. Harper used his modest accumulation of about $500 to set up in business for himself. That was in 1908, and during the first year the gross volume of his business was not over $10,000. The plant and organization he maintains today in Lexington is one of the largest in Kentucky for the manufacture and construction of roofing, skylight, cornices and other sheet metal work, and he employs between fifteen and twenty skilled workers. His annual business now runs a $100,000 or more.

Mr. Harper has the facilities and reputation to make him a responsible figure and frequently is awarded some of the largest contracts for this line of work in Kentucky, and his business also extends to Tennessee and Virginia. He has handled much work for churches, schools and public buildings. A few of the larger contracts were in connection with the construction of the State Normal School at Richmond, the roofing for the Burley Warehouse and Tattersall's Warehouse and the roofing for the new dormitory at the State University. Some individual contracts involve between $15,000 and $20,000 in cost.

James D. Harper was born at Lexington in 1885. His father, W. H. Harper, moved from Lexington to Tennessee soon after the war, and for many years was in business as a stock dealer. He died about 1910, at the age of sixty. James D. Harper had a common school education and as a boy began an apprenticeship in the tin and sheet metal trade with George Payne. After his apprenticeship he worked at the bench until he established his own business. Out of his prosperity he has acquired several residence properties in Lexington. Mr. Harper is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

At the age of twenty-seven he married Miss Irene Brown. Her father, Jeff Brown, was a professional ball player. Mr. and Mrs. Harper have two children, James D. Jr., and William.

CHARLES B. SEMPLE is vice president of one of the oldest commercial organizations at Louisville, W. & A. C. Semple, Incorporated, Railway Supplies, at 309 West Main Street. His father and grandfather were in business at Louisville for a number of years before the Civil war as wholesale hardware merchants. The company finally established a department for railway supplies, and that department grew until it became the dominating feature of the business, resulting in the discontinuation of the hardware branch, and for many years past this has been one of the large organizations in the South handling all classes of railway supplies.

Charles B. Semple was born at Louisville May 3, 1870, a son of Alexander C. and Sarah (Slaughter) Semple. His father was a native of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and died at the age of seventy, while his mother was born in Nelson County, Kentucky, and died at the age of sixty-eight. Charles B. is the youngest of four children, three of whom are still living.

Alexander C. Semple was the son of A. B. Semple, and when a young man he came to Louisville with his father and established one of the pioneer wholesale hardware concerns of the city. The business was continued under the firm name of A. B. Semple & Company, the grandfather supplying the chief name to the business title. That organization continued with unimpaired vitality and progress until 1865, when two sons of the original head of the business, W. and A. C. Semple, incorporated the W. and A. C. Semple Company, a commercial title that has been in existence now for over half a century. During the Civil war Alexander C. Semple held the rank of captain, and was in charge of the United States military supplies at the post in Louisville. He was an active republican in politics.

Charles B. Semple was educated at Louisville and at Cornell University, where he graduated as a civil engineer in 1892. Returning to Louisville, he took an active share in his father's business, of which he is now vice president. Mr. Semple is a member of the Pen-dennis Club, the Louisville Country Club and politically casts his vote as an independent. On November 17, 1898, he married Miss Kate Griffith, of Louisville.

ANDREW MCBRAYER SEA. As a business man and citizen Louisville came to know, appreciate and pay tribute to the strong character of Captain Sea during a period of nearly half a century, while his career as a whole, including that of a distinguished military record, is one which the state may justly honor.

A son of Robert W. and Mary (McBrayer) Sea, he was born at Lawrenceburg, Kentucky, December 22, 1840. His ancestors had come to Kentucky from Virginia and North Carolina in Indian days. These ancestors constituted a worthy and even illustrious lineage. Some of the related families were the Whites, Blackwells and Starkes of old Virginia, and on his mother's side James McBrayer of North Carolina. Both in council and on the battlefield they played their part in gaining the Independence of America, John and Robert Blackwell fighting the British in the line, while Barret White and John Starke, being too old for active service, gave their aid through membership and work on various committees of safety. There were still others who fought the Indians when homes and settlements were threatened by savage attack. Captain Sea's grandfather, Leonard Sea, was with Gen. Anthony Wayne in his Indian campaign and also in the War of 1812. His ancestors fought when occasion demanded, nor is it recorded that one of them ever faltered, and after redeeming Kentucky from its savage foe they did no less worthy work in molding and establishing its peaceful destiny.

Losing his father in 1845, Andrew McBrayer Sea was carefully reared by a devotedly pious mother until her death in 1857, when her work passed on to her mother, Mrs. Martha McBrayer. Captain Sea had all advantages of culture open to a young man in his social position. He was educated at Bacon College, Harrodsburg, and was a student in Yale College when the war between the states began in 1861. Trained from childhood in loyalty to the best traditions of Kentucky and Virginia, and with the blood of fighting ancestors in him, he could not fail to take up arms, and his decision to join the Southern cause was equally inevitable. He at once came south, and despite protests from family and friends enlisted in the Confederate army. He was at that time frail and delicate, physicians pronouncing his ailment as tuberculosis and predicted he would not live six months. He fought through the war, engaging in many battles and skirmishes, and survived that struggle more than half a century. He was always in the artillery service, though his command was usually with the great cavalry leaders Forrest and Wheeler. He was lieutenant with Marshall's Tennessee Battery, the Famous Morton's Battery, and finally Wiggins' Battery, Dibrell's Division, Wheeler's Corps. In 1864 he was Acting Assistant Ordnance Officer of Wheeler's Corps. He was in the battles of Shiloh, Chickamauga, Resaca, Rome, Peachtree Creek, Rocky Face Ridge, Columbia and others, and in the entire campaign from Dalton to Atlanta in front of Sherman. At Columbia, South Carolina, after Wheeler had withdrawn his troops he destroyed the Broad River Bridge, forcing Sherman to go eight miles up the river to the ford. For the last nineteen months he commanded Wiggins' Battery, which was part of President Davis' escort as far as Washington, Georgia, where Captain Sea surrendered his command May 6, 1865. It was probably the last battery of artillery to surrender east of the Mississippi.

From the close of the war Captain Sea's energies were devoted to a long active and honorable business career in his native state, and from 1872 his home and interests were at Louisville. He died in Jefferson County December 5, 1917, at the age of nearly seventy-seven.

Captain Sea never made himself a slave to business. He always maintained the character of a courteous and whole-souled gentleman, with a world of sympathy for his fellow man, and especially delighted in his fellowship with odd army comrades. He was one of the founders and for thirteen years a trustee of the Kentucky Confederate Home, acting as secretary during all this period. It is said that no one did better service to any similar institution, and his tenderness towards the inmates and his unceasing solicitude for their welfare will long remain a cherished memory. Active in the work and mission of the United Confederate Veterans organization, he was for more than twenty years officially identified with the association, a great part of the time as commandant of George B. Eastin Camp United Confederate Veterans at Louisville, one of the great camps of the Confederate Veterans.

Much of his time during his later years was devoted to public responsibilities. He was chosen city treasurer of Louisville in 1909 and in 1913 elected receiver of city taxes. For many years before his death he was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church and during 1882-84 was secretary and treasurer of the Kentucky State Sunday School Union.

His good fortune in business and civic affairs was supplemented by half a century of companionship with a lady of broadest culture and one of Kentucky's prominent women of letters. Captain Sea and Miss Sophie Irvine Fox were married at Danville, Kentucky, November 27, 1867. Her father was that eminent Kentucky jurist and lawyer, Judge Fontaine F. Fox. Mrs. Sea, who survives her husband, has in addition to home and family been distinguished by remarkable religious devotion and literary gifts and works. As an author she has contributed to Southern literature Requiem Bells, That Old Time Child, Roberta, and a Review of African Slavery, and as a poet is author, among other writings, of a Hymn of Dedication, sung at the dedication of the First Presbyterian Church at Louisville in 1891, and included in the collection of "Hymns of the Ages." Typifying all that is best in the intellectual, social and religious life of Southern womanhood, she is still actively at work for the betterment of human conditions.

Captain Sea's loyalty to the cause of the history and principles of the South and the Confederacy was without break, yet he was thoroughly and intensely American and a Kentuckian through and through. He believed in the undying principles of the democratic party, and was always active in expounding its doctrine and in working for its success. This sketch, though brief, should reveal some of the rugged and great qualities of his manhood, and his entire record was such as to deserve the following, one of many editorial comments upon him after his death: "His was a fine and straightforward soul, open as his countenance, and trusting because itself so thoroughly worthy of trust. In compromises inapt, and to suspicion inhospitable, he had lived his life in the face of all the world, doing his duty in every sphere of his activity, because he knew no other word than duty."

Captain Sea is survived by four sons: Fontaine F., Robert W., Andrew M., and Logan H. Andrew M. Sea, Jr., is a well known Louisville lawyer.

REV. CHARLES WHITEFIELD WELCH. Pastor of the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church at Louisville, Rev. Mr. Welch is one of the able and fearless church leaders of modern times, and his ministry here and elsewhere has been useful in giving the church power and influence in a broadened sphere of activities.

Charles Whitefield Welch was born in White County, Tennessee, March 11, 1878, a son of William and Georgia (McFarlin) Welch. His grandfather was a descendant of one of three brothers who moved from Ireland to Wales and thence came to America. One of them settled in New England, another in Pennsylvania and another in Alabama, Rev. Mr. Welch representing the Pennsylvania branch of the family. William Welch, also a native of White County, Tennessee, died when his son Charles W. was a child. He was an engineer by profession, and in 1882 settled in Warren County, Kentucky. He was a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. His wife was born in Logan County, Kentucky, and died in 1914. Charles Whitefield Welch was the second in a family of four sons and four daughters, two of whom died in infancy and five are still living. Rev. Mr. Welch attended the common schools of Simpson and Warren counties, Kentucky, Ogden College at Bowling Green, Southwestern Presbyterian University, and in preparation for the ministry attended McCormick Theological Seminary in Chicago and the Union Seminary in New York. His first charge was the Cumberland Presbyterian Church at Jackson, Tennessee. He was then called to a larger sphere of labor in the Park Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York City, which he served from 1911 to 1917, and since the latter year has been pastor of the Fourth Avenue Church at Louisville.

Rev. Mr. Welch has for years been a close student of city life and the problems involved in the relationship of great bodies of people. For a number of years he had an editorial connection with the Chicago Tribune and the New York Tribune, and these experiences led him to an unprejudiced understanding of the opportunities open to the church for functions of service and usefulness that have not been adequately appreciated by the great body of church leaders. It has been the aim of his ministry to make his church a vital and direct influence upon the welfare of the community which it serves. A man of fearless character, he has not hesitated to point out to governing officials law breaking agencies that thrive because of apathy upon the part of citizens in general. He was the recipient of the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Cumberland University in 1918.

Rev. Mr. Welch married Miss Sarah Kennedy Burney, of Clarksville, Tennessee, in 1903. She died in 1912, the mother of three children, Robert, Clara and Sarah. In 1916 Rev. Mr. Welch married Evelyn Tylden Bridgman, a native of Staten Island, New York. They have one son, Charles Whitefield, Jr.

Mr. Smith served one term as a member of the Louisville City Council and two terms on the board of aldermen. He was a member of the board of safety during the administration of Mayor Barth. He is a Mason, a member of the Tavern Club, and has been an active participant in a number of movements for the larger advancement and welfare of his home city.

LAFAYETTE B. HALL. A gallant cavalryman under General Forrest during his youth, and with the mature years of his life and energies devoted to farming and other interests, the career of Lafayette B. Hall came to a close after twenty-four years of consecutive service in the office of county judge of Webster County, an office now filled with an appropriate fitness by his son.

Lafayette B. Hall was born on a farm in Webster County, near Slaughters, May 4, 1843, and both his father's and his mother's families were pioneers of Webster County, coming from Tennessee. The late Judge Hall was one of a family of two daughters and five sons, grew up on a farm and had a common school education, and was eighteen when he entered the Confederate army under the command of General Forrest. He served four years, and when the war was over he married and settled down to farming. Thereafter he continued to own land and be interested in the farming districts of Webster County the rest of his life. His death occurred suddenly August 14, 1903, while supervising some work in one of the fields of his farm.

Esteemed for his good business judgment and being very popular besides, he was frequently urged for places of trust and responsibility. He served one term as justice of the peace and was elected county judge in 1878. At every successive election he was returned by a vote of confidence in his ability and integrity, and for twenty-four years he administered the fiscal affairs and presided over the County Court. He was a staunch democrat, for many years affiliated with the Masonic Order and was a member of the Methodist Church. Judge Hall married Martha Williams, who died in 1905. They were the parents of six daughters and four sons, all but one now living. The Camp of the United Confederate Veterans at Dixon is very appropriately known as Camp Hall. Mrs. Hall was a member of the General Baptist Church, and was very active in the Eastern Star Chapter at Dixon, which is named in her honor, Martha Hall Chapter.

The present county judge of Webster County is Arthur Lafayette Hall, who was born at Dixon November 27, 1880. After finishing high school he took up with enthusiasm the duties of life, and much of the time has been identified with county offices. For six years he was deputy county court clerk. For two years he managed the Dixon office of the Cumberland Telephone Company. For the following five years he was deputy either to the Circuit Court clerk or the sheriff. Later for several years he was bookkeeper and office man for the Imperial Tobacco Company and other tobacco and coal companies. Returning to the court house as deputy sheriff, in 1917 he was elected county judge, and has given his entire time to the duties and responsibilities of this office since January, 1918. In 1920 he received a special distinction in election as secretary of the County Judges Association of Kentucky.

Judge Hall is a democrat, is chancellor commander of the Knights of Pythias Lodge and a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and for a quarter of a century has been identified with the Methodist Church. June 18, 1913, he married Miss Ora Smith, daughter of John Smith, and a sister of Dr. C. M. Smith, of Dixon, Kentucky.

WILLIAM EDWIN BOURLAND, of Dixon, is one of the accomplished lawyers of Western Kentucky, and is senior member of the firm of Bourland & Blackwell. Mr. Bourland is one of the few men in his profession who have kept their interests strictly within the law and have never gone into politics as an auxiliary of their profession. He has practiced law steadily for forty years, and is one of the older members of the Webster County bar.

While Mr. Bourland has spent most of his life in Kentucky, and his father was a native of the state, he himself was born at Neosho in Newton County, Missouri, August 7, 1856. The Bourland family is of remote Scotch ancestry, and the original spelling of the name was Borland. John Bourland, a native of Scotland, moved to Ireland, where he married. It is not known whether he came to America or not. Two of his sons came to this country, one eventually settling in the Western Reserve of Ohio and the other in Mississippi. This branch of the family is from the Mississippi ancestor. Gabriel L. Bourland, grandfather of the Dixon lawyer, was born in Virginia, served as a soldier in the War of 1812, and after living for some years in Mississippi came to Kentucky and settled in Hopkins County. Some member of the Bourland family has participated in every war of the nation except the Spanish-American. William Duke Bourland, father of William E., was born in Kentucky. He married Margaret Burgess Spann, who was born in South Carolina, daughter of William Spann, who settled in Nashville, Tennessee, and later went to Southwestern Missouri, about the time the lead mines were discovered in that district. William Duke Bourland and his wife met and married in Missouri, but in 1857 he returned to Kentucky with his family and settled in Hopkins County. He served as a Union soldier during the Civil war and was a farmer. He died before he was forty years of age, while his wife lived to be eighty-four. William E. Bourland's paternal grandfather lived to the age of ninety-two.

William Edwin Bourland was one of a family of four sons and two daughters, and was reared on his father's farm in Hopkins County. He attended country schools and later had the benefit of the inspiration and splendid instruction of Professor Swope in a private academy at Madisonville. For two years he studied law in the office of Waddill & Pratt at Madisonville, and was admitted to the bar in April, 1879. He practiced law at Madisonville nearly ten years, but since September, 1888, has been a member of the Dixon bar and here has satisfied all the normal ambitions for successful achievement in his profession, and has also lent his quiet influence as a citizen to the promotion of all good objects in his community. Until 1899 he voted as a republican, since which time he has been a democrat. On August 6, 1921, he was nominated for county attorney at the democratic primary, and is without opposition. He is a Knight Templar Mason and has also taken fourteen degrees of the Scottish Rite, is a member of the Knights of Pythias, and is an elder in the Presbyterian Church.

At Dixon in 1889 he married Miss Mabel Bentley. They have two sons and two daughters. The youngest son, Henry Goodson Bourland, had a military record during the late war, serving in France something over a year as an ambulance driver in the Hospital Corps.

PHILIP HARRIS WINSTON has been an active member of the bar at Sturgis for the past twenty years. He has lived most of his life in Union County, belongs to one of the old and leading families of that section of Western Kentucky, and has the interesting distinction of being a veteran of the Spanish-American war.

Mr. Winston was born on a farm in Union County

May 13, 1876, a son of Dr. Gustavus V. and Elizabeth (Dix) Winston. His grandfather, Maj. William Winston, served with distinction in the War of 1812, being with Virginia troops, and about 1840 brought his family to Union County, Kentucky. Doctor Winston was born in Henrico County, Virginia, and was about twenty-one years of age when he came to Kentucky. He practiced medicine for many years at Morganfield and at Caseyville, and spent his last years on a farm. He was a staunch democrat in politics. Doctor Winston married Elizabeth Dix, a native of Mason County, Kentucky, and whose people came to this state from New York.

Philip Harris Winston grew up on the homestead farm and early showed an inclination for studious pursuits. He attended common schools, was a teacher for two years, and in 1898, at the age of twenty-two, volunteered for service during the Spanish-American war. He spent six months with the Army of Occupation in Cuba and was discharged in 1899. He then resumed his law studies in Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tennessee, was graduated in 1900, and at once began practice in his native county. Mr. Winston served as a member of the Local Draft Board of Union County during the World war. He has always been very interested in democratic politics, beginning even before he was able to vote. He affiliates with the Royal Arch Masons, Knights of Pythias and Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is a member of the Christian Church.

In 1903 Mr. Winston married Miss Mary Elizabeth Luttrell, of Hickman, Kentucky. They have three children, Noma Dix, Mary Elizabeth and Omra L.

J. MACK THOMPSON, well known over the State of Kentucky as an able legislator, has for many years been a prominent lawyer at Sturgis in Union County, and his people have been in that section of Kentucky since pioneer days.

He was born on a farm near Caseyville in Union County August 3, 1867, a son of Andrew James McCorkle and Mary Elizabeth (Pierson) Thompson. His grandfather, Andrew Thompson, was born in Virginia, where his people were leading citizens of the locality known as Thomson Valley in Tazewell County. Andrew Thompson was a pioneer of what is now Webster County, locating at Wheatcroft. He spent his active life as a farmer and for many years was a magistrate. Andrew J. M. Thompson was born in that portion of Union County now Webster County and lived a long and useful life, being a farmer, merchant and tobacco-nist and serving two terms as sheriff of Union County. He died in his eighty-second year. He was a staunch democrat, and he and his wife were faithful members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Mary Elizabeth Pierson was born in Tennessee and died in her sixty-third year. Her father, William S. Pierson, came to Kentucky and settled in Union County when his daughter Elizabeth was a child. The home of the Piersons was on the site of the present Town of Sturgis.

J. Mack Thompson was the youngest of five children. The oldest, John B., is a retired merchant at Princeton, Kentucky; Andrew William for many years was a farmer and is now in the real estate business at Sturgis; Mary Melvina married H. M. Davis, of Morganfield; and Charlton M. is the wife of John D. Hedges, of Durant, Oklahoma.

J. Mack Thompson had the environment of a farm until he was twenty-two years of age. He attended local schools, studied law at Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tennessee, and began practice at Sturgis in 1892. With an accumulating prestige as a good lawyer he has had many of the honors of public life. He served as police judge and following that as mayor of Sturgis for seven years. In 1915 he was elected a member of the State Senate to represent Union and Henderson counties, and in 1919 became Union

Eli H. Brown

County's representative in the Lower House of the Legislature. Mr. Thompson is author of House Bill No. 195 enacted in 1920, providing for the oiling of streets and alleys in cities of fourth and fifth classes. He is a democrat, a member of the Presbyterian Church, and is a Master Mason and Knight of Pythias.

On November 15, 1893, Mr. Thompson married Minnie J. Wallace. They have one son, Horace M. Thompson.

CHARLES MOREHEAD SMITH, M. D. Thirty-five years of work as a physician and surgeon lends a special dignity to the reputation of Doctor Smith in Webster County. While he has faithfully discharged his duties and obligations as a man of medicine, he has also cultivated other interests, particularly as a scientific and practical horticulturist, and is owner of a large fruit orchard in Webster County.

His birth occurred on a farm in that county December 9, 1863, while his father was in the Confederate army. He is a son of John W. and Mary (Mooney) Smith, both natives of Webster County. His paternal grandfather, Hiram Smith, was born in Virginia and was a boy when his parents moved to Kentucky. Of the four sons of Hiram Smith, two, John and Frank, were Confederate soldiers. Just at the close of the war two of the brothers, Frank and Charles M., died, while another brother, Willie Pearson Smith, moved to Texas, where he is still living. John W. Smith after the war took up the vocation of a farmer, and continued that work the rest of his life. He finally moved to Missouri, and died there in 1893, soon afterward. He was a democrat and a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. By his first marriage, to Mary Mooney, who died at the age of forty-one, he had ten children. He afterward married Sarah Clark, who is still living.

Doctor Smith grew up on a farm and supplemented his advantages in the country schools with the high school at Dixon. For his professional education he attended Washington University at St. Louis and graduated in medicine in 1885. He at once returned to the county seat of his home county, and for many years has had all of the practice that his time and energies make it possible to serve. Doctor Smith has kept in close touch with the advanced standards of the medical profession and has taken several post-graduate courses in New York and Chicago. He is a member of the Webster County and Kentucky State and the American Medical Association.

Doctor Smith's orchard, the largest in Webster County, comprises eighty-one acres and has been scientifically handled in every department. It produces great quantities of perfect fruit, commanding the highest price on the market. Its principal crops are apples, peaches, pears and cherries. The orchard is handled on a commercial scale, and the product is shipped in carload lots.

Doctor Smith is a democrat, is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias and he and his wife are members of the Presbyterian Church. In 1886 he married Miss Mary Campbell. Her father was the late Dr. G. W. Campbell, who died after many years of laborious work as a country physician in Webster County. In his youth he served as a soldier in the Mexican war, and he also did farming in connection with his profession. He was one of the greatly beloved old doctors of this district of Western Kentucky. Doctor and Mrs. Smith had five children: Carl, Frank, Roy, Ruth, and Charles M., Jr. All are living except Frank.

H. R. LEVICK, JR., represents the profession of technical experts who handle the complicated business of oil production. Mr. Levick has been in practically all the important oil fields of North America, and is now general manager of the Associated Producers Company at Lexington.

This is a Pennsylvania corporation, with main offices at New York City, the president being Frank Haskell. It is the producing branch of the Tidewater Oil Company in the eastern oil fields of the United States. The Associated Producers Company is one of the oldest organizations of its kind, and has been identified with field work in Pennsylvania for thirty-two years, in West Virginia for a quarter of a century, and also in Illinois and other districts. The scene of operations of the company in Kentucky is Lee and Estill counties, where they have been active for the past three years, operating leased lands. The company has 124 producing wells, some of which they bought outright from other companies, and is rapidly extending its work in Kentucky territory. The company has an investment of over a million dollars in Kentucky, with about sixty men in the personnel of office and field staff. The parent company operates a refinery at Bayonne, New Jersey, with a production of 20,000 barrels of refined oil daily and by-products.

Mr. Levick spent his early life in Philadelphia, but for twenty-two years has been through all the ramifications of the oil industry, both in field and office and in other technical branches. His experience has been gained in the fields of Oklahoma, Kansas, California and Old Mexico and he came to Kentucky as general superintendent for the Associated Producers Company in the Kentucky district.

Mr. Levick is also a vice president of the Kentucky Oil Men's Association. He is a member of the Lexington Country Club and the Lexington Club. He married in California Freda Lotzin of San Francisco. They have two children, Paula and Barbara.

ELI HUSTON BROWN, JR., was born at Owensboro, Kentucky. He is a son of Eli Huston Brown and his wife, Nancy Washington Dorsey Brown. Mr. Brown resided in Owensboro with his father and mother from the date of his birth until the family removed to Louisville to reside. He continued to reside in Louisville until the death of his mother, after which he, with his brothers and sister, went to Bloomfield, Nelson County, Kentucky, to reside with his mother's grandmother and her family.

Mr. Brown was educated in the public and private schools at Bloomfield. He entered the Kentucky University, now Transylvania University, at Lexington, Kentucky. He attended there for three years, completing the course and graduating third in his class, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. After his graduation he returned to Bloomfield and taught school for three years, the last two years being principal of the Bloomfield School.

While teaching school he pursued his law studies and attended the summer law school at the University of Virginia. He was admitted to the practice of law by Judge W. T. Owens in Owensboro, Kentucky. In 1898 Mr. Brown became a candidate for the democratic nomination for member of the General Assembly from Nelson County. After a hotly contested election he secured the nomination on May 6, 1899. In September of that year he located in Bardstown, the county seat of Nelson County, for the practice of his profession.

Mr. Brown was again elected a member of the General Assembly, without opposition, from Nelson County in 1901 and 1903. At the session of the General Assembly beginning January, 1904, he was elected speaker of the House of Representatives over three opponents, Herman D. Newcomb of Louisville, C. C. Spalding of Lebanon, and E. E. Barton of Falmouth.

During the six years Mr. Brown served as a member of the General Assembly he took a prominent part in all legislative matters. He served during the stormy session of 1900, when the contested election of William Goebel and W. S. Taylor was being tried. After the succession of J. C. W. Beckham to the governorship upon the death of William Goebel. Mr.

Brown became the administration leader in the House of Representatives, and continued as such as long as he was a member of the General Assembly. He was one of the sub-committee of three to rewrite the entire election law of Kentucky at the special session of the General Assembly during the summer of 1900.

From the time Mr. Brown located in Bardstown in 1899 until he left there in September, 1904, he was engaged in most of the important litigations that occurred in Bardstown during that time.

In September, 1904, Mr. Brown moved to Frankfort, Kentucky, to practice law, having formed a law partnership with Judge Lewis McQuown of Bowling Green, under the firm name of McQuown and Brown. This firm continued in existence until 1907, when Mr. McQuown on account of ill health retired from the practice of law. Mr. McQuown was a distinguished lawyer and a former Confederate soldier. Mr. Brown continued to practice law at Frankfort until August 1, 1909, when he became associated with Lewis A. Nuckols, of Versailles, Kentucky, under the firm name of Brown and Nuckols. This partnership continued until August 1, 1916, when Mr. Nuckols withdrew from the firm and located at Hazard, Kentucky, and later at Roanoke, Virginia, as assistant general counsel for the Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Company. Mr. Brown continued to practice law at Frankfort until his removal to Louisville, Kentucky, September 1, 1918.

In 1906 the General Assembly of Kentucky elected Mr. Brown a member of the State Board of Prison Commissioners, and after his term of four years he was re-elected. At the election of 1910 he was the caucus nominee of both the democratic and republican parties, and received the unanimous vote of the General Assembly. Mr. Brown served as chairman of the Board of Prison Commissioners during a large part of his term of office, and the prisons of the state were marked by great improvement, both in their physical and financial condition during his incumbency.

When Governor A. O. Stanley became governor in December, 1915, he tendered Mr. Brown the chairmanship of the Board of Prison Commissioners, but the offer was declined. However, Mr. Brown was appointed attorney for the State Insurance Board, and continued in that office until June, 1918. He has enjoyed an extensive law practice continuously since a few years after he became a practicing lawyer.

His practice has grown in volume and in importance. He has numbered among his clients some of the largest corporations and business concerns in the country, and he has handled the matters entrusted to him to their satisfaction. Mr. Brown has been employed by the state on many occasions to represent it in important litigations. In addition to his extensive law practice he has been active in business. He has served as a director in the Capital Trust Company and the Peoples State Bank at Frankfort; president of the Wayne Land Company; secretary, treasurer and director of the Fibercraft Chair Company; director of the Swiss Oil Corporation, as well as of many smaller corporations. Mr. Brown is a member of the Kentucky Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the American Prison Association, the Frankfort Lodge of Elks and the Kappa Alpha College Fraternity.

He became a member of the Christian Church in 1891. Mrs. Brown and her family, who had resided in Frankfort for many years, were members of the First Presbyterian Church at Frankfort, and upon Mr. Brown's removal to Frankfort in 1904 he and his wife associated themselves with the congregation of the First Presbyterian Church, where their membership continued until their removal to Louisville, Kentucky.

On December 17, 1902, he married Miss Rose Mc-

Knight Crittenden, of Frankfort, where she was born and had always lived. Mrs. Brown is a daughter of John Allen Crittenden and his wife, Virginia Lafon Jackson Crittenden. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Brown, the first of whom, a little girl, died in infancy. The other three children are living and in the order of birth are Virginia Crittenden Brown, Eli Huston Brown, III, and Dorsey Washington Brown.

Eli Huston Brown, Jr., is a descendant, through his mother, from some of the earliest settlers of the Colonies of Virginia and Maryland. He is a lineal descendant of both Maj. Edward Dorsey and his brother, Col. John Dorsey, who were among the most distinguished of the earliest settlers of Maryland, and who settled in that province before 1650. He is also a lineal descendant of Col. Nickolas Greenberry of the Colony of Maryland, who settled there prior to 1700. He is also a descendant of Capt. Thomas Todd, William Griffith, Capt. John Howard, all prominent in the Colonial history of Maryland, and all of whose descendants acquire through them eligibility to membership in the Societies of Colonial Dames, Colonial Wars, etc. Daniel Jennings and Capt. Richard Stephens, both of Virginia, and Col. Richard Dorsey, of Maryland, were ancestors of the subject of this sketch and each a Revolutionary soldier during the War of American Independence. Mr. Brown is a descendant of Eli Stone, an early settler in Fairfax county, Virginia. His son, John Stone, emigrated to Nelson County, Kentucky, in April, 1790, coming down the Kanawa and Ohio rivers in a flat boat with his family and slaves and located on a farm near Bloomfield, Nelson County, Kentucky, which he owned at his death and which has continuously been owned since that day by his descendants.

Miss Rose McKnight Crittenden, wife of the subject of this sketch, is descended from pioneer ancestors who settled in Virginia in the early days of that colony. She is a lineal descendant of Capt. Thomas Harris, Maj. William Harris, John Uphaw, Maj. Peter Field, Col. Thomas Turpin, Christopher Branch and Henry Soane, all of whom were early members of the Virginia House of Burgesses, Henry Soane being speaker of that House, most of these ancestors having seen service in the Colonial wars. All of their names are familiar ones in the early history of Virginia. Mrs. Brown is also a lineal descendant of Nickolas Lafon and Maj. John Crittenden, both of whom were distinguished soldiers in the War of the American Revolution. Mrs. Brown is also a descendant of Gen. Benjamin Logan, a distinguished Kentucky pioneer, and Col. John Allen, who commanded a regiment at the battle of the River Raisin in the War of 1812, in which he lost his life. Mrs. Brown is a granddaughter of Henry Crittenden, who was also a soldier in the War of 1812 and afterward secretary of state of Kentucky. Henry Crittenden was a brother of John J. Crittenden governor of Kentucky, United States senator from Kentucky and attorney general of the United States. Mrs. Brown's father, John Allen Crittenden, lived in Frankfort a great part of his life and was connected with the auditor's office for a great many years. The latter had several brothers, one being Col. William Crittenden, who was an officer in the United States army and a graduate of West Point, who resigned from the army and enlisted in the Lopez Expedition to free Cuba. He was captured in company with a great many others of his regiment, and was shot by the Spanish authorities in Havana in 1852. Another brother of John Allen Crittenden was Thomas T. Crittenden who was governor of Missouri, consul to Mexico and member of Congress from Missouri.

FRANK O'NEALE YOUNG, M. D., has to his credit more than forty years of active practice as a physician and surgeon at Lexington and represents a family that has been in Fayette County considerably more than a century.

His great-grandfather Richard Young spent his life in Virginia. The grandfather Ambrose Young was born in Virginia, married there a Miss Alcock, and in the early years of the nineteenth century came West with wagon and team and acquired a tract of land in the woods eight miles from Lexington. Ambrose Young lived out his life in that community, and was a successful slave holding planter. His son Richard B. Young was born April 2, 1808, in the old Fayette County homestead. As a youth he learned the tanner's trade and for many years, though a resident of Lexington, he conducted a tannery in Boyle County, and sold its extensive output to the eastern markets of Philadelphia and Boston. He died at Lexington January 26, 1873. Richard B. Young married Jane O'Neale of Scotch ancestry. Her father Frank O'Neale was a native of Ireland and her mother Mary Ferguson was born in Virginia, but they lived after their marriage in Woodford County, Kentucky. Mrs. Richard Young was born at Harper's Ferry, Virginia, November 16, 1816, and died October 11, 1900. Her two sons were Frank O'Neale Young and Lucien Young.

Frank O'Neale Young was born at Lexington November 13, 1850, was educated in the public schools of his native city, and in 1870 graduated from Beech Grove College in Tennessee. Doctor Young received his medical degree from the University of Louisville in 1874, and for five years practiced at Liberty, Kentucky, but since then his home and professional work has been in Lexington. During Governor Beckham's administration he served as a member of the State Board of Health and has used his profession in many ways to advance the interests and welfare of his city and state. He is a member of the County and State Medical societies and the American Medical Association and has served as a member of the Lexington Board of Education and Board of Aldermen, is a Knight Templar Mason, Odd Fellow, Knight of Pythias, and Elk. He has long been identified with the Episcopal Church.

June 15, 1881, Doctor Young married Addie Barkley, a native of Fayette County and daughter of William L. and Addie (Lafon) Barkley. She died December 18, 1892, leaving no children. June 25, 1896, Doctor Young married Effie Hill, who was born in Hartford, Kentucky, daughter of Gen. Samuel E. and Naomi (Baird) Hill. The only daughter of Doctor Young is Jane Ewing Young, who in October, 1915, became the wife of Robert Hampton, Jr., of Titusville, Pennsylvania. His father Robert Hampton, Sr., is secretary and treasurer of the Gas Company at Lexington and president of the Frankfort Kentucky Gas Company. Robert Hampton, Jr., is now manager of the Cherry Lumber Company at Cincinnati. Mr. and Mrs. Hampton have two children, Katherine and Effie.

LUCIEN YOUNG, younger brother of Dr. Frank O. Young of Lexington, owed allegiance to Kentucky as the state of his birth, though his career has been written large on the pages of American naval history. A brief sketch of this American naval officer has an appropriate place in this publication.

He was born at Lexington March 31, 1852, was appointed to the U. S. Naval Academy June 21, 1869, graduated May 31, 1873, as a midshipman, and the dates fixed for his successive promotions were as follows: Ensign, July 16, 1874; Master, November 24, 1877; Lieutenant, May 1, 1884; Lieutenant Commander, March 3, 1899; Commander, March 5, 1902; Captain, July 1, 1906; and was promoted to the rank of Rear Admiral March 17, 1910, being next to the youngest officer of that grade at the time.

From 1873 to 1875 he served on the "Alaska" and "Hartford," and while midshipman on his first voyage on the "Alaska" on July 23, 1873, he jumped overboard while under way at sea and saved the life of a seaman who had been knocked overboard. For this he was given mention in a general order by the Secretary of Navy for extraordinary heroism, was awarded a gold medal by the New York Benevolent and Life Saving Institution, and a framed certificate by the Humane Society of Massachusetts. During the same voyage while in Lisbon Harbor his act in rescuing five persons from a wreck at the mouth of the Tagus River brought him the offer of a medal by the King of Portugal, which he declined.

From 1875 to 1876 he was with the "Powhatan," on the "Huron" from March, 1876, to November 24, 1877. On the latter date the "Huron" was wrecked on the North Carolina coast, and for his extraordinary heroism in swimming ashore and carrying the line and making possible the saving of many lives from the doomed vessel he received a letter of thanks from the Secretary of Navy, a gold medal of the first class from the U. S. Life Saving Service, a sword from Kentucky, and was made an honorary member of the Kentucky Legislature, the first honor of the kind awarded to anyone from the time of Henry Clay. By nomination from the President and confirmation of the Senate he was advanced to the rank of Master by special act of Congress, this being the first time that a naval officer was promoted by an act of Congress during time of peace.

His service during 1878-80 was at Portsmouth, and he was on special duty at the Paris Exposition in 1878 and proffered the medal of the Legion of Honor which he declined. He was on duty with the Bureau of Equipment from 1880 to 1882, was on the "Montauk" in 1882, the "Kearsarge" in 1883, the "Minnesota" in the same year, the "Onward" 1883-84, the "Shenandoah" 1884 to 1886, and in 1887 was instructor in torpedoes and at the Naval War College. During 1887-80 he was with the Bureau of Equipment and aide to the Secretary of the Navy and was in the Library and War Records office from 1889 to 1891, and again from 1893 to 1896. During 1891-93 he was on duty on the "Boston," and took a prominent part in the protection of American interests during the Hawaiian revolution. He returned to sea in 1896 on the "Detroit," and the following year was on the "Boston," "Yorktown" and "Alert." During the Spanish-American war he was commander of the "Hist" from June, 1898, to January, 1899. He was advanced three numbers for "eminent and conspicuous conduct in battles during the Spanish war while in command of the "Hist." During 1899-1900 he was captain of the Port of Havana and in command of the Marines on the Island of Cuba and during 1900-01 was commandant of the United States Naval Station at Havana. He received a commendatory letter from the mayor and city council of Havana for saving life and property during the severe storm that inundated the country adjacent to the city. During 1902-04 he was inspector of the Ninth Lighthouse District with headquarters at Chicago. During 1904-05 he was commander of the "Bennington." When that vessel was wrecked by the explosion of its boiler while in the San Diego Harbor July 21, 1905, his coolness averted a greater disaster by beaching the boat. Subsequently he was on duty at the Mare Island Navy Yard as captain of the Yard and president of the permanent court martial, examining and retiring boards on the Pacific Coast. He was complimented by letter from the Secretary of Navy and officials of San Francisco for his services at the time of the earthquake and fire. Subsequently as rear admiral he was commandant of the Naval Station at Key West, Florida, and in 1912 was promoted to commandant of the Philadelphia Navy Yards. While on a brief leave preparatory to assuming his duties he died at Waldorf Astoria in New York October 2, 1912, and was buried in Arlington Cemetery.

Admiral Young was the author of a standard work on Navigation, and also of Archaeological Researches in Peru, the Real Hawaii, and other literary efforts. In June, 1895, at Washington he married Belle Parker of Virginia, who survives him and resides at Washington.

HARRY C. CRAMER, president of the Lexington Brick Company, is a member of a notable family in the industrial affairs of Lexington. His father, the late F. A. Cramer, was the engineer who built the water-works of the city and was also for many years identified with the Lexington Brick Company, which has been to a large extent owned and operated by the Cramer family for over thirty years.

The Lexington Brick Company was established under that name in 1880, its original owners being John William Lell and J. Easton Keller. A charter of incorporation was taken out in 1885 with Mr. Lell as president, while S. A. Charles became secretary. The late F. A. Cramer acquired the controlling stock and became president of the company in 1888, and continued as president until his death, when he was succeeded by his son Harry C. Cramer. The secretary of the company since 1888 has been Mr. Cramer.

This corporation has a capital stock of $75,000, and it owns seventy acres of land around the plant. The company at one time operated three other plants. The present capacity of this plant is 50,000 brick per day, chiefly common building brick. The plant has a full equipment of modern machinery for every process of manufacture. There are sixty-five employes, and some of the men have been continuously identified with the industry for thirty years. The output is completely consumed in Central Kentucky.

Harry C. Cramer was born at Rock Island, Illinois, in 1880. The interesting career and work done by his father are described on other pages of this publication. Harry C. Cramer grew up at Lexington, attended the high school and business college and as a youth went to work in his father's brick yard at 50 cents per day. He learned every detail of the business both in the manufacturing and sales end, and for four years before his father's death was vice president and general manager of the business. Mr. Cramer is a young business man alert to every interest connected with the advancement and welfare of Lexington. He is a member of the Board of Commerce, and is the present exalted ruler of the Lodge of Elks and was representative to the Grand Lodge at Los Angeles in 1921. He is also a Mason and a member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles. At the age of thirty-four he married Miss Sadie L. Heflin, of Springfield, Ohio. Mrs. Cramer is a member of St. Peter's Catholic Church.

FRANK VERNON WINSTEAD, M. D. An unvarying devotion to the routine of his profession through a long period of years has brought Doctor Winstead a reputation for fidelity and reliability that has endeared him to a large practice in several communities of Western Kentucky.

Doctor Winstead, who is now practicing medicine in Dixon, in the county where he was reared from early boyhood, was born in Hopkins County, Kentucky, April 15, 1869, a son of James Robert and Rachel (Daniel) Winstead, also natives of Hopkins County. His parents live at Dixon, and for forty years have been residents of Webster County. His father is now seventy-three and the mother seventy-two, and until they retired they lived on a farm. James R. Winstead has always been a staunch democrat, and he served three terms as county assessor of Webster County. He is affiliated with the Masonic Order and Independent Order of Odd Fellows, is a Methodist, and his wife is a member of the Christian Church. They reared a family of three sons and one daughter.

Doctor Winstead grew up on his father's farm in Webster County, and was educated in the common schools and in the National Institute of Mathematics at Madisonville. Then to complete his literary education he entered the University of Louisville, and graduated in medicine in 1892. For three years he practiced in his native county, at Vanderburg, and for eighteen years had his home and center of practice at Tilden. Since 1912 he has been a resident of Dixon and is held in high regard as a general physician and also frequently called for consultation in special cases. He took two courses in diseases of the stomach in the New York Polyclinic. He is a member of the Webster County and Kentucky State Medical associations. Doctor Winstead is a Knight Templar and Scottish Rite Mason and Shriner, a member of the Lodge and Encampment of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Uniform Rank, Knights of Pythias, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and both branches of the Woodmen. For thirty years he has been a member of the Christian Church, and in politics supports the democratic party. Doctor Winstead has acquired some property and business interests, especially in farm lands. In 1892 he married Miss Ella F. Ramsey, of Vanderburg, Kentucky. They have a son and daughter, Jimmie and Ramsey Winstead. The former is the wife of Ray Melton.

ALEXANDER HUGHES has been in business at Lexington for a much longer period of years than his age would seem to justify. While in school he sold newspapers and afterwards was steadily employed for ten years or more by some of the local grocery merchants, and from them he learned the business with some individual ideas and plans of his own which he put into execution about ten years ago. Mr. Hughes has since developed one of the largest and most completely stocked and liberally patronized grocery stores in Lexington.

He had practically no capital to begin with when he started in 1910. His store stands on the site of the old Stoll homestead at the corner of Second and Walnut streets. The old Stoll house had burned and the store was erected on the site of one of the old resident landmarks of the city. Mr. Hughes established his business on the plan of strictly cash sales, and has adhered to that plan even with greatly increased capital and credit facilities. He now has about $20,000 invested in his business, but gives it as close personal supervision today as at any time. His is a cash store, with deliveries, and his business has grown to a satisfactory volume because of the quality of merchandise and the small margin of profit on sales. The store has seven busy employes.

Mr. Hughes was born in Lexington in September, 1880, son of Alexander and Mary A. Hughes. His father was born at Ripley, Ohio, November 5, 1836, and died August 7, 1884. In early life he learned telegraphy and during the Civil war he enlisted in the Tenth Kentucky Cavalry and was assigned to duty as a telegraph operator in the Federal headquarters at the corner of Second and Market streets in Lexington. After the war he was an operator for the Western Union Company and was in its service at the time of his death. May 29, 1864, Alexander M. Hughes married Mary A. Robins, who is still living at the old home at 418 North Broadway. She was born at Lewisburg, Greenbrier County, Virginia, July 6, 1841, and was taken to Paris, Kentucky, in 1849. Her father William H. H. Robins had moved to Kentucky in 1846. He was a carriage maker by trade. His first wife was Louisa Curtis who died at Paris. He then married her sister Mary Curtis and in 1849 moved to Lexington. Mr. Robins at Lexington became identified with the Nat Cropper carriage works and was consecutively employed in that industry until his death. In 1870 he moved to 418 North Broadway, where his daughter Mrs. Hughes is still living. Mrs. Hughes is an active member of the women's clubs and the organizations of incorporated the business with $10,000 capital. The capital is now $25,000 and the offices and plant occupy grounds with 65 foot frontage on West Main Street and extending 240 feet back to West Short Street. A private switch yard gives them access to railroad facilities. In 1920 the company did a business of a $100,000. The first year their total business amounted to $6,400. The partners had only $900 between them when they started. They now have twenty-six employees including nineteen skilled cutters. Two salesmen represent the company all over the Blue Grass section. The president of the company is H. D. Cloud while the vice president is Henry T. Duncan and the secretary and treasurer is W. M. Ingram. Mr. Cloud has active charge and superintendence of the shops while Mr. Ingram is the office and sales manager.

H. D. Cloud was born at the great granite center of Barre, Vermont, and practically grew up in granite quarries. He came to Kentucky in 1909.

Mr. Ingram was born at Aberdeen, Scotland, and learned his trade there, spending ten years in perfecting himself as a draftsman and designer. He came to the United States in 1907 and was also located at Barre, Vermont, until he came to Lexington. Both know the granite and monument business in every detail and by giving their enterprise the benefit of all their time and abilities they have achieved success and done something to make the commercial service of Lexington of broader benefit to the State.

Mr. Ingram is a member of the Masonic Order and Mr. Cloud is a Knight of Columbus. Mr. Cloud married at Barre, Vermont, Mary Ann Seivwright, a native of Scotland. They have four children, Helen, James, Florence and Mary Ann. Mr. Ingram married in Vermont Maggie Jane Annand, also a native of Scotland. They have two daughters, Isabel D. and Margaret A.

In the fifteen years since he began practice Doctor Kemp has achieved the reputation of being a physician and surgeon of unusual skill and very thorough and conscientious in all that he does. He is one of the leading members of his profession in Webster County, and is now located at Dixon.

He was born on a farm in Crittenden County March 30, 1884, a son of George D. and Sarah J. (Towery) Kemp. Doctor Kemp is a democrat, is affiliated with the Masonic Order, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Modern Woodmen of America.

On December 6, 1905, he married Elvah Babb, a native of Crittenden County, daughter of Wesley Milton and Margaret (Sisk) Babb, both of whom were born in Crittenden County, where they always lived. Her father is now seventy-five and her mother fifty-nine. Her father for many years was a well known school teacher, also served as county assessor, and until he retired was one of the leading farmers of that locality. He was a son of Wesley and Margaret (Spence) Babb, who were North Carolina people and pioneers of Crittenden County. Mrs. Kemp's father served three years as a Union soldier. He is a republican, has been a Mason for over fifty years, and both her parents are members of the Baptist Church. The first run of beer was made May 1, 1898, and was put on the market July 20, 1898. At that time the plant had an annual capacity of about 30,000 barrels and employed about thirty men. The business was subsequently enlarged and later John Gund became proprietor and continued the business until March, 1919, having in the meantime increased its capacity to 70,000 barrels. In 1920 under Mr. Kloecker's management the Lexington Brewing Company remodeled and extended its plant and installed the most modern facilities for the manufacture of ice cream. This branch of the business is the Dixie Ice Cream Company. This plant required about $125,000 additional investment. ASA C. CHINN is senior member of the firm Chinn & Lawwill, real estate, who in recent years have performed a notable service at Lexington in financing and carrying out a number of home building projects, including a number of the finest residences in the city.

Mr. Chinn, who was born at Lexington June 8, 1877, is a son of the late A. B. Chinn, and a grandson of Dr. Joseph G. Chinn. This is one of the oldest families of Central Kentucky and was established here by William B. Chinn, a Virginian who served in the Virginia Militia in the Revolutionary war. After that war William B. Chinn came to Kentucky and established a home in Bourbon County, where he followed farming until his death at the age of sixty.

His son Dr. Joseph G. Chinn was born in Bourbon County April 1, 1797, and his life covered nearly all of the nineteenth century. He died at the age of ninety-three. While he attended the country schools he was largely self educated. At the age of fifteen he volunteered for service in the War of 1812, and while in the army was severely injured in one foot. After the war he took up the study of medicine in the office of Dr. Andrew Todd in Bourbon County, and also read under physicians at Paris, Kentucky. While a student he was appointed surgeon's mate to Doctor Todd, then surgeon of the Twenty-first Regiment of Kentucky Militia. On the death of Doctor Todd he was appointed surgeon and held that office until the repeal of the militia laws of the state. This feature is one which has contributed largely to Louisville's supremacy, as it is a fact that the interests here demand strenuous action and trained ability, and where men possessing these qualities congregate success is sure to follow as well as further enlargement of business fields and operating opportunities. Among the men of action and ability of Louisville who have contributed to its prestige through their connection with large affairs is Laurel Winter Botts, president of the Fidelity and Columbia Trust Company, who is also identified with other large concerns.

Mr. Botts was born May 11, 1866, in Shelby County, Kentucky, a son of William Harvey and Elizabeth (Bohannon) Botts. He was a member of the various organizations of his profession and stood high in the estimation of his fellow-practitioners, being also a public-spirited citizen of his community and a faithful member of the Baptist Church. JAMES WILLIAM PFEFFER has had almost a life long experience in the farming affairs of Union County, is also well known in business circles, and for several years past has made his home in Uniontown.

He was born on a farm in Union County December 1, 1850, a son of Joseph Sexton and Mary Ann (Coomes) Pfeffer. His father was a native of Germany, came to the United States in 1848, about the time of the German Revolution, and was married in Union County to Miss Coomes, who was born there and represented an old Kentucky family. Joseph S. Pfeffer was a shoemaker by trade, but on coming to Union County lived on a farm and supplemented his farm income with operating a cobbling shop at his home. He and his wife were devout Catholics, and he died at the age of seventy-eight. The widowed mother is still living, at the age of eighty-eight, her home being with her son James W.

James W. Pfeffer was one of a family of three sons and six daughters, all of whom grew up on the farm. He acquired a common school education and was at home until the age of twenty-one. On March 24, 1881, he married Miss Susan Catherine Ruark, a native of Union County. While no children have blessed their union, Mr. and Mrs. Pfeffer have reared four in their home, and both are people whose kindly interest have extended to church, philanthropy and the general welfare of their community.

After his marriage Mr. Pfeffer settled on a farm and kept his home in the country until 1917, when he removed to Uniontown. He still supervises his farming interests, but for a number of years has been engaged in the grain business and is vice president and general manager of the Wabash Elevated Company. A democrat, he has never sought office, and is an active member of the Catholic Church in Uniontown.

W. B. JONES is manager of the Lexington District for the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. He was educated for the law but took up insurance instead, and for nearly twenty years has been with the Metropolitan Life and is one of the very resourceful and effective men in the great organization.

Prior to 1902 the Metropolitan was represented by a very small business in and around Lexington. In 1902 the Metropolitan acquired the Lexington business of the Sun Life of Louisville and the American Life of Lexington, and forthwith began building up a business on large scale operations. The first superintendent of the Lexington district for the Metropolitan Life was R. C. Ware, who after some seven years was succeeded by W. B. Jones in 1912. The State of Kentucky is divided into eleven districts by the Metropolitan Life. The Lexington Agency now has about thirty-two thousand policy holders and features both the industrial and ordinary life policies. In ordinary life there are about 7,000 policy holders in this district, and the company also does an increasing business in the group plan of insurance, applicable to banks and other corporations. The business of the Lexington District has doubled in the last nine years, and the personnel of the company in the district, including office employees and solicitors, numbers about twenty-four.

W. B. Jones was born in West Virginia in 1879. His father was a minister of the United Brethren Church. He acquired his education in his native state, and graduated from the law school of the University of West Virginia in 1902. He at once entered the insurance field with the Metropolitan Life and for several years before coming to Lexington was at Akron, Ohio.

Mr. Jones is a member of the Board of Commerce, is a director of the Lexington Boy Scouts and a member of its executive committee and Scout council. He is president of the Lions Club and was one of its organizers. The Lions like the Kiwanis and Rotary Clubs is made up of business men, and these organizations have done much to arouse Lexington to an appreciation of its wonderful opportunities in a commercial way. Mr. Jones is a Knight Templar and Scottish Rite Mason, and for several years was a member of the Shriners Patrol. For three years he served as president of the Blue Grass Underwriters Association.

In 1914 Mr. Jones married Miss Guy Lee Cochran of Owensboro, Kentucky. She is a member of the Christian Science Church.

THOMAS SMALL WALLER, JR., is one of the young, progressive lawyers of western Kentucky, and since his admission to the bar has rapidly achieved all the elements of professional success and honor at Morganfield, his home city.

He was born at Morganfield October 12, 1890, a son of Benjamin Gibson and Pearl (Ray) Waller. His father for many years has been a Morganfield merchant. Reared in his native town, where he attended public schools, Mr. Waller has a most thorough and liberal education preparatory to his professional career. In 1912 he received the degree Bachelor of Science from Vanderbilt University at Nashville, and then went east to Yale University Law School, where he received his law diploma in 1914. He was admitted to the Kentucky bar the same year, and since then has been busily engaged in practice at Morganfield.

Since January, 1918, Mr. Waller has also been county treasurer of Union County. He is a democrat and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1915 he married Miss Lucile Nunn, daughter of Dr. Will H. Nunn, of Morganfield.

CHARLES CLAY TUCKER during early life was a school teacher, for many years has been busily engaged with extensive farming interests in Union County, was called from the farm to the duties of county office, and is now rendering most effective service as county judge.

Judge Tucker was born in Bullitt County, Kentucky, August 12, 1871, a son of Theophilus and Josephine (Hibbs) Tucker. His father was born in Spencer County, September 13, 1834, and has had his home in Union County since November 24, 1874, being numbered among the substantial farmers of the county. His wife was born in Nelson County, Kentucky, April 5, 1844. Her mother was a daughter of Henry Christ, a distinguished Kentucky pioneer, who operated the first salt works in the state.

Oldest of five children, Charles Clay Tucker grew up on a farm in Union County from the age of three, and until seventeen attended country school. At that time he bought his time from his father at $15 a month until he should be twenty-one. For a period of ten years he alternated between school teaching and operating a farm, but after that gave his entire time to farming, and still has a small amount of land cultivated under his general supervision.

His first important public office was that of tax commissioner of Union County, to which he was elected in 1913. He served four years, then, in 1917, was chosen county judge, and has since presided over the County Court and has handled the fiscal affairs of the county with singular good judgment and economy during the war period and reconstruction times.

Judge Tucker is a democrat, is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias, and is a member of the Methodist Church. In 1894 he married Miss Rosa Ghormley. She died in 1901, the mother of three children, Shellie, Amelia and Clara. In 1907 Judge Tucker married Mrs. Birdie Whitlege, and they have two children, named Roscoe and Glenville.

WILLIAM R. MILWARD conducts a funeral and undertaking establishment at 159-163 North Broadway, Lexington, which historically is one of the oldest undertaking establishments in the Middle West, since the business has been continuous in one family through three generations, for nearly a century.

His grandfather, Joseph Milward, was a Lexington undertaker as early as 1825. The chief qualification of an undertaker at that time was ability as a cabinet maker and casket maker, and he had a shop in which most of the caskets used were manufactured. At that time the Milward place of business was on Main Street, near the site of the old Fort, where the settlers in a time not very remote had protected themselves from the Indians.

Joseph Milward in 1856, about thirty years after he started in business at Lexington, took in his son J. U. Milward as a partner, and by that time the business had become a wholesale and retail furniture house. It was continued as Milward & Son until 1867, when William R. Milward, Sr., bought an interest and the business title was changed to Milward & Company. At that time a three story building was erected on Main Street, and the furniture and undertaking business rapidly grew in importance and volume. J. U. Milward retired in 1887, at which time W. R. Milward, Sr., moved to 5 East Main Street and continued business as undertaker and funeral director. At that date he associated with him his eldest son, Stanley Milward, and in 1892 William R. Milward, Jr. became associated with the business. The next removal of the plant came in 1895, to 9 East Short Street, and since 1906 the business has been conducted in the three story building at 159-163 North Broadway, in a building especially erected and equipped for the purpose. The first floor, 66x200 feet, contains the offices and automobile depository, the second floor contains the show room and chapel, and the entire building is devoted to the needs of the business.

William R. Milward, Sr., who was born at Lexington February 5, 1842, and died April 19, 1913, joined the Union Army at the age of nineteen as first lieutenant of Company A, Twenty-first Kentucky Infantry. He was several times promoted, and when he was mustered out in 1866 was lieutenant colonel commanding his regiment. As noted above, he bought an interest in the business soon after coming out of the army, and for nearly half a century was closely identified with this business and with the affairs of Lexington. He was a very active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He married Arabella Bright, who was born at Louisville, Kentucky. Of their four children three are still living.

William R. Milward, Jr., the second in the family, was born at Lexington December 1, 1869, and acquired his education in the schools of Lexington and Transylvania University. For nearly thirty years he has been active in the business which is still continued under the name W. R. Milward. Mr. Milward is a member of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics and, like his father, is a republican voter. April 7, 1902, he married Lucy Thompson Harris, who was born at Sedalia, Missouri. They have two children: William E. and Anne Hart.

MORGAN C. BOYD is one of Hopkinsville's energetic younger business men, and in a comparatively brief period of years has put himself at the head of or vitally connected with the executive management of many important interests, particularly in the tobacco business.

Mr. Boyd was born in Trigg County, Kentucky, June 23, 1888. His grandfather, William Boyd, was a native of Virginia, and became an early settler in Trigg County, Kentucky, where he developed some extensive farming interests, and where he lived out his life. He married Harriet Gray, who also died in Trigg County. C. G. Boyd, father of the Hopkinsville business man, was born at Wallonia, Kentucky, in 1862, lived there until young manhood and then removed to Canton, Kentucky, was married there and for many years was engaged in the dry goods and general merchandise business, building up the largest store of its kind in that vicinity. He died at Canton in 1908. He was a democrat and a very sincere member of the Christian Church. He married Mollie Hawks, who was born in Trigg County, at Canton, in 1857, and is now living at Hopkinsville. She became the mother of four children: Jesup, who died at Hopkinsville at the age of twenty-three; Morgan C.; Clarence, a partner with his brother Morgan in business; and Nannie, who lives with her mother.

Morgan C. Boyd attended the public schools of Cadiz, Kentucky, including high school, and at the age of eighteen came to Hopkinsville, in 1905, and continuously for fifteen years his experience has been chiefly in the tobacco industry. His first employment was as office boy for H. H. Abernathy & Company. A year later he was shipping clerk for M. H. Tandy & Company, remaining in that position a year, then for a year was buyer for the American Snuff Company, spent two years as partner in the tobacco firm of J. P. Thompson & Company, and then was president of the Hancock Warehouse Company five years. Since 1919 he has been manager of the Universal Leaf Tobacco Company, which has recently constructed a new rehandling house of brick at the corner of Fourteenth and Clay streets, where the company has its offices. This is one of the best buildings in western Kentucky. Mr. Boyd is also owner of the M. C. Boyd Coal & Transfer Company, the largest business of its kind in Hopkinsville. Its plant and offices are at Fourteenth and Railroad streets. He is president of the Gorman Tobacco Company and a director of the First National Bank. Such is the goodly array of interests with which Mr. Boyd has identified himself since he came to Hopkinsville.

He is a deacon in the Christian Church, a republican, and is affiliated with Hopkinsville Lodge No. 545 of the Elks. He is unmarried and lives at Eighth and Liberty streets.

RICHARD T. ANDERSON was a Lexington citizen whose quiet and unassuming but efficient service as a banker, and business man, had an importance that would never be measured by the amount of publicity he received. He shunned publicity, but his immediate associates knew and understood the sound quality of his abilities and the essential kindness and public spirit which animated him at all times.

He was born at Lexington in March, 1839, and died there in January, 1911. He was a bachelor, and for years he made his home with his brother John E. Anderson and they were closely associated both in a business way and in their personal lives. During his early life he was a farmer on Leestown Pike. He was also in the lumber business and he and his brother John were active in the private bank of Headley, Anderson & Company. He was a director of the Northern Bank and was president of the Agricultural Fair and in its reorganization was instrumental in securing the present Fair grounds. Early in its organization he became a director of the Security Trust Company and during his later years was vice president. RICHARD T. ANDERSON, namesake and nephew of the late Richard T. Anderson, whose career as a prominent Lexington banker and business man has been previously reviewed, has also devoted his active years to banking and finance and is second vice president of the Security Trust Company of Lexington.

Mr. Anderson was born at Lexington September 7, 1870. His grandfather, John Anderson, was of an old Virginia family, was a lumber dealer, carpenter and builder of Lexington, and died when comparatively young. Some of the houses he built are still standing to testify to his sound workmanship. He also owned farm lands. His son John E. Anderson was born in Lexington in 1845 and for many years was interested in farming on a 400 acre farm on Leestown Pike. For twelve years during the '70s and '80s he was a partner in the Anderson & McCann chinaware business at Lexington. He was also for many years a director of the Fayette National Bank. He never sought public office and was of a somewhat retiring disposition. John E. Anderson married Jane Gathright of Louisville who died in May, 1890. John E. Anderson died in November, 1908. He is survived by two children, Richard T. and Mildred Baker, the latter the wife of W. H. Hart of Lexington.

Richard T. Anderson was liberally educated, graduating from the State University in 1890 and for several years was a bookkeeper in the Fayette National Bank. He then became member of the firm Anderson & Dudley which succeeded to the chinaware business in which his father had formerly been interested, and he was an active member of this firm from 1902 to 1905. Following that he was a bookkeeper in the Second National Bank a year, then with the Fayette National Bank, for about a year was busy with his duties as executor for his uncle Richard T. Mr. Anderson was cashier of the Lexington chapter of the second Red Cross war fund and treasurer of the united war work drive and area chairman of the fifth or Victory loan drive. This area embraced the eastern half of Kentucky.

He is a member of the Board of Commerce, and the Lexington and Elks Clubs. In 1900 he married Lutie Respass who died in 1914. Later he married Hazel Cottingham of Paris, Kentucky. WILLIAM LETELLE PETTY. Among the prominent operators in the leaf tobacco industry at Lexington, one who has had more than thirty-six years of experience in this line and whose activities have been conducted in several states is William Letelle Petty. Mr. Petty has been a resident of Lexington since 1906, and during a quarter of a century of connection with the business interests of this city has established himself firmly in the confidence and esteem of his associates.

William L. Petty was born in Halifax County, Virginia, April 18, 1866, a son of Henry T. and Margaret (Dupree) Petty, natives of the same state. His father, a life-long agriculturist, member of the Baptist Church and a democrat, died in 1910, at the age of sixty-two years, while his mother passed away when but thirty-three years of age. Of their five children four are still living.

The eldest of his parents' children, William L. Petty acquired his education through attendance at the public school of Riceville, Virginia, to reach which he had to walk five miles from his home. His boyhood days were passed on his father's farm, but later he gave up agricultural work to accept a position as clerk in a country store. After two years in this capacity in 1884 he embarked in the leaf tobacco business at Danville, Virginia, where his modest tentative operations were carried on with encouraging success for three years. Moving then to South Boston, Virginia, he spent about two years in that community, his next location being at Rocky Mountain, North Carolina, where he continued his operations about seven years. In 1906 Mr. Petty came to Lexington and established himself in the leaf tobacco business, with which he has been identified to the present time. He is widely known in the business as an operator of broad and varied experience, expert knowledge and capable judgment, as well as a man of the highest integrity and sound business principles.

While located temporarily at South Boston, Virginia, Mr. Petty met Miss Sue A. Pendexter, the second of the six children of Henry and Amelia (Sydnor) Pendexter, and February 10, 1895, Mr. Petty and Miss Pendexter were united in marriage. Her father was originally a farmer, but in later life engaged in the lumber business at South Boston, Virginia, where he and his wife were devout members of the Baptist Church, and he was a democratic voter. M., at Rocky Mountain, North Carolina; Rocky Mountain Chapter, R. A. M.; Webb Commandery No. 2; and Olesha Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. He is also identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is past noble grand of the Lexington Lodge.

MILTON YOUNG, one of Kentucky's foremost turf men and breeders, and a prominent member of the Kentucky State Racing Commission, was born in Western Kentucky, and for the last ten years of his life lived at Lexington, where he died May 5, 1918.

He was born in Union County, January 10, 1851, son of Milton and Maria (Thompson) Young. His great-grandfather, John Young, was a native of London, settled in Virginia at the close of the eighteenth century and in 1793 moved to Nelson County, Kentucky. His son John Young built one of the first brick houses in Kentucky. His son Bryan R. was a physician of note, and during 1845-47 represented Bardstown District in Congress. Milton Young, father of the late Milton Young, long occupied a prominent place in the affairs of Union County, where he owned extensive farming interests, was a county judge, later engaged in the tobacco business in Henderson County, and was elected from that county to the Legislature, dying while enroute to the State Capitol to take his seat. He was a conservative Union man and had great ability as a public speaker.

Milton Young, Jr., was educated in public and private schools at Henderson, and began dealing in cigars and tobacco when only fourteen years of age. Two years later he became proprietor with George S. Norris in a hardware business at Henderson, and from his career as a merchant achieved a financial success that enabled him to participate in the affairs of the turf and as a thoroughbred breeder.

Some of the important facts in his career as a horseman will appear from the following outline: In 1878 he purchased Joe Rhodes, a thoroughbred horse, and the following year his colors appeared for the first time on the turf. From time to time he added to his stable of racers such noted horses as Boot Jack, Bancroft, Getaway, Boatman, Beatrice and others. His entire racing career was successful. At Cincinnati

W. L. Petty

1881 he had six horses entered in six races and ran without defeat, winning the entire six. At St. Louis his Getaway won the best $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile heat race on record. At Nashville in 1881 Boot Jack won two races in one day, and a stake race on the day following. At the spring meeting in St. Louis in 1882 he won the entire program of the opening day, the four winners being Monogram, Boot Jack, Ascender and Bancroft. In that year he sold his entire racing stable to R. C. Pate. Having decided to embark in the breeding of thoroughbreds, he bought McGrathiana, the estate of Price McGrath, the home of Tom Bowling and Aristides. Here he collected stallions and brood mares of the best blood, the unbeaten Hanover being his premier stallion. For a quarter of a century he sent annually to the sale marts of the East large quotas of embryo racers, and he came to have the distinction of owning the largest thoroughbred breeding establishment in the world. In addition to Hanover, who had won thirty-two races and approximately \$121,000, his racing stallions included Onondago, Pirate of Penzance, Lamplighter, Sorcerer, Friar, Favor, Strathmore, Cameron, Woolsthorpe, Sempronius, Yorkshire Lad, Lackford, Monsieur de Lorne, King of Coins and Alloway. Among the notable mares were American Lady, Ambulance, Anna Lisle, Bezique, Borealis, Laughing Water, Nellie Blythe, Pocahontas and others. Some of the notable products of McGrathiana while in his hands were Yankee Consul, Handspun, Sewell and Broomstick.

For years Mr. Young was an officer of the Kentucky Racing Association and a member of the old American Turf Congress. As a member of the Kentucky State Racing Commission he was author of some of its best rules, notably that which fixed the limit of commission to be charged in pari-mutuels at five per cent. In the early part of 1900 adverse racing laws were passed whereupon the price of thoroughbreds ceased to make breeding profitable. In 1908 he sold his farm and horses at auction and took up his residence at Lexington. He was a colonel on the staff of Gov. John Young Brown.

At Morganfield, Kentucky, December 14, 1882, he married Miss Lucy Spalding, daughter of Ignatius A. Spalding, whose life is reviewed in the following sketch. Mrs. Young keeps her home at Lexington. She is the mother of seven children: Spalding; Alice and Maria, of the Order of the Sacred Heart; Milton, who was a volunteer for special service during the European war; Jack Spalding, who was an American officer in the World war; Tom Brown, a student at the University of Notre Dame; and Lucy Young, attending the University of Kentucky.

IGNATIUS A. SPALDING was a prominent lawyer and leader in public affairs in Western Kentucky.

He was born at Morganfield, Union County, December 3, 1833, and died November 14, 1913. He was the only son of Ignatius A. and Ann (Huston) Spalding. His grandparents were Benedict and Allethaire (Abell) Spalding, natives of St. Mary's County, Maryland. Ignatius A. Spalding, Sr., was born in St. Mary's County, Maryland, in 1790, and died in 1852. In 1828 he married Jane Pottinger, whose children were Samuel, Robert A. and Allethaire. In 1820 Ignatius A. Spalding, Sr., moved to Union County, Kentucky, became a successful merchant, and also interested himself in public affairs. He sat in the second Constitutional Convention of the state. His second wife was Ann Huston, who was born in North Carolina in 1795 and died in 1877. Her father, William Huston, was a native of Philadelphia and had served as a Revolutionary soldier under Washington.

The late Ignatius A. Spalding was liberally educated at St. Joseph's College at Bardstown. In 1853 he married his cousin, Susan A. Johnson, who was born in Daviess County, Kentucky, daughter of Jack and Lucy (Huston) Johnson.

Early in his law practice Ignatius A. Spalding earned both professional and public distinction. He was elected county judge. In 1867 was sent to the State Senate, served as court house commissioner, and in 1885 was elected a member of the Lower House, where he became a candidate for speaker. He served as a state railroad commissioner until the change of administrations. He was one of the very early and effective advocates of good roads building. He was the promoter of a road five miles in length connecting Morganfield and Uniontown, an air line route 100 feet wide, in which the hills were graded down, and this fine portion of highway stands as a monument to his early foresight and influence. He had all the grace of an old time orator, but had more than eloquence, his resourcefulness, knowledge and purposes enabling him to adapt his speech to any audience and command respectful attention. St. Ann's Catholic Church at Morganfield was built largely through his effort. Failing health finally compelled him to give up active law practice, but he spent the rest of his life at Morganfield.

His widow survived him until March, 1916. They had a family of four children: Jack Spalding became a lawyer and has earned the honors of his profession at Atlanta, Georgia. Lucy Spalding is the widow of Milton Young, late of Lexington, a distinguished Kentuckian whose career is sketched above. Sue Ellen Spalding is Sister Mary Loyola, Mother Superior of the Good Shepherd Convent at Spokane, Washington. Ann Spalding is Sister Aloysia of the Nazareth Order at the Mother House in Nazareth, Kentucky.

JOHN B. ELLIOTT. The entire Blue Grass section of Kentucky knows and appreciates the services of John B. Elliott as a master mind in the theatrical and entertainment field. He was the promoter and is president and general manager of the Phoenix Amusement Company, Incorporated, which operates on a capital of $600,000. Those who know his record say that Mr. Elliott is one of the keenest business men of Lexington and apparently has the best years of his life still ahead of him.

The Phoenix Amusement Company has about 200 people on its payroll, and pays out between $2,800 and $4,500 a week for employes and entertainers. B. J. Treacy is secretary and treasurer of the company.

Mr. Elliott was born at Lexington, son of A. D. Elliott, who for a quarter of a century was a harness dealer in the city. John B. Elliott showed a strong inclination for entertainment lines when a boy in school. It has been the object of his close study and activity almost from boyhood. Formerly he operated such well known houses as the Colonial and Princess at Lexington, the Alamo at Paris, and the Alhambra at Richmond. He built these theaters, and at one time was manager of twelve houses in the Blue Grass section. He still owns individually five of these, including those at Frankfort and Winchester. The Phoenix Amusement Company took over seven of his theaters. Those in Lexington are the well known Strand and Ben Ali, high class motion picture houses, and the Opera House devoted to high class performance of the legitimate stage.

Mr. Elliott married Mabel Wilkerson, daughter of Millard Wilkerson, who was a farmer in Fayette County. They have one son, Morgan, now manager of the Ben Ali theater at Lexington.

ULYSSES GRANT SAUNDERS. While death disrupted many of his extensive plans, Ulysses Grant Saunders in the fifty-one years of his life had achieved a definite place among the business farmers and livestock breeders of the Kentucky Blue Grass. He was a well known horseman, also a breeder of Hereford cattle, and his character was distinguished not only by industry and energy but by a wholesome kindness that gained him many friends wherever he lived.

Mr. Saunders, who died at the Battle Creek Sanitarium in Michigan in 1919, was born on the old Saunders farm in Fleming County, Kentucky, March 27, 1868. His parents were Moses and Nancy (Smith) Saunders. His father's first wife was a Miss Blackstone, and by that marriage there is one son, Thomas, still living at Hillsboro. Ulysses G. Saunders was the youngest son of his mother's children, and his three surviving brothers are M. C. Saunders, Raleigh and Bruce Saunders. There are two surviving sisters, Mrs. Harlan Day and Mrs. W. S. McKee. Moses Saunders died at the age of eighty-three.

Ulysses G. Saunders grew up on the Fleming County farm, had a common school education, and after leaving school his future progress depended largely upon his own activities and ambition. On October 22, 1889, he married Miranda Anne Denton, who grew up in the same neighborhood in Fleming County. Mrs. Saunders, who lives in Lexington, is a daughter of William and Malinda (Jones) Denton, who spent their lives on the old Denton farm where her father died at the age of sixty.

The late Mr. Saunders owned for several years the old Saunders farm. For a number of years his residence was at Hillsboro in Fleming County, where he and his brother M. C. Saunders constituted a well known firm of tobacco dealers, stock traders and farmers, and they continued their business together until 1911. In that year U. G. Saunders sold his home farm and bought the partnership farm, but lived in Flemingsburg and continued dealing in tobacco. In 1914 he bought the Senator Bailey farm, Fairland, four miles from Lexington on the Versailles Pike. He built the present commodious house on that farm. During 1915 he sold the farm and bought part of the Haggin farm, naming it Springdale. This place comprised 1500 acres on the Russell Cave Pike, ten miles from Lexington. Here he laid the foundation of a fine herd of Hereford cattle and made the farm notable for its cattle and trotting horses. He kept stables of saddle animals and trotters at the Fair Grounds, had them trained and raced them, and his stock commanded high premiums on the market. His Hereford cattle also won many awards. In 1916 Mr. Saunders bought the old home of Reger Smith on South Ashland Street in Lexington, where Mrs. Saunders resides.

While a successful stockman, Mr. Saunders was perhaps longest interested as a leader and dealer and grower of tobacco. He helped organize the Burley Tobacco Company at Flemingsburg, was on the executive committee of the company and managed the first loose leaf warehouse at Flemingsburg, continuing for many years on the executive board. He also continued as a stockholder in the Burley Company, and on his own farms grew tobacco in large quantities. In 1918 he had resumed partnership relations with his brother M. C. Saunders, who bought a half interest in the Springdale Farm, while Ulysses G. acquired a half interest in his brother's farm three miles out of Lexington. He also bought the Meadows, the old Stoll farm at the city limits of Lexington, comprising 250 acres. The brothers had formulated plans for enlarging their Hereford cattle and horse business, and it was in the midst of these busy activities that Mr. Saunders passed away.

He was a republican in politics and a member of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, serving as a steward.

Mrs. Saunders' only child is Eldiva Denton, now the wife of Lucien Parker Lee. Mr. Lee now has the management and operation of the Meadows farm, and he and his wife live with Mrs. Saunders. Mrs. Lee was educated at Millersburg and at the Randolph Macon College at Lynchburg, Virginia.

A. G. PAYNE, of Lexington, has built up an extraordinarily successful business as a manufacturer of proprietary medicines. When he started to work in 1899 he had no capital and manufactured and sold all his goods. The first five years gave him a living and valuable experience as a foundation for his future work. During those years his medicines were handled direct between his factory and retail drug stores. His products were manufactured as the Quaker Remedies, including tonics, liniments, salves, and acquired an extensive popularity and sale over Kentucky and Tennessee. Eventually he became half owner of the plant at Cincinnati where the medicines were manufactured.

The second stage of his career came when he put on the market "Payne's New Discovery," and four years later, when he had built up the business to annual sales of $150,000, he sold out to Cincinnati parties, and the remedy continued to be sold throughout Southern states.

Mr. Payne then became proprietor of the German Medicine Company of Cincinnati and put on the market the Andes Medicines. After three years he sold the Cincinnati plant and then concentrated his manufacturing business at Lexington, where he erected a double two-story and basement building on Walnut Street. The accommodations of this plant are already outgrown. He sold the patent rights in the name "Payne" and his present wares are manufactured under the name "Andes," a modification of his own Christian name. The first year his sales totaled $75,000, and in 1920 the volume of business reached nearly $300,000. The "Andes" medical products are now distributed over nearly all of North America, and there is a branch at Toronto and another at Havana, Cuba. The products are now sold altogether through jobbing houses. Mr. Payne employs five commercial salesmen on the road, two advertising men, besides chemists and other employees at the Lexington plant.

Mr. A. G. Payne is the youngest of four children of Lewis M. and Ellen (Woodson) Payne. His father was a Virginian, a Confederate soldier, and for a number of years conducted a general merchandise store near Cumberland Gap in Eastern Kentucky. He was one of the organizers of Bell County, Kentucky, and served as its first county judge.

A. G. Payne is a member of the Broadway Christian Church. He married at North Middletown in Bourbon County Rosa Moore, daughter of James S. Moore, a prominent farmer of that county. Mrs. Payne has three brothers in the ministry. A. R. Moore, secretary of the Foreign Mission Society; S. B. Moore, a pastor at Butler, Missouri; and C. E. Moore, in Texas.

Mr. and Mrs. Payne have one daughter, Martha Crouch, now a student in the State University at Lexington.

WILLIAM H. FORBES. Some of the most successful men of this age are those who have concentrated upon some one line and bent their energies to mastering its every detail. Having kept the one idea of perfecting themselves in this line in front of them, they have been able to produce results which not only reflect credit upon their ability but give prestige to the concerns with which they are associated. This is the case with William H. Forbes, secretary of the Forbes Manufacturing Company of Hopkinsville, one of the most progressive young men of Christian County, whose whole business career has been passed in the employ of his present company.

William H. Forbes was born at Hopkinsville, Kentucky, May 8, 1891, a son of M. C. Forbes, a review of whose life is given elsewhere in this work. Growing up in his native city, William H. Forbes was not only given the advantages afforded by its excellent public schools but also those of the schools at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, Culver, Indiana, and Eau Gallie, Florida, and completed his schooldays when he was twenty years of age. He then entered the office of the M. C. Forbes Manufacturing Company as manager of the office, and while serving as such learned the details of the large business of the company. When this concern was incorporated in 1912 Mr. Forbes became secretary of the Forbes Manufacturing Company, and still holds that responsible position. He is also a director of the Forbes Corporation of Hopkinsville, and is a business man of unusual sagacity.

In 1913 Mr. Forbes was married at Madisonville, Kentucky, to Miss Metabeth Sory, a daughter of Dr. J. D. and Sarah (Long) Sory, of Madisonville, where Doctor Sory is engaged in a general practice as a physician and surgeon. Mrs. Forbes died October 22, 1918, leaving two children: M. C., II, who was born June 13, 1916; and James Sory, who was born October 16, 1918. Mr. Forbes is a democrat. The Baptist Church has him enrolled on its membership books. Having all of his interests centered at Hopkinsville, it is but natural that he is a booster of his native city, and his aid can always be counted upon to further all movements which have for their legitimate object the advancement of the best element of this section and the making of further public improvements.

GEORGE L. POPE, M. D. For many years Doctor Pope has practiced medicine and surgery in the City of Louisville, where he was born, and where his Kentucky ancestors settled at the very beginning of colonization at the Falls of the Ohio nearly twenty years before Kentucky became a state. Doctor Pope is a member of one of the oldest and most distinguished of American families. His American ancestry covers a period of nearly three centuries. Every generation has produced men of marked ability and character and women noted for superior excellence in all domestic virtues and social accomplishments. Many of the descendants of the first ancestor in this country distinguished themselves in colonial and revolutionary times. One of the most prominent early names in statecraft and judicial history of Illinois was Judge Nathaniel Pope, Major General Pope of the Civil war also traced his ancestry back to the same source as Doctor Pope of Louisville. The history of the Pope family in America has been carefully compiled, but the limits of the present sketch allow reference only to the outstanding members of the successive generations referring to the Kentucky branch of the family.

The first American ancestor was Nathaniel Pope, who in 1637 was sent from England to the Colony of Maryland to adjust some matters with Lord Baltimore. Subsequently he moved to Pope's Creek in Westmoreland County, Virginia, about 1650, and in the following year received patent to a large tract of land subsequently called the Cliffs. His will was probated April 26, 1660. His daughter Anne was the wife of Maj. John Washington, grandfather of President George Washington.

The line of ancestry as here traced runs through his son Nathaniel Pope II, who spent his life at the family seat, Pope's Creek. His only son was Nathaniel Pope, who in consequence of his mother's second marriage was frequently known as Nathaniel Pope alias Bridges. The second son of Nathaniel Pope the third and Jane (Brown) Pope was Worden Pope, who was born about 1700 and married Hester Netherton. Of the children of Worden Pope the sons Benjamin and William were founders of the Kentucky branch of the family, and both were prominently identified with the original settlement at Louisville. Their sister Jean married Thomas Helm, and was the mother of Governor Helm of Kentucky. William was a captain in the Revolutionary war, afterward a colonel in the Kentucky militia. Many of his descendants became prominent in Kentucky and elsewhere, and one of his distinguished sons was Judge Nathaniel Pope of Illinois, previously referred to.

Benjamin Pope, oldest son of Worden Pope, also served in the Revolutionary war. He came to the Territory of Kentucky perhaps in company with his brother William, and erected the first house in what is now the City of Louisville, it being the first residence outside of Fort Nelson. That house stood at what is now the corner of Ninth and Main Streets. Subsequently he moved to Bullitt County, and the house he built on his land there in 1788 is still standing and still occupied by the Pope family. Benjamin Pope was born about 1740. In December, 1766, he married Behethiland Foote, and their six children were Nathaniel, Benjamin, Worden, Francis, George Foote and Sallie.

Of these George Foote Pope was the grandfather of Doctor Pope of Louisville. He was appointed when quite young clerk of Bullitt County. He married Martha Lancaster Dozier, whose father was a Frenchman and a captain of a company in General Lafayette's army during the Revolution. George F. Pope had the following children: William Foote, John Dozier, Worden, Elizabeth Ellen, Sallie Ann and Charles Wickliff.

Of this family John Dozier Pope was the father of Doctor Pope. He was born in Bullitt County September 5, 1822, and early in life became a soldier and lawyer of distinction. He joined the Louisville Legion for service in the Mexican war, and in consequence of the loss at sea of his cousin, Capt. Godfrey Pope, he was acting captain of Company E and at the battle of Monterey distinguished himself for gallantry and bravery. After that war he became auditor of the City of Louisville. At the breaking out of the war between the states he was the first to raise the Confederate flag in Kentucky, carrying with him into the First Kentucky Confederate Volunteers almost all of the old Legion with which he had been identified. He was promoted to the rank of major and afterward to lieutenant colonel on General Hardee's staff. After the war he was assistant chief attorney for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company until his death, which occurred January 11, 1902.

Col. John Pope married Euphemia Parkhurst, who died April 5, 1906, at the age of eighty-four. She was born in Newark, New Jersey, and had lived at Louisville from the age of twelve. At the time of her death she was the oldest member of the Chestnut Street Methodist Church, South. Her two sons were Dr. Clarence T. and Dr. George Laughton.

Dr. George Laughton Pope was born at Louisville February 20, 1856, was educated in the public schools of Louisville, and graduated in medicine from the University of Louisville in 1881. For nearly twenty years he practiced in Mississippi, but since April, 1900, has resumed his home at Louisville and has been one of the prominent members of the medical profession in that city. He has taken an active part in the various medical associations, is a past master of Shibboleth Lodge No. 750, F. and A. M., past high priest of Highland Chapter No. 50, R. A. M., a member of DeMolay Commandery, K. T., past noble grand of the Odd Fellows and past chancellor commander of the Knights of Pythias.

In 1880 Doctor Pope married Genevieve Greenley, a native of West Point, Kentucky. Her father, T. B. Greenley, M. D., LL. D., was a highly accomplished and scholarly physician and practiced in Jefferson County sixty-five years. He died at the age of ninety-one. Doctor Pope has two children. The daughter, Genevieve Elizabeth, is a graduate of the Blue Mountain Female College of Mississippi and is the wife of Dunbar Archer, a merchant of Greenville, Mississippi. They have one daughter, Genevieve Pope Archer. The only son of Doctor Pope is John Greenley Pope, who graduated from the University of the South and from the medical department of the University of Louisville. He married Marguerite Hamilton, a native of Louisville, and they have two children, Elizabeth Hamilton and Helen Lee.

JOHN A. KELLER. An industry that is one of the most important of its kind in Lexington is the floral establishment now conducted by the corporation John A. Keller Company. It is a family concern, and the success of the business has depended largely upon the fact that its founder and his children as they grew up took a full share of responsibility in the work and have co-operated to continue it as one of the important sources of flowers and potted plants for Lexington and a large surrounding territory.

The business was established by the late John A. Keller about forty years ago, and he continued in its active business management until his death in 1907. The business is now incorporated, all the stock being held by his family. John A. Keller was a native of Baden, Germany, and was thirty years of age when he came to America and located at Nicholasville, and two years later moved to Lexington. He was a gardener, and in early years grew grapes as his specialty. Gradually he began handling flowers under glass, and the plant on Sixth Street now has 50,000 square feet under glass, an area of over an acre. The office and show rooms are on Main Street.

Mr. Keller is survived by his widow, who was a native of Bavaria, Germany. They had eight children: James P., who is in the floral business for himself; Thekla, Mrs. Ed. Norton; while the other six children are all living at the old home on East Sixth Street, in the house built by their father in one of the very desirable sections of the city, and they all work together and handle some phase of the growing and profitable business. These six children are Mary, Ferdinand, Lena, Josephine, Theodore and Louise.

Ferdinand Keller is now president and general manager of the business, and he has been familiar with its operations since early boyhood. He is a member of the Board of Commerce at Lexington and the Kiwanis Club, is a member of the Knights of Columbus, and the family are all communicants of St. Peter's Catholic Church.

RICHARD SPURR WEBB, JR., is a man whose career gives significance to such words as enterprise and initiative. A practical man of affairs, possessing good judgment, confidence and unlimited energy, he is the ideal man to handle any material project involving the use of mechanical facilities, men, organization and capital. He has made a big success as a contractor and real estate developer, and has been equally successful in the automobile field, both as a dealer and as proprietor of the Mammoth Garage at Lexington.

Mr. Webb erected in 1915 on West Main Street what was then the finest garage in any southern city. He built this at a cost of $59,000. For a time it was operated by other parties, and he soon exchanged the building for an automobile business under his direct control. He occupied the original building until 1919, when he completed his present garage on East Main Street. This building has a frontage of 212 feet and a depth of 160, two stories, with floor space of over 50,000 square feet. The plant cost over $250,000. One unusual feature is the absolute freedom from obstructing posts. This is the sales headquarters for the Studebaker and Service trucks, and the sales exceed $1,000,000 a year. The garage is thoroughly equipped, has fifty employes, and Mr. Webb is the all pervading personal genius who directs the entire establishment.

A son of Richard S. and Mary (Gunn) Webb, to whom as individuals and as members of old families a more complete sketch is devoted on other pages, Richard Spurr Webb, Jr., was born on Leestown Pike, two and a half miles from Lexington, December 16, 1888. He was educated in country schools. In 1898 the family moved to Indian Territory, where they spent about six years. Mr. Webb had little opportunity to get any education while in the West. On returning he was a student for one year in the Dudley School and for six years in the State College, graduating in the electrical engineering course in 1911.

The most prominent traits of his character has been exemplified in his career as a contractor. On April 19, 1913, he went to work with pick and shovel in street work at $1.50 a day. He continued this heavy manual toil for five months. During that time he helped build some houses and got a knowledge of the building game. He then bought a lot in Mentelle Park, and with the energy characteristic of the man built a house, and cleared over $500 on the transaction. The second house netted him $1,150, and the third more than $1,200. From this he launched into general contracting, and has done much of the building work in Mentelle Park and now has facilities for all lines of construction, including large buildings, and in fact there is nothing in the building line too large to embarrass Mr. Webb. For two years he made an average of transfer in property every week. He has traded in farm lands, and has done much practical farming, raising sheep, tobacco, and other crops. Much of his building contracting has been done in towns outside of Lexington. Mr. Webb is not in politics, and has been a free lance as to organizations of all kinds. He has not enjoyed an uninterrupted smile from fortune, but a man of his character is in fact always fortunate, since he refuses to recognize misfortune in any guise.

At the age of twenty-two he married Miss Allie B. Wilkerson, of Lexington. Their four children are Julia Catherine, Mary Gunn, Mildred Fillmore and Allie B.

BARTLETT W. BLUE, son of a railroad man, felt as a boy a definite call to railroading as a career, and he has remained true to his first choice and is one of the older among the operating officials of the Louisville & Nashville system.

Mr. Blue was born at Belle Plaine, Iowa, February 15, 1872. His father, Abner W. Blue, combined several interests in his life time. At one time he was an Ohio farmer, breeder of Merino sheep until the removal of the tariff made that an unprofitable business. For several years he was also an engineer with the Chicago & Northwestern Railway, and was in that service when his son was born in Iowa. Later, on coming to Louisville, he resumed railroad work as an engineer for the Louisville & Nashville, and when he finally left his engine he retired and died at Louisville at the age of seventy. He was a Federal soldier during the Civil war, and his army service affected more or less his health and strength through remaining years.

Bartlett W. Blue had his first experience in railroading at the age of fourteen, as an apprentice boy in the Louisville & Nashville shops at Louisville. From the shops he was sent out as a locomotive fireman, then had another shop experience, after which he was placed on a regular run as a fireman and when about nineteen was first promoted to engineer. For twenty-one years he was one of the faithful engine men for the Louisville & Nashville, running on the division including Lexington, and his service was remarkably free from accidents of any kind. He had both freight and passenger runs, having one of the important passenger trains of the division for five years.

In 1909 Mr. Blue came to Lexington as mechanical foreman of the local shops. At that time the shops employed only twenty-five or thirty men, but in 1915 general shops were erected at Lexington and since then all classes of railroad repair work have been handled here, with an average force of 150 men. Mr. Blue as assistant master mechanic is therefore in a very responsible executive position. The yards and shops of the Louisville & Nashville at Lexington are under the direct supervision of Mr. Blue, and these properties exhibit a pleasing contrast to many railroad yards in other cities. Many compliments have been paid Mr. Blue by railway men and officials for what he has accomplished in the way of adding to the appearance and in detracting in no manner from the efficiency, and several railway publications have contained brief articles of praise for what Mr. Blue has done.

At the age of thirty-two he married Mary A. Roselle, of LaGrange, Kentucky. They have one daughter, Helen attending school in Lexington.

Fraternally he is a thirty-second degree Scottish Rite Mason and Shriner, and both he and his wife are active members of the Calvary Baptist Church.

GEORGE LUIGART who died in April, 1906, at the age of forty-four, has just reached that stage in business when a man feels justified in retiring from the larger field of activities and enjoying the rewards of previous effort. He was widely known in Lexington as a very successful real estate man, owner and builder of many valuable properties. Some half dozen years before his death he had erected a beautiful and commodious home in Lexington.

His father, Joseph Luigart, is also well remembered at Lexington. He was born in Wuertemberg, Germany, and in 1855 came to the United States. At Cincinnati he became foreman of the malt plant of a brewing company, and later was a partner in several breweries, including one at Logansport, Indiana. While there he invented a beer cooler, and subsequently returned to Cincinnati to begin the manufacture of his patents. The ideas of his original patent are still in use in cooling systems. He finally sold his business to his partner, and in 1875 moved to Kentucky. At Lexington he introduced the first Lager beer ever made in a local plant, in the Wolfe & Yelham brewery. Subsequently he bought an extensive property on North Limestone Street and opened a malt house, conducted as a partnership by Luigart & Harting. This was a very flourishing business and supplied malt for many cities. The business finally declined because of the general introduction of spring barley from the northwestern states, which grew in favor over winter grown barley. He then closed out his business, and he died at the age of sixty-five. In Cincinnati Joseph Luigart married Flora Baumgartner, whom he met in that city. He survived her several years. They were the parents of five sons and two daughters: John, Josephine, August, George, Fred, Mary and Will. Three of these are still living, John who is now improving some of the old property in Lexington with a modern apartment building; Mrs. Josephine McGuff, of Lexington; and William, of Buffalo.

Joseph Luigart while on a visit back to his native home in Germany, where the family had lived for three centuries, brought back with him to America a young girl of nineteen, a native of Wuertemberg. The specific object of her visit was to attend the wedding of Mary Luigart, but a few months after her arrival and before Mary Luigart was married she became the wife of the late George Luigart. Mrs. George Luigart died in December, 1920, at the age of forty-seven. Both were active members of St. Paul's Catholic Church. They had erected their beautiful home on North Limestone Street in 1900, on the site of Joseph Luigart's old home. This is a large brick house, one of the finest residences in the northern part of Lexington. The rooms are large and the interior work is exceptionally tasteful, including much hand carved woodwork.

Mr. and Mrs. George Luigart had five children: Miss Flora is an employee in the Louisville & Nashville Railroad offices. Annabelle is the wife of H. Cable Cramer, a civil engineer at Lexington, and they have one daughter, Mary Frances. George Luigart, Jr., married Cleo Carlton and has a daughter, Dorothy Annabelle. The two other children are Lawrence and Fred Luigart.

ALBERT R. MARSHALL, president of the Kentucky State Oil Men's Association, is a geologist by profession, and years of experience have brought him the reputation as an expert in all questions affecting the oil fields of Kentucky.

Mr. Marshall is manager of the head office at Lexington for Petroleum Exploration, a corporation credited with the largest production of oil in Kentucky. This company, organized in the fall of 1916, with a capital of $4,000,000, after sinking two dry holes in McCreary County began operations on leases comprising some 5,000 acres in Lee, Powell and Estill counties, on the Prewitt-Miller-Goff and Wells properties. This company was one of the first to explore and drill in that field, and since May, 1917, they have brought in 360 producing wells and operations are being constantly extended on the lease. This lease produces more oil than any other in Kentucky, its average daily production being about 4,000 barrels. The company also has a 1,000 acres of proven leases in McGoffin County and already has quite a nice production in that district.

The organizer of Petroleum Exploration was a prominent oil man of Sistersville, West Virginia, E. A. Durham. The field superintendent is J. A. Smith, while Mr. Marshall has charge of the main offices of the company at Lexington.

Albert R. Marshall was born on a farm near Butler in Pendleton County, Kentucky, October 24, 1879. His father, William R. Marshall, was a well to do farmer in that locality. Up to the age of nineteen Albert R. lived on a farm, with a care in its duties and getting his education in local schools. He then attended the State University, graduating in the Department of Geology, and might properly claim to be the first graduate of the department to make economic geology his profession. For a time he was technical expert employed by an oil company in which Judge Charles Kerr and John H. Morgan were primarily interested. The operations of this company were in Wolfe County. Mr. Marshall also had charge of production in the Campton field, where oil has been produced for seventeen years. He was active in the Campton field for six years, and was interested in drilling as a contractor with the firm of Spencer & Marshall, but for several years has had his time and energies fully engaged with Petroleum Exploration. He has the responsibility of selecting the various leases. This company has about 200 employees, and for their benefit maintains a company store, a schoolhouse, postoffice and other facilities in Lee County.

Mr. Marshall was elected president of the State Oil Men's Association in 1920 as successor of Dudley H. Foster, and has since been reelected. He is personally interested in farming and coal lands in eastern Kentucky. Mr. Marshall married at the age of thirty-one Miss Sallie Hurst, of Jackson, Kentucky.

FRANK B. CARR. While a boy growing up at Paris, Kentucky, Frank B. Carr decided to turn his gifts and abilities to railroading, and from that boyhood enthusiasm he has never departed, and has become one of the prominent officials in Kentucky of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, being general agent of that company at Lexington.

He was born at Paris, Kentucky, November 1, 1862. His parents came from Ireland and lived in New Haven, Connecticut, for several years, and in the early fifties moved to Paris, Kentucky, where the father was a stone contractor and builder. The father died at the age of seventy-eight and his wife at the age of seventy-six.

Frank B. Carr regarded Paris as his home until 1884. After finishing a common school education he began in 1878 as a messenger in the railroad office and learned telegraphy and the ticket business. He was passenger agent at Paris for several years. He was then assistant agent at Carlisle, agent at Livingston a few months, agent at Richmond, and in 1896 was promoted to general agent at Paris, having charge of the freight and passenger operation of the company there. In November, 1903, he was transferred to Lexington as general agent in charge of the terminals, and his supervision extends to all of the freight, passenger and transportation, which includes about 300 employes in shops, yards, freight and passenger stations.

In 1912 the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company decided to build new terminals at Lexington, and Mr. Carr purchased the additional ground and supervised the building of the new terminals, and at that time called the attention of the management to the desire of the City of Lexington to erect two viaducts—one at West Main and one at West Jefferson streets. The railroad company joined with the city and the two viaducts were constructed at the time the new terminals were being constructed, at an estimated expense of $600,000.

Mr. Carr is vice president of the Peoples Saving Fund and Building Association, a member of the Board of Commerce and the Rotary Club, a democrat, and his vacations are usually spent in fishing and hunting.

In 1889 Mr. Carr married Miss Elizabeth Lee Rice, of Richmond, Kentucky. Two sons and two daughters were born to this marriage, two of whom are deceased, the daughter Elizabeth at the age of ten years. Ethel, now living at Lexington, is the wife of John J. Houlihan, deceased, who was formerly a representative of the New York Life Insurance Company, Terre Haute, Indiana. Mrs. Houlihan has two children, Frances and John. Frank Carr, Jr., is a high school student at Lexington.

JAMES JOSEPH O'BRIEN. Throughout an active and interesting career duty has ever been the motive of action of James J. O'Brien, one of the leading citizens and at present one of the city commissioners of Lexington, and usefulness to his fellow men has not been by any means a secondary consideration. He has performed well his part in life and it is a compliment worthily bestowed to say that this locality is honored in his citizenship, for he has achieved definite success through his own efforts and is thoroughly deserving of the proud American title of self-made man, the term being one that, in its better sense, cannot but appeal to the loyal admiration of all who are appreciative of our national institutions and the privileges afforded for individual accomplishment.

James Joseph O'Brien was born in Lexington, Kentucky, September 20, 1874, and is the seventh in order of birth of the eleven children born to Thomas B. and Abbie (Breanan) O'Brien. Both of his parents were born in Ireland, the father in the City of Limerick on February 18, 1832, and the mother's birth occurred in County Kerry. They are both deceased, the father dying on March 25, 1899, and the mother in December, 1897, at the age of fifty-six years. They were married in Saint Peter's Church in Lexington. Thomas B. O'Brien left his native land at the age of fourteen years and came to the United States, the sailing ship on which he made the trip requiring eighteen weeks to make the passage. He landed in New York City, where he remained for a time, eventually coming to Lexington, Kentucky, where he learned the harness and saddlery trade. After being employed at this work for a time he embarked in business on his own account, and for many years was one of the leading harness-makers in this section of the country. During the Civil war he was located at Clarksville, Tennessee, and, though he never joined the Confederate army, he took part on the side of the Southern troops in the battle of Fort Donelson. Later he returned to Lexington, and here he lived during the remainder of his life. He was a faithful member of the Roman Catholic Church and in his political views was a democrat.

James J. O'Brien received a good practical education in the parochial schools of Lexington. After leaving school he learned the printing trade in the office of the Lexington Transcript. Later he worked for the Lexington Leader for eleven years, and then went to Washington, D. C., where he worked on the Times and in the Government printing office until 1904. In the latter year Mr. O'Brien became secretary to Mayor Thomas A. Combs of Lexington, holding this position for four years, and then for a similar period served as private secretary to Mayor John Skain. In 1911 he was elected city clerk on the democratic ticket for a four-year term. The city government was then changed to the commission form of government and Mr. O'Brien was elected city clerk by the two first boards of commissioners, holding the office until 1919, when he was elected city commissioner. In this act the people of Lexington showed their wisdom, for not only is Mr. O'Brien thoroughly conversant with every detail of the affairs of the municipality, but his ability and integrity are above question. He was assigned to the department of finance, one of the most important departments of the city government, and he is discharging the duties of this position with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of the people.

Politically Mr. O'Brien is a warm supporter of the democratic party, while his religious membership is with St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church, of which he is a member of the board of trustees. He is also an active member of the Knights of Columbus, of which he is the present state deputy and the master of the fourth degree for the district of Kentucky. He is also a member of the Kiwanis Club.

On April 6, 1904, Mr. O'Brien was married to Margaret Barrick, who was born in Washington, D. C., the daughter of John A. Barrick, who was formerly a prominent contractor and builder in Washington, but is now engaged in farming in Maryland. Mrs. O'Brien is the oldest of the six children born to her parents. Mr. and Mrs. O'Brien are the parents of two children, Mary Anne and James J., Jr. As a citizen Mr. O'Brien is public spirited and enterprising; as a friend and neighbor he combines the qualities of head and heart that win confidence and command respect; and he has brought honor and dignity to the various public positions which he has held with such pronounced success.

MARCUS ALLEN JONES. Of Kentucky insurance men who have been successful in building up a great volume of business for their respective companies, one of the highly successful records is held by Marcus Allen Jones, who has the general agency for Eastern Kentucky at Lexington, for the Michigan Mutual Life Insurance Company. Mr. Jones moreover is a scholar and recognized authority on the general subject of life insurance. He knows the history and the philosophy of insurance as well as all its modern statistics and commercial phases.

Mr. Jones is a native Kentuckian, born at Frankfort June 22, 1882. His grandfather was captain of a Mississippi River boat. His father Marcus A. Jones Sr. who died in 1907 at the age of sixty-seven was for many years proprietor of Jones Brothers Machine & Foundry Company at Frankfort. He also held some public offices though he was not in politics, being a member of the City Council. He was selected as superintendent of the first gas plant at Frankfort, holding that office until he had taught the other employees the process of gas manufacture. His wife Sarah E. Williams was a descendant of Mason Williams of Virginia. Mason P. Williams, his son, came to Frankfort and built the noted old stone tavern and lived at Frankfort until his death at the age of ninety. His daughter Sarah E. is still living at the old stone tavern which was erected by her father a hundred years ago, and was conducted as a tavern during her girlhood. She is also related to the noted character "Cerro Gordo" Williams of the Mexican war.

Marcus Allen Jones grew up at Frankfort, attended common schools there and the Frankfort Business College. When he entered the life Insurance business it was through a thorough professional training, secured in the Metropolitan Life School and Melvin Young's Insurance School in New York City. The training received in those schools of insurance gave him knowledge of the basic principles on which all sound life insurance rests. He was therefore trained as well in the fundamentals of insurance as a lawyer is in the fundamentals of jurisprudence, and this knowledge has proved invaluable to him in his subsequent career both in elucidating the rational grounds of insurance to individuals and also as an instructor of insurance agents. Mr. Jones was identified with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company for about ten years, beginning as an agent, was promoted to assistant and then general assistant, then to deputy superintendent, and finally to general deputy superintendent for "Big Four" territory in Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Tennessee and West Virginia.

After ten years of work for the Metropolitan Mr. Jones in 1916 accepted the post of general agent for Eastern Kentucky with the Michigan Mutual Life. In five brief years he has built up a business that exceeded the fondest expectations of the company. This company now has ten well established agencies in Eastern Kentucky, and each year has witnessed a gratifying increase in the volume of business over that section of the state.

Mr. Jones married at Frankfort Sarah E. Thompson. They have two daughters, Louisa M. and Jane Stout. The latter bears the name of a noted Civil war heroine Jane Stout, a relative of Mrs. Jones.

GEORGE LUCIEN DRURY. A former member of the Legislature, for twenty years an active member of the Union County Bar, George Lucien Drury has achieved success and prominence in his profession in the county where he was born and where his family has lived for nearly a century.

His grandfather, Ignatius Drury, was born at Leonardtown, Maryland, in 1806. In 1820, when he was fourteen years of age, he came west to Marion County, Kentucky, and in 1826 established his home in Union County, near St. Vincent, and lived in that rural community until his death in 1887. He married Lydia O'Nan, a native of Daviess County, Kentucky.

George H. Drury, father of the Morganfield attorney, was born in Union County, where he spent his active life as a farmer and died January 28, 1919, at the age of seventy-two. His wife was Lou Ellen Harris, also a native of Union County, who died August 21, 1918, at the age of seventy. Both were Catholics and reared their children in the same faith. Lou Ellen Harris was a daughter of William Truman Harris, a native of Virginia, and son of Ben Harris, who was a pioneer settler of Union County, Kentucky, where he died and was buried. His wife was Virginia Pratt, whose father, James Pratt, served as a soldier in the War of 1812 and after the battle of New Orleans bought a farm in Union County, where he lived until his death. He had formerly lived in Gallatin County, Kentucky, where his daughter Virginia was born. She lived to the age of ninety-three. The two sons and one daughter of George H. Drury and wife were William Truman, George Lucien and Mary Allie, the latter the wife of T. C. Bingham.

George Lucien Drury was born December 12, 1875, on a farm between Waverly and Boxville in Union County. From his boyhood experiences on the farm he derived a vigorous constitution and a love of country life that has continued through his professional career. He has always had some financial interest in farms. Mr. Drury graduated June 7, 1895, from the Morganfield High School, and for three years was a teacher in his home county. On April 28, 1899, he received his law diploma from the Louisville Law School, was admitted to the bar the same year, and has since been one of the busiest lawyers in Morganfield. He was sent from his native county to the State Legislature in 1912. Mr. Drury is a democrat, is affiliated with the Knights of Columbus, and is a Catholic. Since 1905 he has been connected with some of the coal mining industries of Union County.

At St. Vincent April 24, 1906, he married Margaret Hite, daughter of George I. and Julia (Buckman) Hite, of Union County. They have two living children: George Ignatius and Julia.

MARTIN J. CLEMENTS is distinguished in the citizenship of Union County, as president and active head of the Farmers Bank of Uniontown, one of the soundest financial institutions of Western Kentucky.

This bank was organized in 1902, with a capital of $25,000. In 1910 it absorbed the Bank of Uniontown, at which time the capital was increased to $40,000. It is operated under a state charter, and from the first has been distinguished by its sound and conservative management.

Martin Joseph Clements was elected president at the time of the organization, and has been the executive head for eighteen years. The present cashier is Samuel W. Clements, who succeeded Charles K. Kellenears in 1908.

Martin Joseph Clements was born in Union County, on a farm, June 27, 1851, a son of Patrick and Matilda (Hite) Clements. His father was a native of Maryland and his mother of Union County, where they were married. Patrick Clements passed his active life as a farmer, and he and his wife were devout Catholics and reared their children in the same faith. Their children were Martin J. and Samuel Lewis. The latter was a farmer and is now deceased.

Mr. Clements grew up on his father's farm, acquired a public school education and for three years attended the Christian Brothers College at Dayton, Ohio. He spent his active career as a farmer in Union County, and had his home on the farm until the death of his wife in 1915. He still has farming interests, and prior to his becoming president of the Farmers Bank was a factor in the grain business at Uniontown.

Mr. Clements married in 1870 Miss Frances Hite, and their companionship as man and wife endured forty-five years. She was born in Union County. They had seven children, all of whom are living and all were reared on the farm. Mr. Clements has always been a democrat in politics.

VICTOR LEE SPALDING. While he educated himself for the law, Victor Lee Spalding followed the vocation for which his talents admirably adapted him, newspaper work, until a few years ago, when in connection with editing and publishing the Uniontown Telegram he began practice, and is one of the able members of the profession in Union County.

Mr. Spalding was born on a farm in Meade County, Kentucky, January 15, 1877, a son of James Robert and Annie (Hardesty) Spalding. His parents were born in Marion County, Kentucky, where the families are old and prominent ones. James R. Spalding spent his active life as a farmer and lived to the age of seventy-five, his wife passing away at seventy. Victor Lee is one of nine children, four of whom are still living. The father was a staunch democrat, and both parents were Catholics and reared their children in the same faith.

Until he was twenty years of age Victor Lee Spalding had a share of the duties on his father's farm, and attended the public schools. At the age of twenty-one he became a teacher, and for the next five years taught and attended school alternately. He graduated in 1902 from the Brandenburg High School, and followed that with a two year's course in law at Valparaiso University in Indiana. He was admitted to the bar at Brandenburg in 1905. About that time came an opportunity to get into journalism, and he bought the Uniontown Telegram, continuing as its editor and publisher for a year, until he sold his interest. His next move was to Southwestern Oklahoma, where he located at Lawton, then a new city growing and developing as a result of an extensive opening of Indian lands. He lived there six years, and in that time was joint owner and business manager of the Lawton Constitution. On leaving Oklahoma Mr. Spalding moved to Little Rock, Arkansas, and for five years was editor and manager of the Southern Guardian, a Catholic weekly. In 1917 he returned to Uniontown and bought the Telegram, and has continued to edit and publish this standard weekly journal in Union County. Until he returned to Uniontown he made no attempt to practice his profession as a lawyer, but since 1917 has handled a growing volume of practice. He is a democrat in politics, but has never sought public offices, and the only official honors conferred upon him were those of city attorney and mayor of Uniontown.

The Uniontown Telegram is now the oldest newspaper of continuous publication to date in Union County. Its history begins with the founding in January, 1874, of the Union Local, which was established by Robert Marshall Wilson, who was its editor and publisher for nearly twenty years. In 1892 it was succeeded by the Uniontown News, and in 1893 the News became the Telegram. The oldest man in the continuous service of the Telegram is foreman of the composing room, Herbert Wilson, son of Robert Marshall Wilson. He has been connected with the paper throughout its history.

Mr. Spalding is a member of the Catholic Church and is a district deputy of the Knights of Columbus. He married in Uniontown in September, 1895, Miss Mary Willie Wight, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Wight of Uniontown. They are the parents of seven children.

GEN. WILLIAM TEMPLE WITHERS was a soldier in the war with Mexico, an officer of the Confederate army, a lawyer by training and profession, and had the versatile gifts and abilities that enabled him to move in the circles of the great and the eminent of his generation.

In business administration and organization he was perhaps at his best. Besides his many engaging personal qualities which made his friendship widely sought, his connection with Kentucky is perhaps chiefly represented through the beautiful "Fairlawn" estate adjoining Lexington on the north, which under his ownership became famous as a center for the production of Kentucky thoroughbred and trotting stock.

General Withers was born near Cynthiana in Harrison County, Kentucky, on his grandfather's farm, January 8, 1825. His grandfather, Benjamin Withers, came from Virginia when about eighteen years of age. He acquired and developed the land in Harrison County where his grandson was born. His wife was Ann Markham. Their son William Allen Withers married Eliza Perrin, of Stanford, Lincoln County. While at Cynthiana William A. Withers was for several years postmaster. About 1855 he moved to Jackson, Mississippi, where he lived with his son W. T. Withers. At the time of the battle of Jackson he volunteered for staff duty on General Loring's staff, and was killed in action.

William Temple Withers acquired his early education in Cynthiana and Bacon College at Harrisburg, an institution that was a precursor of Transylvania University. While at Bacon College he met and became engaged to Martha Sharkey, then a student in Greenwood Institute at Harrodsburg.

In June, 1846, he would have graduated from Bacon College. In the preceding April the Mexican war broke out. Capt. Phil Thompson raised a company at Harrodsburg, and the young college student promptly enlisted and was made a sergeant. This company was assigned to Colonel McKee's Regiment, and took part in some of the earliest actions of the war along the Rio Grande, including the battle of Resaca de la Palma, also at Monterey, and later the regiment was in the front line of action at Vera Cruz, where Colonel McKee was killed and Sergeant Withers left on the field for dead. Only his great will power saved him. After three months in the hospital he was sent home and remained on crutches for two years. It was this wound that more than forty years later was the immediate cause of his death. On his return to Cynthiana, his mother having died in the meantime, General Withers took up the study of law with Judge Curry and began practice there. In March, 1850, he married Miss Sharkey at her home at Grand Gulf, Mississippi. Her father was a prominent planter, and Mr. Withers yielded to the persuasions of his father-in-law and joined him in the operation of the plantation. His two oldest children were born on the Sharkey plantation. About 1854 he resumed his law practice in company with Judge Lewis Sharkey, a cousin of Mrs. Withers. Judge Sharkey was one of Mississippi's most distinguished jurists and statesmen, having served as Federal district judge, as governor of Mississippi, and at the time of his death was United States senator. Besides his law practice General Withers gave much of his time to the management of several plantations in Mississippi and Louisiana, and was also a commission cotton merchant in New Orleans. The outbreak of the Civil war found him conservatively rated as worth a quarter of a million.

He at once offered his service to the Confederate cabinet and was sent to Kentucky to raise troops. He established Camp Boone on the border of Tennessee and Kentucky, where he mobilized the First Kentucky Brigade for the Confederate army. This brigade went into the army under Colonel Smith. Returning to Mississippi, General Withers there raised the only regiment of Light Artillery in the Confederate army, was chosen its colonel when it mobilized at Jackson, and was commander of the battery during the siege of Vicksburg. At the surrender of that stronghold he accepted parole. His family in the meantime had continued to live at Jackson, and on reaching that city he found his home burned, his father lay dead on the street and it was only after considerable inquiry that he discovered the whereabouts of his family. He then conveyed them to Alabama, and they remained at Tuskegee until the end of the war. About a year after the fall of Vicksburg Colonel Withers was exchanged, and on reporting for duty was assigned to command the left wing of the Confederate forces on the Bay of Mobile. He was there until the final surrender of Mobile.

Judge Sharkey, his former law partner, on being appointed governor of Mississippi requested Colonel Withers to assume the negotiations for securing pardons for those not included under the general amnesty. This duty took him to Washington. While there he formed a company to sell southern lands, becoming its agent. In the course of this business he went to Boston with a letter to Governor Andrew, the high minded and liberal governor of Massachusetts. Governor Andrew treated him most kindly, entertained him at his home, and introduced him to many of the celebrities of Boston. Governor Andrew furthermore became president of a company to buy lands in the South. On his return to Mississippi General Withers had the management of several plantations acquired by northern capitalists. He also resumed practice at Jackson as a member of the firm of Harris & Withers, and made his own home on a plantation in the northern part of the state. For a time he was prospered both as a lawyer and as a planter. By 1868 the reconstruction regime had changed conditions so as to make planting unprofitable, and at that time General Withers returned to Jackson to give his law practice his personal attention. He continued to operate one of the plantations of his wife's father. He with other loyal southerners suffered keenly under the military regime in Mississippi, with the State Legislature controlled by negroes. General Withers at that time had a family of ten children, and his choice of a new location was governed by consideration for their welfare. In 1871 he left Jackson and removed to Lexington as one of the best educational centers of the South.

General Withers made little effort to establish himself in law practice after coming to Lexington. He took up with enthusiasm the typical Kentucky industry of thoroughbred horses, and recognizing the great demand for trotting horses and road horses he secured Fairlawn Farm north of the city, and by his wise discrimination made it one of the most famous breeding farms in the South. He bought the noted sire Almont, and in subsequent years the horses from Fairlawn enjoyed a world-wide reputation. General Withers was a close student of breeding as a science, and he also advertised effectively and was very successful in the business side of his work at Fairlawn. General Grant at one time visited Fairlawn, and another eminent guest was King Kalikena of the Sandwich Islands, already familiar with some of the horses imported to those islands from Fairlawn. During his life at Fairlawn General Withers exemplified the utmost southern hospitality, and there were guests at his home practically all the time.

The last two years of his life he suffered much from his old wound, and for his health he visited Florida, where he owned orange groves. He died at his Fayette County home June 18, 1889. General Withers was also interested in some gold mines in Arizona, and all his business enterprises were undertaken on a large scale. He was a man of wonderful energy, a high minded citizen, and was devoted to the Church of the Disciples. He was also active in the movement for reviving what is now Transylvania University. He steadfastly refused all invitations to seek office. He was loyal to the utmost to his family and left them a handsome fortune. His widow survived him until the end of 1915, and though eighty-four years of age she retained all of her mental faculties. Of her ten children nine survived her and were with her at the end.

One son still lives in Lexington, William Temple Withers, Jr. Another son Robert Sharkey Withers lives in Mississippi. Mrs. Jennie Ashbrook is a widow living in California. The other daughters who live at Lexington are: Ida W., Mrs. Albert M. Harrison; Miss Sallie Withers; Mrs. Alice Withers Headley, wife of James T. Headley; Martha, Mrs. Charles Whitney Moore; Miss Ann Markham Withers; and Mary Stamps, Mrs. W. S. Brooker, of Lexington.

HORACE WILLIAM CLEVELAND was one of the useful members of one of the most highly honored families of Jessamine County, where his comparatively brief career was spent in farming on a portion of the old Cleveland estate. Some of the history of the Cleveland land possessions and the story of the family, including his father, George Cleveland, are subjects taken up in another article in this publication.

Horace William Cleveland was born at the old Cleveland homestead in Jessamine County April 3, 1845. The old home in which he was born is still owned by his brother, George W. Cleveland, one of the noted Jersey cattle breeders of Kentucky. Horace William Cleveland lived on a portion of the Cleveland estate all his life, and his farm is still owned by Mrs. Cleveland, who now lives at 218 Maxwell Street in Lexington.

Mr. Cleveland died in Jessamine County January 27, 1892. May 1, 1867, he married Fannie Haydon, daughter of Whitfield and Elizabeth (Singleton) Haydon. Mrs. Cleveland represents the lines of some historic Kentucky families. Her great-great-grandfather, Manoa Singleton, was one of the earliest settlers of Jessamine County, coming from Virginia about 1780.

His son Mason and his grandson Jeremiah Singleton spent all their lives in the same community. Whitfield Haydon, father of Mrs. Cleveland, was the son of William Haydon and grandson of John Haydon, who after coming from Virginia settled in Bourbon County. William Haydon moved to Jessamine County, and he and his wife, Sarah Garnett, spent their active lives in Jessamine County in the same vicinity as the Clevelands. Whitfield Haydon inherited his father's farm, but at the time of his marriage bought the home of his wife's father, Jeremiah Singleton, who then removed to Henry County, where he died. Whitfield Haydon died at his old home in 1895, at the age of ninety-one, and his wife passed away the same year, aged sixty-seven.

Fannie Haydon was born on that farm, which has since been sold out of the family possession, being the third of four children. She was sixteen years of age at the time of her marriage to Mr. Cleveland. As a bride she went to a portion of the Cleveland estate and, while still owning that property, has been a resident of Lexington for the past ten years.

Horace William Cleveland was always interested in community affairs, particularly churches and schools, and served as clerk of the Mount Pleasant Baptist Church. This church was established under the leadership of Rev. Louis Craig, who after the breaking up of an older Baptist organization on account of the preaching of Alexander Campbell gathered about him about a hundred souls who still remained true to Baptist doctrine, including the Haydons and the Singletons, and organized Mount Pleasant Church. Since coming to Lexington Mrs. Cleveland has transferred her church membership here and is a worker in the church and missionary society.

Mrs. Cleveland is the mother of three sons and one daughter. Her son George Cleveland, who died at Lexington at the age of forty-seven, married Sallie Wilson and left three daughters: Mary, wife of Dr. J. S. Goodrich, of Lexington; Pauline, wife of Frank Spencer; and Frances G., who is the wife of Wilburn Curd and has a daughter, Jane W., only great-grandchild of Mrs. Cleveland. W. Haydon Cleveland is a farmer at Lebanon, Kentucky, and by his marriage to Bessie Claybrook has three sons, Frank, Joseph and Lynn. Ernest Cleveland, the youngest son, is on the old homestead farm, and married Irene Moseley. Mrs. Cleveland's only daughter is Miss Bessie Ora, living with her mother at Lexington.

BENJAMIN T. HUME, whose ideal rural home, Maxwellton Farm, is situated on the Winchester Turnpike at a point four miles east of Lexington and who has served for more than forty years as republican judge of his precinct, is one of the honored and representative men of this part of Fayette County and is one of only four farm owners in this immediate section of the Winchester Turnpike district to have here maintained consecutive residence since 1878.

Benjamin Talbott Hume was born in Bourbon County, Kentucky, on the 30th of June, 1851, and is a son of David and Martha (Talbott) Hume, both members of old and honored Kentucky and Virginia families. Capt. William P. Hume, grandfather of the subject of this review, was born in Clark County, the place of his nativity having been the ancestral farm on Strode's Creek, and he died in April, 1875, but three days prior to his birthday anniversary—so that the year of his birth was April 7, 1792. His father, George Hume, was born in Culpeper County, Virginia, a son of John Hume, whose father, a Scottish nobleman, George Hume, took part in the rising for Prince Charles in 1715, was taken prisoner and sentenced to death, but a pardon was obtained for him. By reason of his father and his own participation in the Jacobite rebellion George Hume, the son, was imprisoned and later banished to Virginia. In 1723 two years after his landing, owing to the influence of his cousin Governor Spotswood, George Hume was employed as assistant to the chief surveyor of William and Mary College. Later he became official surveyor of Orange County and in 1727-28 he laid out the present City of Fredericksburg. He served in the Colonial troops of Spottsylvania County as a lieutenant under Capt. William Bledsoe. George Washington was from his sixteenth to eighteenth year under the tutelage of George Hume and learned surveying from him. George Hume, above mentioned, was a brother of David Hume, the great English historian. George Hume, son of John, the Virginia pioneer, came to Kentucky in the middle part of the eighteenth century and became one of the prominent and influential citizens of Clark County. His wife, whose family name was Patton, was a kinswoman of the Virginia men of that name who were the first to import Shorthorn cattle into America. Capt. William P. Hume was the first president of the Bourbon County Agricultural Fair. He raised a company at Clintonville, Bourbon County, for service in the Mexican war, and he had command of this company during the progress of that conflict. After the war he settled on a farm estate west of Paris, Bourbon County, and the Hume and Bedford Turnpike received the first part of its title in honor of this sterling citizen, Mr. Bedford, another prominent citizen of the county, having been similarly honored in the connection.

David Hume was born at Clintonville, and he eventually became the owner of a valuable farm property near the old homestead of his father, on the Hume and Bedford Turnpike. After many years of successful farm enterprise he removed to Paris, the county seat, and there he died in his eighty-third year, his wife having been sixty-nine years of age at the time of her death. David Hume was a man of vision and progressiveness, liberal in support of all measures advanced for the general good of the community but was not animated by political ambition or office-seeking proclivities. He deemed farm industry worthy of his best efforts and became one of the specially successful agriculturists and stock-growers of Bourbon County, where, like his father, he gave special attention to the breeding and raising of high-grade Shorthorn cattle, and was also a breeder of fine trotting horses. His old home farm has been sold by his heirs, but his eldest son, William, still owns and resides upon a portion of the original landed estate which he accumulated in Bourbon County. Benjamin T., the immediate subject of this sketch, is the second son; Orlando, who died in Bourbon County, at the age of fifty-five years, was a well known breeder and trainer of the best type of Kentucky trotting horses; Samuel, the fourth son, who removed to Missouri and died twenty years ago, was a prosperous farmer near Mexico, that state; and John met his death by drowning, when a lad of twelve years.

Benjamin T. Hume was reared under the invigorating discipline of the home farm and his higher education was obtained in Georgetown College in Scott County, an institution in which he was graduated as a member of the class of 1871. In 1878 he established his home on his present farm, which is the old homestead of Rev. Thomas P. Dudley, who married the mother of Carter Harrison, former mayor of Chicago, and who achieved prominence as the "Ironside Baptist preacher." The farm is part of the tract granted to an ancestor of this patriotic clergyman in recognition of his services in the War of the Revolution. Here Mr. Hume now owns a fine farm in the fertile and valuable Blue Grass land of Fayette County, and the commodious and attractive house which constitutes the family home was erected by him in 1884, the same being surrounded by a beautiful grove and the house being set well back from the public highway. Mr. Hume has brought to bear in his operations as an agriculturist and stock-grower an exceptional discrimination and judgment, and his vigorous and progressive policies have resulted in his making all departments of his enterprise distinctly successful. For ten years he maintained his farm with special provisions for the boarding and care of fine horses, and in this connection he received the supporting patronage of a number of Kentucky's leading horse breeders, including Smith McCann, owner of "Red Wilkes," a horse that was for some time kept on the Hume farm, as was also "Clay," owned by R. C. Strader. During the period when he thus had charge of the breeding and raising of fine horses Mr. Hume attained to high reputation in this field of enterprise.

He is a stalwart of stalwarts in the Kentucky camp of the republican party, has been influential in the local councils and campaign activities of his party, and those who have seen the two men can not but note his remarkable resemblance, in figure and facial lineaments, to the distinguished and veteran member of Congress from Illinois, the Hon. Joseph Cannon. Mr. Hume has never sought office, but the insistence of his friends in the community has kept him the incumbent of the position of precinct judge for forty-two years. At the time he here established his residence Mr. Hume was one of the only two republicans in the precinct. Within eight years thereafter the precinct returned an appreciable republican majority, and it has continued a republican stronghold to the present time. Mr. Hume is well fortified in his political convictions and is ever ready to defend the same, his resourcefulness in political discussion and argument being uniformly conceded in his home county.

As a young man of twenty-four years he was united in marriage to Miss Susan McCann, daughter of Joseph McCann, and a niece of Rev. Thomas P. Dudley, mentioned in a preceding paragraph. Mrs. Hume was born on the part of the present Hume farm that was formerly owned by her father. Mr. and Mrs. Hume have four children: Martha married Wilson Case Larvill and is living in Lexington; Benjamin T., Jr., married Maria Riker and is living in Harrodsburg, where he is engaged in the tobacco and automobile industry; Maria Dudley and Daisy are living at Maxwellton with their parents.

SILAS G. ADAMS has long been prominently identified with business, agricultural and public affairs at Science Hill and throughout Pulaski County. He is president of the People's Bank of Science Hill and also controls extensive farming interests.

Mr. Adams was born on a farm seven miles northwest of Science Hill in Pulaski County August 4, 1865. That old homestead in which he owns an interest has been in the family for many years and is also the birthplace and lifelong residence of his father George M. Adams. His grandfather John Adams was a native of North Carolina, son of Robert Adams, who was born in Ireland where he married a Miss Wiley. Robert Adams brought his family to Kentucky, lived near Lexington and then at Science Hill and died on a farm five miles west of the latter place. John Adams did the first work of development on the old homestead mentioned above, going there as a young man. His first wife was Rhoda Carr and his second wife, grandmother of the banker at Science Hill, was Mary Trowbridge, a native of Lincoln County, Kentucky.

George M. Adams was born in 1836 and died April 10, 1900. His farm was so situated that portions of it were in the three counties of Pulaski, Casey and Lincoln. He served in the Home Guards during the Civil war, was a republican and a member of the Christian Church. George M. Adams married Eunice Hendricks, who was born five miles west of Science Hill in 1839 and died at the old homestead February 8, 1883. Her children were: Napier, deputy circuit court clerk and former chief of that office at Somerset; Armstrong, who died in 1883; Silas G.; Mayetta, unmarried; Everett, part owner and manager of the homestead farm; Arizona, wife of G. R. Watson, farmer and flour miller in Casey County; Miss Della assistant in the Circuit Court Clerk's office in Somerset; DeWitt who died in Kansas at the age of thirty-four; Ollie, wife of A. L. Barker, a farmer at Britt, Iowa; and Lucretia, deceased wife of Fate Pyles, a farmer and general merchant at Linnie in Casey County.

Silas G. Adams grew up on his father's farm, was educated in country schools in Casey County, attended the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio, in 1888, again in 1890-91, and also in 1899. Beginning at the age of twenty-three he taught in rural schools in Lincoln County two years, in Pulaski County six years, and for seven years was express agent at Eubank, and from 1898 to 1902 was deputy sheriff under C. M. Langdon. At intervals in this busy career he also employed some of his energies on the home farm. In February, 1903, Mr. Adams entered the Somerest post-office as assistant postmaster, but after six months resigned and bought a farm in Casey County. In July, 1905, he was appointed by Judge J. S. Cooper as Collector of Internal Revenue for the Eighth Kentucky District, and he remained the incumbent of that office with headquarters at Somerset for six years and eight months. He then resumed the active superintendence of his farm in Casey County, but sold that place in January, 1920. He still owns a good farm of about thirty-seven acres at Science Hill, another place of 155 acres four miles west at Buncomb, and has a modern residence on his Science Hill country place.

Mr. Adams has been president of the People's Bank of Science Hill since 1919. He is a republican and a member of Somerset Lodge No. 111 F. and A. M., October 12, 1916, he married Miss Ada Denton, daughter of Alex and Eliza (Young) Denton, the latter a resident of Science Hill. Her father was a Union soldier and a farmer and died in 1919. Mrs. Adams finished her education in the State College at Lexington and in the College at Georgetown, Kentucky.

WILLIAM RILEY CAMPBELL practically grew up in the atmosphere of a planing mill at Mount Sterling, and for thirty years or more has been closely identified with the lumber industry. He promoted and established in 1909 the Lexington Tobacco Hogshead Company, of which he is general manager. This business was incorporated for $10,000, the capital having since been increased to $20,000. The first group of buildings burned with a loss of $35,000. The company now has a plant of more than an acre practically covered with sheet iron buildings, erected in 1919. The plant has a capacity of manufacturing between 500 and 600 tobacco hogsheads daily, and gives employment to fifty men eight months in the year. From $15,000 to $20,000 are paid out for labor. The raw material is chiefly white oak and is obtained from a number of southern states. The first president of the company was the late Col. Milton Young, and W. H. Hart is now president.

Mr. Campbell was born near Bethel in Bath County, Kentucky, August 17, 1851, youngest of the nine children of John Campbell, a native of Ireland, who died when his youngest child was three years old. The mother was Amanda Busby, of Pennsylvania Scotch ancestry. She died in 1878. William R. Campbell is now the only survivor of the family. His brother James B. owned a planing mill at Mount Sterling. His brother George was a farmer who removed to Indiana in 1856 and later to St. Joseph, Missouri.

Mr. Campbell's mother lived in Indiana from 1856 until 1872, and he lived with her, acquiring his education while there. Later he joined his brother at Mount Sterling, and went to work in the planing mill and thus acquired a practical and technical knowledge of wood working and the lumber industry. In July, 1890, he came to Lexington with the B. F. McCormick Lumber Company and about twenty years ago he began manufacturing tobacco hogsheads on a small scale. His original associate was J. W. Hodges. Later he sold this business to Frank Waller, and then made another independent start. He is now head of a business which does much to supply the tobacco manufacturers with their hogsheads.

Mr. Campbell has served as a member of the City Council of Lexington and in 1907 was candidate for city assessor. He is a charter member of Phoenix Lodge, Knights of Pythias, and is a business man and citizen who has a large circle of admiring friends in Lexington.

Mr. Campbell married at Mount Sterling Miss Melinda Kidd, daughter of Robert Kidd, of Kiddville in Clark County. After her death Mr. Campbell married Miss Nellie McCarty, of Lexington. His four children, all by his first marriage, were: Bruce R., who served with the rank of lieutenant colonel in the army during the World war; Clyde, who was killed on election day at Lexington in 1907 by a member of the Lexington police force, dying at the age of twenty-four; Elmer, who served as a captain in the army during the World war and is now a resident of Nashville, Tennessee; and Lucile, wife of Fred Eichenberger, an attorney at Covington.

HENRY DIXON ALLEN, former congressman, lawyer and farmer of Morganfield, Union County, is widely known all over Western Kentucky. He qualified and for a time was connected with three professions, teacher, doctor, and lawyer, and his business as a farmer stands as a worthy achievement without reference to his other activities.

Mr. Allen represents some of the distinguished family names of Kentucky. He was born on a farm near Henderson in Henderson County, Kentucky, June 24, 1854. His parents were Dr. James B. and Frances (Dixon) Allen, the former a native of Shelby County, Kentucky, and the latter of Henderson County, Kentucky. His father received his literary and medical education at old Transylvania University at Lexington, at which he graduated, and after his marriage in Henderson County he located there and practiced medicine until 1855, when he removed to Sulphur Springs, Union County. He had a large practice and was devoted to his profession until his death in 1867, at the age of fifty-four years. His widow survived him two years, dying at the age of fifty-two years.

Henry Dixon Allen was reared at Sulphur Springs, Union County, Kentucky, and was educated in the common schools and the Morganfield Collegiate Institute. At the age of seventeen he became a teacher in Union County, and the following five years he alternated between his duties in the schoolroom and as a farm laborer. In 1877, at the age of twenty-three, he graduated in medicine at the Missouri Medical College, the old McDowell College of St. Louis, Missouri, and for six months practiced his profession at Morganfield. However, the work was not attractive to him, and turning his mind to the study of law he qualified and was admitted to the bar in 1878. Before entering active practice he was elected county school commissioner for Union County, but resigned three years later and was then elected county attorney, an office he filled for nine consecutive years. The culmination of his political career came when he was chosen by the Second District of Kentucky as its representative to the Fifty-Sixth Congress. He was re-elected two years later and served four years. At the conclusion of his second term he declined to participate in politics as a candidate for office, and has faithfully adhered to the profession of law and has given all his time and best energies to his work as a lawyer and his interests as a farmer. He has been a life-long democrat and has been affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows since 1882.

With interests accumulated through a long period of years Mr. Allen is now one of the large scale farmers of Union County. He owns and operates 950 acres of land and takes a just pride in his farming interests. He is also one of the principal stockholders in The Peoples Bank & Trust Company of Morganfield and at present is chairman of the Board of Directors of that bank.

In 1881 Mr. Allen married Miss Martha Hughes, of Morganfield, who died in 1887. In 1891 Miss Gertrude Pittman became his wife. She was also a resident of Morganfield. By his first marriage Mr. Allen has two children, Blanton, a graduate of Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia, and now in the wholesale automobile supply business at Chattanooga, Tennessee, and Martha, wife of George B. Allen, a clothing merchant at Atlanta, Georgia. Mr. Allen is the father of two sons by his second marriage. Henry Dixon Allen, Jr., born June 27, 1893, is a graduate of the Morganfield High School, studied law under his father, and is now in active practice as junior member of the Morganfield firm of Allen, Harris & Allen. Both he and his brother, Cromwell Morton Allen, as volunteers answered the call to duty during the World war. July 1, 1918, he went into training at Camp Taylor, Louisville, remaining there until after the signing of the armistice. Cromwell Morton Allen, the youngest son, was born January 27, 1899, went with the colors in July, 1918, and was at the Great Lakes Naval Training School until the war ended. He is a graduate of Morganfield High School and is now a student in the Department of Agriculture at Purdue University, Lafayette, Indiana.

WILLIAM HENRY NUNN, M. D. The medical profession of Union County has no more honored member than Dr. William Henry Nunn of Morganfield. He began his professional career forty years ago, and several communities in Western Kentucky have had reason to be grateful for his skill as a physician, his character as a citizen, and his deep and sincere interest in the life and affairs going on about him.

Doctor Nunn was born on a farm in Crittenden County, Kentucky, September 10, 1854. His grandfather, Ira Nunn, was born and married in Georgia, and was one of Kentucky's pioneers, settling in Crittenden County in 1797. He married a Miss Livingston, a member of an old and prominent Georgia family of that name. Thomas Livingston Nunn, father of Doctor Nunn, spent his life in Crittenden County as a farmer, and died there at the age of fifty-four. He married Sarah C. Haynes, a native of the same county, and daughter of Robert Henry Haynes, who married a Miss Young, both native Kentuckians. Mrs. Thomas L. Nunn lived to the advanced age of eighty-six.

William Henry Nunn spent his early life on a farm, and even in the midst of a busy professional career has retained some interests in agriculture and country life. His early opportunities were limited to the common schools, but he wisely applied himself to his studies, and at the age of twenty-one was enrolled as a teacher. For two years he taught in the schools of his native county, and in the meantime began attending medical lectures at the University of Louisville. He completed his course in the University of Tennessee at Nashville, where he was graduated M. D. in 1881. For the first years he practiced in his native county at Weston, and then in order to be nearer his parents and look after the old homestead he located at Repton. From 1889 to 1891 Doctor Nunn practiced in Jasper County, Illinois, and on returning to Kentucky in the latter year established his home at Henshaw in Union County. He has been continuously identified with his profession in Union County for thirty years, and since 1910 his seat of practice and home has been at Morganfield. While one of the older physicians of the county he has never relaxed his studious efforts and has kept in touch with every matter affecting his science and profession. He is a member of the Union County, Kentucky State, Southern and American Medical associations. Since 1878 he has been affiliated with the Masonic Order and is a Knight Templar. Doctor Nunn is a democrat in politics and a member of the Methodist Church.

His farming interests are now being capably managed by his son, James Proctor Nunn, in Union County. Doctor Nunn also has a daughter, Olga Lucile, wife of Thomas S. Waller, Jr., one of the leading members of the Morganfield bar. Doctor Nunn married Miss Ida King in 1891. She was born and reared in Crittenden County.

CAPT. JOHN W. THROCKMORTON. The life of Captain Throckmorton of Lexington has been one that has brought him in touch with many classes of citizens and several groups of interests. He is one of the oldest railroad men of the state, with a service of more than half a century. For a number of years he has been Union stationmaster at Lexington. The military title by which he is most familiarly known is derived from service on the staffs of two governors, Acting Governor Thos. A. Combs, a democrat, and Governor Morrow, a republican. Captain Throckmorton was a close friend of Governor Morrow's father.

Born in Nicholas County, Kentucky, February 4, 1848, Captain Throckmorton is son of George W. and Mary (Devers) Throckmorton, both of whom died when he was a child. His great-grandfather was Ethelbert Dudley, a pioneer minister of the Primitive Baptist faith who continued his good work at Lexington and vicinity for upwards of half a century. The daughter of this pioneer minister Sally Dudley married John Throckmorton of Nicholas County and they spent their lives at the old tavern $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Millersburg. This was Throckmorton Tavern, located on the Maysville Pike. John Throckmorton put up the tavern about 1810. His brother Maj. Arris Throckmorton was proprietor of the first Galt House at Louisville and also operated Blue Lick Springs as a noted resort.

Captain Throckmorton was reared at the home of his grandfather, living there until his grandfather died in 1865 at the age of eighty-six. While there he went back and forth to Millersburg to attend the Male and Female School conducted by Dr. George S. Savage. For about a year after his grandfather's death he lived at the home of his guardian Thomas Boyd at Boyd Station in Harrison County.

Captain Throckmorton entered the railroad service in 1866 as baggage and mail clerk and in 1868 was given a regular run as a baggage man. In the spring of 1869 he became conductor of the old Kentucky Central train between Covington and Falmouth, reaching that exalted honor in railroading before he was twenty-one years of age. For a number of years he continued with the old Kentucky Central, and in 1878 was given a run on the Louisville & Nashville between Bowling Green and Memphis. The devastating yellow fever epidemic occurred in that year, and his service as a railroad man brought him in contact with many of the terrible features of that summer. During 1879 he was running between Louisville and Nashville and then for a brief time returned to the old Kentucky Central at Covington. The Kentucky Central was purchased by the Chesapeake & Ohio in 1881 and it was under Captain Throckmorton's supervision that the connecting track was built at Lexington, being completed July 21, 1881, and permitting connection between the Big Sandy division and the Mount Sterling division. During 1884 for a short time he was on a run between Covington and Huntington, West Virginia. This was a long run and the best on that road. Captain Throckmorton was in the same service until 1906, a period of nearly forty years. In later years he had a train from Lexington to Cincinnati, one of the first runs he had had during the '70s. His selection as stationmaster for the Union Station at Lexington was an honor well deserved by his many years of faithful service. The Union Station was opened August 4, 1907, and he has been the authority in charge of operation and management ever since. Captain Throckmorton has long been a member of the Order of Railway Conductors, and has been a delegate to the national body known as the Grand Division, and also chairman of the Kentucky Division of the Louisville & Nashville system.

In 1880 Captain Throckmorton bought the Boyd farm of his uncle and the farm was his home until 1896, when he sold it and has since lived in Lexington. For many years he bred saddle and show horses, and both he and his wife were expert drivers and riders. His animals exhibited at fairs won many honors, and he continued to be actively identified with the industry until the advent of the era of automobiles. His interests as a horseman were developed when he was a boy. Captain Throckmorton has been an extensive traveler. He was an ardent admirer of the late Theodore Roosevelt and in politics has always been a staunch republican. His name was on the republican state ticket of 1899, when Mr. Taylor was elected governor. Captain Throckmorton was candidate for commissioner of agriculture and received a majority of 50,000. After filling the office only two months he resigned to return to his duties as railway conductor. He has been active in many campaigns, and has wielded a great power and influence among railway men. In 1885 he was a candidate for the State Legislature in Harrison County and greatly reduced the opposition majority. For a quarter of a century he has served regularly as an election official. He is a member of Lexington Lodge No. 1 F. and A. M., is Past Eminent Commander of Webb Commandery Knights Templar, and a member of the Knights of Pythias.

December 15, 1870, Captain Throckmorton married Carrie Reynolds of Covington. She died in January, 1897, the mother of two children. Laura is the wife of Roger V. Harp, a grocery merchant at Lexington; her son Roger Victor Harp died March 4, 1920, at the age of four years two months. She has a daughter Laura Lucile Harp, now a student in high school. The other child of Captain Throckmorton is Ben Epperson, formerly a conductor on the Eastern Kentucky Division of the Louisville & Nashville, now employed in the Louisville & Nashville yards at South Louisville. For his second wife Captain Throckmorton married Lillian Lucile Bullock, February 3, 1898, whose father Henry Bullock was a well known capitalist and farmer at Falmouth, Kentucky. To this marriage has been born one daughter, Virginia, now a student in the State College. Captain Throckmorton has been actively identified with the Christian Church for half a century, and for several years has been a deacon of the Central Christian Church at Lexington.

PRESTON LESLIE SLOAN was born at Louisville, Kentucky, on July 16, 1872. He is a descendant of sturdy Irish ancestors who left Ireland and came to Virginia to assist in establishing the white man's civilization in America. About the year 1797 his great-grandfather, Bryant Sloan, moved to Kentucky and settled on a land grant located in Spencer County and deeded to him by Governor Patrick Henry of Virginia. His paternal and maternal ancestors lived in that county until 1879, when his father moved to Lexington to engage in the building and contracting business. His father, Benjamin Franklin Sloan, is still living. His mother, Nannie Sloan, died in the year 1886. Preston Leslie Sloan was the oldest child in a family of seven children, five sons and two daughters. Three of the children died in infancy. A sister, Miss Dorothy Sloan, and a brother, John Morrie Sloan, are living in Lexington.

Preston Leslie Sloan has lived in Lexington continuously since 1879, where he attended the public schools until forced by circumstances at the age of fourteen to engage in business. For many years he was associated with various railroad companies as a telegrapher and in different positions in the freight and passenger departments. He was engaged in a general mercantile business in Lexington for possibly five years, and served for several years in the accounting department of one of Lexington's national banks.

In October, 1917, he was appointed secretary of the Kentucky Growers Insurance Company, Incorporated, of Lexington, Kentucky, and holds this position at the present time. This company is a co-operative association of Kentucky farmers organized in 1896 to furnish protection at actual cost to farm property and farm products against loss or damage by fire, lightning or wind. It is a non-profit organization and is conducted on the assessment plan.

Mr. Sloan is a democrat in politics, and is a member of the Episcopal Church, being a communicant of the Church of the Good Shepherd of Lexington. He is a vestryman in that church organization, is also its treasurer and has served for six years as president of the Good Fellowship Club, an association organized by the church for social service work among men.

He is a member of the Kiwanis Club and of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the World. His life has been filled with active service in behalf of the loved ones of his immediate family, his church, his business interests and his community, but much good fortune and many blessings have been bestowed upon him and filled life's pathway with good cheer and happiness. He regards as a crowning blessing, his fortunate and happy marriage on March 17, 1903, to Miss Bessie Curd Field, the youngest daughter of Thomas M. and Sue Higbee Field, of Woodford County, Kentucky. To add to the happiness of this union a daughter, Miriam Field Sloan was born on April 13, 1907. She is a bright and lovable girl, a source of joy and pleasure to her parents and possesses characteristics that will endear her to all with whom she may be associated in life's journey.

CAPT. JOHN HUBBELL CARTER. One of the honored citizens of Kentucky for many years was Capt. John H. Carter, who in both civil and military affairs exhibited qualities of the highest order and honored the community and state in which he resided. Captain Carter was born at New Milford, Litchfield County, Connecticut, on August 24, 1835, and was the second son in a family of five children who blessed the union of Lyman and Anne (West) Carter. His mother was of old Puritan stock and traced her descent back to the Pilgrim Fathers. His father was a farmer, and the sons, while trained to the arduous labors of New England farming, were also given the learning of New England boys. John prepared for college at Fort Edward Institute, New York, and was graduated at Union College, Schenectady, New York, in 1859, under the presidency of the celebrated Doctor Norton, ranking sixteenth in a class of 128. Coming to Kentucky the same year, he located near Lexington, secured a position as teacher, and resumed the study of law, which he had begun in college. When the Civil war began he was principal of school No. 1, known as the Morton School, the largest in Lexington at that time. In July, 1862, he enlisted in Company D, Second Kentucky Cavalry, this regiment being the famous "old regiment" of Gen. John H. Morgan. With this command he served during the war, surrendering at Washington, Georgia, in May, 1865, at which time he was captain of the company in which he first enlisted, having been promoted for "efficiency and distinguished gallantry in the field." He was with Morgan in all his operations, and although captured three times, he each time contrived to elude the vigilance of his guards and rejoin his regiment. In a charge on a line of infantry at Nashville, Tennessee, he was wounded and left on the field, his horse being killed under him in the same action; but a few weeks' nursing by the ladies of Nashville brought about his recovery, and he soon escaped. When the "old Advance Guard" was formed at Sparta, Tennessee, in August, 1862, of twenty-five picked men, he was one of its members; he was orderly sergeant of the advance guard of fifty picked men on the raid into Kentucky in December, 1862, known as the Christmas raid; was also orderly sergeant of the advance guard in the raid into Kentucky in June, 1864; took part in the whole of the celebrated raid into Ohio from start to finish; and was with the escort of President Jefferson Davis on the retreat south after the fall of Richmond.

In the winter of 1863-4 Captain Carter was a prisoner at Camp Douglas, Chicago, and while there the way was open for his escape to Canada, though impossible for him to go South. When told of this he courageously replied: "I can be of no use in Canada. My place is with our soldiers in the field. I shall try and go to them." And go to them he did, though he was compelled to pass through Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and Kentucky, and in two weeks time he reported for duty to General Morgan at Abingdon, Virginia. When General Morgan was killed at Greenville, Tennessee, the sad task of escorting the remains of their beloved leader was assigned to Sergeant Carter and twelve men of the old regiment. One of the most daring deeds of the war was performed by Sergeant Carter at the battle of Marion, Virginia, where, with ten men, he made a detour and opened so rapid and deadly a fire on an advancing column of Federal troops, who were threatening to sweep the key-note position of the Southern troops, that the column was put to rout and retreated in disorder. Shortly after this he received his commission as captain. He surrendered with his comrades at Washington, Georgia, and reached home in June, 1865, at which time he owned nothing beyond a horse and two pistols.

On his return home Captain Carter was offered, and accepted, the position of teacher of the school at Bryant's station, which he kept for two years. After teaching school for five years the Captain went to farming, in which he met with uniform success and continued up to the time of his death, which occurred on January 10, 1909. He took an active interest in public affairs of his community and was influential in advancing the general interests of the locality. He served as a magistrate for four years, a school commissioner for two terms, on several occasions served as special county judge, and served for ten years on the Democratic Central Committee. Intensely proud of his record as a Confederate soldier, he did much, both by writing and speaking, to perpetuate the brave deeds of his comrades. He was a charter member of the Confederate Veteran Association of Kentucky; served as adjutant-general of the Kentucky Division, United Confederate Veterans, and was chairman of the first Battle Abbey Commission, which met at Atlanta in October, 1895.

In the spring of 1866, Captain Carter was married to Judith Anne Coons, the younger daughter of William B. and Lucy (Ferguson) Coons, of Fayette County, Kentucky. To this union were born six children, as follows: William Lyman, of Lexington, Kentucky, who married Hattie Williams and has three children; John Hubbell, Jr., who is represented in the following sketch; Clifton Carroll, who married Marie Coleman and is the father of two children, is a colonel in the United States army, and at the present time an instructor in physics at West Point Military Academy; Gus, of Lexington; Anne Marshall, the wife of Julius E. Marsh, of High Point, North Carolina; and Mildred Ellen, of Lexington, Kentucky.

JOHN HUBBELL CARTER, JR. In the annals of Kentucky as pertaining to public affairs the name of John H. Carter, Jr., of Lexington, occupies a conspicuous place, for through a series of years he has held important official positions and has ranked as one of the community's representative citizens. Mr. Carter is a native son of the old Blue Grass state, having been born on his father's farm in Fayette County on April 24, 1872. His parents, John Hubbell and Judith Anne (Coons) Carter, were natives, respectively, of Connecticut and Fayette county, Kentucky. Specific mention is made of them in a separate sketch elsewhere in this work. They were the parents of six children, namely: William Lyman, who married Hattie Williams, has three children, and is living in Lexington, Kentucky; John Hubbell, Jr., the subject of this sketch; Clifton Carroll, who married Marie Coleman and is the father of two children, is a colonel in the United States army, and at the present time serving as instructor in physics at West Point Military Academy; Gus, of Lexington; Anne Marshall, the wife of Julius E. Marsh, of High Point, North Carolina; and Mildred Ellen, of Lexington, Kentucky.

John Hubbell Carter, Jr., attended the public schools of Fayette County and then took a commercial course in the Lexington Business College. His first employment was as bookkeeper and inspector for the Nelson Grain Company, with whom he remained about three years, after which he became connected with the Lexington-Carter County Mining Company. In 1895 Mr. Carter was appointed deputy clerk of the Circuit Court, which office he held consecutively for over fourteen years. During the following two years he was with the Combs Lumber Company, and then was again appointed deputy clerk of the Circuit Court, holding that position until January 1, 1916, having been elected clerk of the Circuit Court in the previous November. He has proven a most capable, painstaking and accommodating official, and to a remarkable degree enjoys the confidence and esteem of the general public. His is a most responsible and exacting position, but he long ago demonstrated his eminent fitness for the work and the wisdom of his selection has long since been verified.

Mr. Carter is a democrat in his political alignment and is a member of the Second Presbyterian Church. Fraternally he is a member of Lexington Lodge No. 89, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He is an active member of the Fayette Gun Club and of the Newellerslie Fishing Club, the Board of Commerce, the Young Men's Christian Association and the American Red Cross Society. During the World war Mr. Carter took a very active part in advancing all war activities, especially as pertaining to relief work and bond sales—in fact, throughout his career he has acted in a public-spirited manner towards all movements tending to advance the highest and best interests of the community.

Mr. Carter was married on October 12, 1899, to Mary Statira Mitchell, who was born in Carter County, Kentucky, the daughter of William Cutter and Bainton Matilda (Hord) Mitchell. William C. Mitchell was born in Kennebunk, Maine, and died in 1875, when forty-four years of age, while his wife, who was born in Carter County, Kentucky, died in 1880, at the age of forty-five years. Of the five children born to them, all of whom are living, Mrs. Carter is the third in order of birth. William C. Mitchell came to Kentucky in young manhood and here followed the profession of civil engineering. He was a member of the Episcopal Church and in politics was a democrat. To Mr. and Mrs. Carter has been born a daughter, Anne Hillon.

E. J. TEED is one of the popular railroad men whose homes are at Lexington. He is ticket agent for the Louisville & Nashville Railway and Chesapeake & Ohio Railway, and has been pursuing a consecutive round of responsibilities in railroad work since early boyhood.

He was born at Oakley, Ohio, and spent his early boyhood in Henry County, Kentucky. His parents came from England to the United States in 1881, his father being a shoe merchant. E. J. Teed was eight years old when his mother died, and after that he practically lived among strangers. From the age of ten until he went into a railroad office his home was on a farm.

He began work for the Louisville & Nashville and Chesapeake & Ohio at Winchester in 1905 as a messenger boy in the freight office. From that office he was sent to Knoxville, Tennessee. For one year Mr. Teed was employed in the freight department at Detroit with the Detroit, Toledo & Ironton Railway, the railway property which recently was purchased by Henry Ford. Mr. Teed came to Lexington in 1912 as ticket seller under S. T. Swift, and since April, 1916, has been the ticket agent with five employes under his supervision.

Mr. Teed who is unmarried is a member of the Masonic Order, a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner. His vacations are usually spent hunting.

JAMES FRANK LYNN, M. D. A life-long resident of Union County, Doctor Lynn was in early years a successful teacher, and now for fifteen years has been diligently engaged in the practice of medicine, and is one of the leading physicians and surgeons of Morganfield.

JOHN WILLIAM CONWAY, M. D. In the twenty odd years since he graduated in medicine Doctor Conway has found his time and energies fully engaged in his home county of Union. A busy professional man, he has derived as much satisfaction from the good he could accomplish as from the material rewards of his vocation.

Doctor Conway was born on a farm in Union County, near Spring Grove, October 16, 1872, a son of John William and Barbara Ann (Davenport) Conway. The Conways are of Irish while the Davenports are of English lineage. His grandfather, Thomas Conway, a native of Virginia, came direct to Union County, Kentucky, and was one of the early farmers of the county. He was well known among the citizens of his day, serving as sheriff of the county and representing it in the Legislature. John William Conway, Sr., was born in Union County, spent his active life as a farmer, and died at the age of sixty. His wife, Barbara Ann Davenport, was born near Uniontown, and is still living, at the age of sixty-seven. Her father, Abraham Davenport, was for many years a farmer and general merchant in Union County.

One of a family of nine children, seven of whom are still living, Dr. John W. Conway was a farmer boy and also acquired a liberal education and a thorough preparation for his profession. He attended the common schools, the high school at Morganfield, and Bethel College at Russellville. In 1898 he graduated from the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville, and in 1909 took post-graduate work in the Chicago Polyclinic.

Doctor Conway is a member of the County and State Medical societies and the Ohio Valley Medical Association. He is a Master Mason, a Baptist and a democratic voter. In 1902 he married Mrs. Annie (Hunter) Yeiser.

CHARLES FREMONT RICHARDSON, who is president of the Western Kentucky Coal Company and a resident of Sturgis, was for many years a prominent railroad official, but about ten years ago resigned his post with the Rock Island Company to engage in the coal industry of Western Kentucky and has since made his company the largest coal producing concern in Western Kentucky.

Mr. Richardson was born at Waterford, Vermont, November 8, 1863, and was two and a half years of age when his parents, Charles P. and Kate (Moore) Richardson, his father a lumberman, moved to Groveton, Coos County, New Hampshire. He grew up there, attended the common schools, and during the three terms he attended a select school he worked to pay for his board. Mr. Richardson has never sought the easy circumstances of life, and his enjoyment of hard work has brought him much of the success he has enjoyed. He began railroading at the age of sixteen, his first duties being pushing trucks in the freight depot at East Deerfield, Massachusetts. Soon afterwards he was made a locomotive fireman, serving in that capacity with the Fitchburg Railway five years. Promoted to engineer, he was in the service of the Fitchburg Company two and a half years, spent five years at Marion, Iowa, with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul as engineer. For two years was an engineer for the South Side Elevated Railway in Chicago, and from 1893 to 1897 was one of the engineers on the Baltimore & Ohio system. In 1897 he was made road foreman of engines on the Chicago Division, and six months later was promoted to general road foreman on all the Baltimore and Ohio lines between Chicago and Cumberland, Maryland.

In 1904 Mr. Richardson joined the Frisco system as general road foreman, and for three and a half years handled the duties of this office over a railroad system stretching from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. He was then made fuel agent for the Frisco system, and in 1909 became assistant general superintendent of motive power for the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad.

In the spring of 1911 Mr. Richardson resigned and came to Sturgis as assistant to the president of the West Kentucky Coal Company. In 1912 he was made vice president and general manager, and since 1916 has been president of what under his direction and versatile abilities has become the largest coal producing organization in Western Kentucky. Mr. Richardson is connected with a number of other coal mining and operating interests, is a member of the Mine Operators Association of Kentucky and has served on its Executive Board.

He is a charter member of the International Railway Fuel Association, and has served as president of the Traveling Engineers Association, whose membership of 1,500 represents the United States, Canada and Mexico. Mr. Richardson is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner and a republican in politics. In 1885 he married Miss Marcia Stevens, of Colebrook, New Hampshire. They have two children, Herbert and Ellen.

JOHN WALLACE McCABE is one of the prosperous young farmers of Woodford County, but is a citizen of unusually wide interests and sympathies, was in training as a soldier during the World war, later went abroad as a Y. M. C. A. worker, and for a number of years has been a real leader in every community activity of his home county.

He was born July 19, 1886, on the farm where he now lives and which was inherited by his grandmother in 1855. His paternal grandparents were William Hill and Elizabeth (Leslie) McCabe, both natives of Baltimore, though they did not become acquainted until they met and married at Lexington. William Hill McCabe was a saddler by trade, and soon after his marriage moved to Midway, where he followed his trade until his death in 1852. He died only a short time before the birth of his son John L., which occurred at Midway July 10, 1852. The care of his family was left to his widowed mother, who did a noble part by her children. John L. McCabe as a youth entered a drug store at Midway, subsequently became a partner with Doctor Sutton and later with Doctor Collins under the firm name of Collins & McCabe. About 1885 he moved to the farm now owned by his son John Wallace, and he continued actively identified with farming until his death on January 7, 1914. John L. McCabe married Renna Burdette who died in February, 1914, just a month after her husband. Both were very active in the Presbyterian Church, John L. McCabe being an elder while his wife was a Sunday school teacher and kept up Sunday school activities in the little school house near her home. She was a daughter of Robert and Elizabeth (Harper) Burdette, her mother being a sister of Wallace Harper. Elizabeth (Harper) Burdette inherited what is now the McCabe farm, and lived with her daughter there the rest of her life. Renna Burdette was educated at Lancaster and later graduated from Sayre College at Lexington. Her mother had erected the present home on the farm about 1876. This farm comprises 123 acres.

John L. McCabe and wife had three children: Elizabeth Leslie, who is social director for the William Woods College at Fulton, Missouri, and was educated in the Hollins Institute at Hollins, Virginia; John Wallace McCabe; and William Kinnaird, a farmer of Woodford County who married Margaret Ward and has two children, William Ward and Marjory Burdette.

John Wallace McCabe attended high school and remained associated with his father's farm until he entered the army service. He was with the Field Artillery eighteen months in training camps, was corporal and sergeant, and later attended an officers' training camp and received a commission as second lieutenant. Having failed to be assigned to overseas duty, in 1919 he accepted a post with the Y. M. C. A. and was sent to Italy and had the interesting good fortune to be present at Fiume at the time of the celebrated coup d'etat of D'Annunzio. While there he conducted a number of sightseeing tours for American soldiers. Mr. McCabe returned from abroad in January, 1920. He has acquired the interests of the other heirs in the old homestead and is a very practical and thoroughgoing farmer.

He was reared and has always been a faithful member of the Presbyterian Church, has served as an elder and Sunday school worker, and before the war as well as afterward was interested in Y. M. C. A. activities. He was a member of the County Board before he entered the army, and has given much of his time to the duties of that office since his return. He is interested in the young people's activities in the West Lexington Presbytery, and has done much to set new standards of clean sports and clean amusements.

HENRY L. TIMMONS is one of five brothers from a Webster County family who elected railroading as their vocation, and all of them at one time were employes of the Louisville & Nashville. One by one these brothers abandoned railroading and have returned to farming with the exception of Henry L. Timmons, who is a well known and popular citizen at Lexington where he is station baggage agent for the Louisville & Nashville.

He was born in Webster County April 27, 1885. His grandfather John Timmons was an early settler of Webster County from North Carolina. George S. Timmons, father of Henry L., for a number of years conducted one of the largest and best managed farms in Webster County. He died at the age of seventy-eight, while his wife whose maiden name was Allie Edwards, a native of Webster County and of Irish parentage, died at the age of fifty-three.

Henry L. Timmons lived on the farm until he was seventeen and while there acquired a fundamental education in the local schools. September 7, 1906, was the date of his joining the Louisville & Nashville at Henderson, Kentucky, as a night baggage agent. He was in that work two years and in the meantime learned telegraphy and for one year was an operator. He then resumed his place in the baggage service and on November 26, 1919, came to Lexington as station baggage agent, with eleven employes under his supervision.

Mr. Timmons is a Knight of Pythias and a member of its social branch the D. O. K. K. His vacations he spends along the Green River in Western Kentucky hunting and fishing and camping. Mr. Timmons married at Evansville, Indiana, Celestine Mahoney of that city. His second wife Anna Austin is also of Evansville. Mr. Timmons has two children by his first marriage, Otho Neel and Frances Louise, both students at Louisville.

JOHN WALLER RICHARDSON is one of Lexington's veteran bankers, and his associations with banking institutions of the city have been continuous for over thirty years. He was one of the organizers and is vice president of the Bank of Commerce.

Mr. Richardson who was born at Lexington was named in honor of a well known Baptist minister, Rev. John Waller. His father Dr. John C. Richardson was a native of Front Royal, Virginia, was educated in that state, and was in the navy during the War of 1812. At the home of his son John W. Richardson in Lexington are carefully preserved a barometer and thermometer which he secured in England while in the navy. Another relic of his early experiences is a hand painted miniature on ivory, which has since been enlarged by the renowned artist Jewett. Doctor Richardson's first wife died in Virginia and his only daughter died there. He came to Lexington about 1850 and as a physician he practiced here in association with Dr. Benjamin Ash, Dr. Douglas Price, and Doctor Dudley and was also an instructor in the Medical College at Lexington. Doctor Richardson died in 1865 at the age of eighty-one. Soon after he came to Lexington he married Miss Mary Price, sister of his professional associate Dr. Douglas Price. She died in 1878 at the age of sixty-five. She was the mother of three children: Maggie P., who died in 1918; William P., a retired coal merchant of Lexington; and John W.

Doctor Richardson was a successful practitioner, had a good income during his life, but left a very small estate. His sons, W. P. and John W. as boys therefore helped support the household of their mother and sister by selling papers, earning $4 a week. John W. Richardson attended public schools at Lexington, while working as a newsboy, and later was employed in a china store at $12.50 a month, boarding himself, and turning over the rest of his wages to his mother. His brother did likewise out of his earnings. Eventually John W. Richardson was earning $40 a month, and subsequently became bookkeeper at $50 in the Spotswood Lumber Yard. He remained with this lumber concern for five years, and at the end of that time was being paid $75 a month for his services. That was the highest salary he ever received.

The Phoenix Bank of Lexington was established in 1888. On the advice of his employer Mr. Spotswood Mr. Richardson became bookkeeper for this bank at $70 a month and that started him in his banking career in which there has been no interruption and a constantly growing ability and broadening service ever since. The present Phoenix and Third National Bank dated from a consolidation effected in 1911. The following year in 1912 with F. G. Stilz Mr. Richardson was responsible for the Bank of Commerce, with a capital of $100,000. This institution now has $300,000 capital and is one of the leading banks of the state. Mr. Richardson has been vice president of the bank from the beginning, with Mr. Stilz as cashier.

Mr. Richardson has long been prominent in the First Baptist Church and is a member of Judge Kerr's Bible Class. He was for twenty years chorister and developed a choir of which the entire church and community were proud. At the age of twenty-four Mr. Richardson married Miss Ella Clark, daughter of Gus Clark, a former carriage manufacturer. The only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Richardson is Leora R., wife of Arch H. Fulkerson of Cincinnati.

ANDREW KENNEY for more than fifty years has lived on one farm, which was almost his birthplace, and has found both pleasure and profit in its management and cultivation and the handling of high class livestock. This farm is nine miles south of Lexington, in Jessamine County, and is a place of much historic interest in the famous Blue Grass region of Kentucky.

The Kenney family occupied this farm in 1867. Andrew Kenney was born not far away September 22, 1863, son of Edmond and Bridget (Quinlan) Kenney. His parents came from County Clare, Ireland, in 1847, and at once settled in Jessamine County, Kentucky, where his father was one of the early contractors for the building of turnpike roads. On moving to the farm in 1867 he assumed successfully the role of an agriculturist and later again took up contracting at Middlesboro. In the early days of the gold discoveries in the Black Hills District of South Dakota he made a visit to that portion of the frontier. His death in 1896, when past seventy, was the result of an accident when a portion of a falling wall injured him. His wife died in 1898.

Andrew Kenney was reared and educated at the old home and has never married. The house in which he lives is the old Martin place, one of the oldest landmarks in this section. The farm contains many interesting evidences of enterprise and the distinguished people who lived here. There are the remains of an old distillery on the farm, and the foundation of the first Baptist Church can also be seen. One of its former members was Isaac Shelby. Andrew Kenney during his personal management has increased the area of the farm to 260 acres, and has done a great deal of raising and feeding stock cattle. His energies and interests are thoroughly concentrated on the farm, though he greatly enjoys such sports as racing and baseball. Andrew Kenney was the only son of his parents. His sister, Ann, is Mrs. H. W. Moore, of Jessamine County. Andrew Kenney is a democratic voter, and is a member of St. Luke's Catholic Church at Nicholasville, his parents having been among the earliest members of that church.

WILLIAM H. COURTNEY who recently assumed an active executive connection with the Phoenix and Third National Bank of Lexington as vice president, has long been well and favorably known as a banker and manufacturer in Eastern Kentucky, and he and his father were prominently identified with some of the great industrial developments of that section of the state.

His father M. H. Courtney who is now living at Winchester, Kentucky, was born in Wisconsin, and William H. Courtney was born at Wausau, Wisconsin. M. H. Courtney came to Kentucky in 1893 and brought some northern experience and capital to the development of the timber resources of Eastern Kentucky. He bought extensive stumpage and built and operated saw and planing mills at Clay City, where he lived for about thirteen years. He also dealt in Eastern Kentucky lands and continued his lumber manufacturing on a large scale until 1915. He was a large operator and built the Jackson Mill and was also president of the bank at Clay City for eighteen years until he removed to Winchester. Some of his lands have been in the path of the recent oil development and are productive territory.

William H. Courtney learned the lumber business under his father and his experience extends all the way from the logging in the woods to the sale of the finished product. He finished his education in Center College at Danville, Kentucky. For two years he was a bookkeeper in the bank at Clay City, then was connected with the office of the large lumber firm of Mowbray & Robinson at Quicksand, Kentucky, and was also bookkeeper for a wholesale grocery house at Jackson. In 1913 he organized the First National Bank of Whitesburg in the coal district of Letcher County. As its cashier he opened the bank in the Court House at Whitesburg. The permanent bank home was erected in 1914. This is one of the highly successful banking institutions of Eastern Kentucky, the capital having been increased from $25,000 to $50,000 and the bank now has $1,000,000 of resources. Mr. Courtney was an active official, director and cashier until November, 1919, when he succeeded John R. Downing as vice president of the Phoenix and Third National Bank of Lexington, and has since given his time and energies to this institution.

Mr. Courtney married in 1913 Harriet Upington, member of the well known family of that name at Lexington, where she was born. She is a graduate of the Campbell-Hagerman College and is a member of the Presbyterian Church. They have two sons, William H. Jr. and John Upington. Mr. Courtney is a member of the Board of Commerce, the Kiwanis Club, the Royal Arch Masons and in politics is independent.

GEORGE F. PAYNE. The career of George F. Payne of Lexington emphasizes the fact that there is no dearth of opportunities for the man of enterprise at this time any more than in the past. Mr. Payne began as a worker at the bench, in fact his personal labor was almost the entire capital he could put into his business at the beginning, and by watchful and efficient management and unremitting industry has gradually built up a substantial business concern, handling general hardware and doing all classes of sheet metal contracting.

Mr. Payne was born in Bell County, Kentucky, August 4, 1870, son of Lewis M. and Ellen (Woodson) Payne. His father was a Virginian, served as a Confederate soldier, and on leaving Virginia went through the Cumberland Gap into Eastern Kentucky. He married at Cumberland Gap, where Miss Woodson's parents had lived all their lives. Near the Gap Lewis M. Payne opened a stock of general merchandise. It was his custom to come to Lexington to purchase goods, and he took them back to his store by the old fashioned method of pack horses. He was one of the organizers of Bell County and was honored with election as its first county judge. He died there about 1875 when in middle life. His death was due to the hardships and exposures he endured as a Confederate soldier. His widow remained in Eastern Kentucky for a few years and then came to Lexington with her half brother Andrew Hamilton, and she died at Lexington at the age of fifty-seven. Andrew Hamilton subsequently removed to Texas. George F. Payne was the third of four children. His brother John B. who died about 1910 had held the office of local magistrate at Lexington for eight years. Lewis Marion was a tinner by trade and died in the South at the age of twenty-six. Andrew G. the youngest of the family is a manufacturer of patent medicines at Lexington.

George F. Payne was reared in Lexington, and learned the trade of tinner with Vance & Feeney. He entered this employ on terms of a five years' apprenticeship, and filled out his time. The first year he was paid $1.50 a week and boarded himself, the second year $6 a week, the third $9.00 and the fourth and fifth $12.00 a week, which was practically journeyman's wages. After learning his trade he was a journeyman tinner in Lexington for about fifteen years.

In 1900 Mr. Payne established himself in business near his present location. For the past twelve years he has been using a double store, three floors and double basement, and now has a dozen employees. In general hardware he makes a specialty of handling standard stoves and ranges. He has always kept up his department as a tinner, and has the facilities and organization for handling the largest contract for roofing and other work in that line. When Mr. Payne began business for himself he had only $48 in capital and he worked at the bench and only gradually extended his business and hired additional employees. Some of these men have worked for him as long as fourteen years. Mr. Payne still gives his personal supervision to all matters, buying supplies, figuring on contracts. His volume of business for 1920 reached the gratifying figure of $62,000.

Mr. Payne married Josephine Burger, daughter of Clem Burger, formerly owner of Burger's soap factory. Mrs. Payne was born at Covington, Kentucky. They have three children, Andrew G., associated with his father in business; Catherine who graduated from St. Catherine's Academy in 1918; and George F., Jr. a student in St. Catherine's Academy. The family are members of St. Peter's Catholic Church.

DAVID ADES. A business that has done much to fortify Lexington as a wholesale market for the entire Blue Grass region is the wholesale dry goods and notions house of David Ades. It is a business with an interesting history and the career of its proprietor is an illuminating story of American opportunity grasped and improved by a foreigner.

David Ades was born at Kovno, Province of Gubernia, Russia, and came to America at the age of thirteen. He was absolutely penniless when he stepped off the ship at Baltimore. His destination was Lexington where his brother Simon Ades had been in the wholesale dry goods and notions business for some twelve years. Simon Ades is now a well known wholesaler at Louisville. David Ades went to work for his brother at $2 a week and board. He was possessed not only of a great ambition to become an American business man but an American citizen in every sense. For two years after coming to Lexington after working all day in his brother's establishment he attended night school. Some of his instructors in that school were Carrie Breckenridge, Dr. Josephine Hunt, Miss Clay and the present Governor Morrow who at that time was a teacher in the night school.

David Ades made himself in time so proficient as to be one of his brother's force of salesmen, and eventually took over part of his brother's lines. His present business dates its establishment from 1908 when he possessed less than $3,000 in capital. The first year's sales totalled about $20,000. The volume of business today is fully a million, with a quarter of a million dollars invested. Of approximately twenty-five employees there are twelve salesmen who cover the territory of Kentucky and West Virginia, though the facilities of the house are largely taxed to meet the demands of retailers in the Blue Grass section. Mr. Ades the first year was practically the whole business, calling on the retail trade, acting as purchasing agent, keeping the books and looking after the management of the store. The growth of his business has surpassed all his sanguine expectations. Some of his older salesmen have been with him almost from the beginning. The present headquarters of his business is a three-story and basement structure with over 20,000 square feet of floor space, and with frontage of 117 feet on Main Street and 167 feet in depth.

Mr. Ades is also a director of the First City National Bank of Lexington. He is a member of the Board of Commerce, a director in the Blue Grass Sanatorium for Tuberculosis, belongs to all the bodies of Scottish Rite Masonry, including the thirty-second degree, is a Past Noble Grand of Lexington Lodge of Odd Fellows and has been a representative to the Grand Lodge and is also a member of the Elks. At the age of twenty-nine Mr. Ades married Miss Sarah Fox of Baltimore, Maryland. They have three children, Louis R., Grace, and Helen.

EDGAR WHITEHOUSE is district manager at Lexington for the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. He long since demonstrated the possession of the ample equipment of business qualifications needed for success in the insurance field. He has been a hard, consistent and aggressive worker as an individual producer, and his success has been equally satisfactory to the company as agency manager.

Mr. Whitehouse began writing insurance at Lexington in 1904 under John D. Friend, who was then the district manager. Mr. Whitehouse succeeded Mr. Friend as district manager January 1, 1914. The late Mr. Friend was for many years an able worker for the Mutual Life in Kentucky, and was district agent from 1899 until 1914. This district comprises some eight or ten counties in the Blue Grass region.

Since May 1, 1914, Mr. Whitehouse has been consistently a member of the Mutual Life Field Club. He first became eligible to membership through the standard at that time, involving the production of $100,000 insurance in a single year. The standard has since been raised to $250,000, but Mr. Whitehouse still enjoys the coveted membership.

He was born in Spencer County, Kentucky, June 17, 1879. His grandfather Joel Whitehouse spent the greater part of his life in Boyle County, Kentucky. J. M. Whitehouse, father of the Lexington insurance man, was born in Boyle County, but as a young man settled in Spencer County, where he owned and operated a farm until his death in 1910. He was a Union soldier, serving three years six months with the Sixth Kentucky Infantry. He was wounded at Perryville, Kentucky. J. M. Whitehouse married Mary Noel, who is still living on the old farm in Spencer County.

Edgar Whitehouse was educated in common schools, attended college at Waddy, Kentucky, and Central Normal College and for about two years was a trader and shipper at Taylorsville until he found the work for which his talents best fitted him, life insurance. He is a member of the Board of Commerce, is a deacon in the First Baptist Church, while Mrs. Whitehouse is active in the Young Women's Christian Association.

He married at the age of twenty-two Miss Bettie Offutt of Taylorsville. They have two children, a son and a daughter. The older is A. J. Whitehouse, now a student in the State University at Lexington. The younger, Edna Mildred, is a high school girl.

JOHN ROBERT SIGLER, M. D. For a period of over forty-four years Doctor Sigler has discharged his duties and responsibilities as a capable physician and surgeon in the community of Dixie and Corydon with a fair degree of success and skill. He is a citizen of Henderson County widely esteemed both for his professional work and his varied interests and influence in other lines.

He was born on a farm near Cairo in Henderson County April 27, 1851, a son of John Robards Sigler and Mary Jane (Rawley) Sigler, the former a native of Union County and the latter of Henderson County.

R. A. Hartung.

The paternal grandparents were Jacob and Malinda (Robards) Sigler, the former a native American but of German parentage. Jacob Sigler was a pioneer in Union County, Kentucky, and a miller and farmer by occupation. Doctor Sigler's maternal grandparents were James and Ann (Hughes) Rawley. James Rawley was born in North Carolina, of English lineage, the name being spelled originally Raleigh. James Rawley spent many years as a farmer in Henderson County, Kentucky. Doctor Sigler's father operated a saw mill and farm in the vicinity known as "Mudtown" in Henderson County. He died when only thirty-seven years of age. His widow lived to be eighty-seven, and was married many years after the death of her first husband to Isham Cottingham, a farmer, for many years a magistrate and member of the Legislature.

Doctor Sigler is the youngest of seven children. There were four daughters, two of whom are still living. His brother Rev. Jacob D. Sigler has for thirty-five years been a prominent Methodist minister in Louisville. Another brother, James F., became a farmer, and died comparatively young.

Doctor Sigler was two and a half years old when his father died, and he was reared by his widowed mother on the home farm. His mother was not married again until her son, the Doctor was grown. He acquired a high school education in Cairo and took his medical course at Louisville University, where he graduated March 1, 1877. Doctor Sigler began practice at Dixie in Henderson County. For many years he was president of the Board of Education of Corydon High School. Besides his professional interests he has farm lands to the extent of 800 acres.

On October 22, 1873, he married Jane Poole. She was the mother of four children. On May 4, 1899, Doctor Sigler married Laura Dixon, who is the mother of one daughter.

MOSES EDWARD LIGON, superintendent of schools of the City of Henderson, engaged his energies and talents in educational work, and has had a most unusual range of experience and activity as a school man. He comes of a family of educators.

He was born April 15, 1877, at Owenton in Owen County, Kentucky. His great-grandfather, William Ligon, was born in Prince Edward County, Virginia, and at the age of seventeen enlisted with the Virginia Continental Troops in the Revolutionary war. He served through two enlistments. After the war he and a brother established a school in Prince Edward County. While in charge of that school William Ligon compiled a text book in arithmetic, which was published at Richmond and became generally used in the schools of Virginia and Kentucky. Later he and his brother came West to Smith County, Tennessee, and eventually William Ligon settled at Owenton, Kentucky, where he died. His son, Thomas Ligon, was born in Owen County, acquired his education under his father, and throughout his active years was identified with the cause of education in Owen County. When he was not teaching he conducted his farm. He undertook the revision of his father's text book in arithmetic but died before completing the work. His wife was Nellie Murray.

The parents of Moses E. Ligon were Michael F. and Polly Ann (Stonestreet) Ligon, natives of Owen County. The father devoted his active years to farming. The mother represented an old Kentucky family originally from Pennsylvania and of Dutch descent. The name Ligon is of French origin. Polly Ann Stonestreet was a daughter of Moses Edward and Sally Ann (Schooler) Stonestreet.

One of a family of four sons and one daughter, Moses Edward Ligon grew upon a farm, attended the public schools of Owen County, and at the age of eighteen began teaching. For a number of years he continued teaching and attending school alternately, and by his own work and earnings defrayed the expenses of his higher education. He attended the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio, for a while. He entered Georgetown College in 1902, and graduated in 1905 with the Bachelor's and Master's degrees. He has done graduate work in education in the University of Chicago and has been awarded the Master of Arts degree from that institution. In 1905 he entered civil service in the Government's Educational Department, and went to the Philippine Islands, where for three years he was supervisor of schools. He employed the opportunities of his stay in the far east for extensive travel over the islands, through China and Japan. On his return trip to America he toured China, India, Ceylon, Egypt, the Holy Land and various European countries.

On returning to Kentucky Mr. Ligon was principal at Paducah for two school years, then taught physics and chemistry in the Owensboro High School from 1910 to 1913, and in May, 1913, was elected principal of the Lexington High School, an office he held from September of that year until June, 1919. Mr. Ligon was elected to his present position as superintendent of the Henderson city schools in May, 1919, and began his official term in July of the same year.

He has always kept in close touch with advanced educational progress, is a member of the Kentucky State Educational Association, the National Education Association, and the Phi Delta Kappa Fraternity. He is a member of the Masonic Order and Knights of Pythias, and is chairman of the Board of Deacons of the First Baptist Church of Henderson and teacher of the Men's Class in the Sunday school. He also has the unusual honor of being president of the Henderson Rotary Club.

On August 5, 1909, Mr. Ligon married Miss Ernestine Alms, of Owensboro. Their three children are Amelia Katherine, Moses Edward, Jr., and Elizabeth Anne.

RUDOLPH RAYMOND HARTING. Among the earnest and enterprising men whose depth of character has gained him a prominent place in the community and the respect and confidence of his fellow citizens is Rudolph R. Harting, who is closely identified with many of the most important business interests of Lexington. He is a member of one of the most prominent families of this section, and has always been closely connected with various local interests, including the public affairs of the city and county. He enjoys distinctive prestige throughout the community, his practical intelligence, mature judgment and sound business sense winning for him the confidence and esteem of all who know him.

Rudolph Raymond Harting was born in the city now honored by his citizenship on April 14, 1871, and is the son of William and Mary Jane (Hillenmeyer) Harting. His father was born in Quackenbruck, Germany, and died in Lexington on August 17, 1887. He came to the United States at the age of eighteen years and first located in New York City, where he learned the trade of a jeweler. During that period he also attended night school, acquiring a knowledge of the English language and completing his education. Later he removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he spent about a year, and then came to Lexington, with which city he was identified continuously up to the time of his death. He was here engaged in the jewelry business, under the firm name of Harting & Kroesing, for about ten years, meeting with splendid success. He then engaged in the malting business, which was continued for many years under the style of Luigart & Harting and which proved a very prosperous enterprise, so much so that twelve years later, in 1882, was enabled to retire from active business life. He was one of the principal stockholders in the City National Bank, of which he was president for two years, and he was a holder of much valuable real estate in Lexington, including the land where the Leonard Hotel now stands. He was considered one of the best judges of real estate values in this city, and his advice was frequently sought by prospective buyers. In his political views he was a republican.

On May 12, 1864, William Harting was married to Mary Jane Hillenmeyer, the ceremony being performed by Rev. John H. Bekkers. She was born in Savannah, Georgia, and her death occurred in Lexington on April 27, 1920, at the age of seventy-nine years. Mrs. Harting was one of Lexington's best known and most beloved women, possessing a beautiful Christian character, devoted to her family and being ever solicitous of the welfare of others. Charitable and kind, she never lost an opportunity to say a helpful word to all with whom she came in contact, and she was always ready to aid every worthy cause, standing as sponsor for many charitable and benevolent movements intended to promote uplift work in the community. By her union with William Harting she became the mother of the following children: Frank W. married Louise Gabell and lives in Maysville, Kentucky, and they have a daughter, Mary; Viola L.; George H.; Rudolph R., the immediate subject of this sketch; Alfred F.; Carrie H., the wife of Dr. Irvin Abell, a prominent surgeon in Louisville, Kentucky, and they have four children; William, who died at the age of forty-two years; two who died in infancy; Joseph E., cashier of the First and City National Bank, Lexington, and who married May Shanklin. Rudolph R. Harting is a nephew of Joseph Seep, one of the leading oil men in the United States, being chairman of the board of directors of the South Penn Oil Company, of which he was president for more than twenty-five years.

Rudolph R. Harting received his educational training in private schools and then entered Saint Mary's College, at Lebanon, Kentucky, where he was graduated in 1891, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Immediately thereafter he succeeded Maj. J. B. Simrall in the drug business in Lexington, which he successfully conducted up to May, 1919, when he sold the business and has since devoted his attention to his extensive private business interests, and during the life of his mother he devoted himself closely to her comfort and welfare. He is a member of the board of directors and at this time is secretary and treasurer of the Lexington Hydraulic and Manufacturing Company; is a director of the Central Kentucky Natural Gas Company; a director of the Frankfort Natural Gas Company; a director in the First and City National Bank; vice president of the Lexington Leader Company, publishers of the "Leader;" and has other minor interests in various lines, including a large amount of real estate.

For many years Mr. Harting has been interested in local public affairs, in which he has been a potent factor. He was elected a member of the Board of Aldermen under Mayor Thomas H. Combs, serving two years, and was also elected and served under Mayor John Skain. He has served on the Fayette County Board of Tax Commissioners for six terms and is occupying that position at the present time. Politically Mr. Harting gives his support to the democratic party. He belongs to the Lexington Club and the Country Club, while fraternally he is a member of Lexington Lodge No. 89, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. Distinctively a man of business, he has long filled a large place in affairs, attaining distinction in a field where sound erudition, mature judgment, strict integrity and talents of a high order are required.

DAVID AUSTIN SAYRE, the pioneer banker and philanthropist of Lexington, was a resident of that city for more than half a century. He had no children, and for many years his responsible lieutenant and associate was his nephew, Ephraim Danford Sayre, who succeeded him as a banker and whose children comprise the present generation of this notable family.

David Austin Sayre was born at Madison, New Jersey, March 12, 1793, and his boyhood was spent at the old home at Madison in the house erected by Daniel Sayre in 1745. David A. Sayre was apprenticed to a silversmith and came to Lexington in 1811 to finish his trade. He founded the business in 1820, adding a broker's office, and in 1829 bought the credits and accounts of the old Commonwealth Bank of Kentucky. The banking firm of David A. Sayre founded in 1820 continued until his death on September 11, 1870. David A. Sayre had great natural ability, with subtle and keen intellect, energetic and prompt in decisions, often leaping to conclusions, was independent in thought and opinion, and though impulsive his advice was wise and prudent. Coming to Lexington "the Athens of Kentucky" without education or money, his office became the resort of the ablest men of his time, and some of his daily associates were Clay, Crittenden, Breckenridge, Wickliffe, Bell, Johnson and others. His social position and the esteem in which he was held was perhaps only equalled by the case of James B. Beck, who had been an overseer of negroes in a hemp factory and later became United States senator. George Peabody, the great London philanthropist, honored Mr. Sayre with a dinner and presented him with his own portrait. One writer says Mr. Sayre gave over half a million for charitable purposes. His last will bequeathed legacies by name to fifty-six relatives. He donated to the Orphans Society of Lexington, to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions and to the church, schools and colleges, and largely built the McChord Church at Lexington. His liberality erected the handsome Library Building of Center College at Danville. The Sayre Female Institute of Lexington was the greatest monument of his philanthropy. The buildings and the grounds cost him $100,000. Its alumnae, now numbered by hundreds, are scattered all over the country. This institute was incorporated in 1854, seven years before Vassar College, which is older than Welles, Smith, Wellesley or Bryn Mawr. When incorporated, according to President Raymond of Vassar, not a single endowed college for young women alone existed in all Christendom. Mr. Sayre was therefore a leader in the higher education of women, the "novelty, benignity and grandeur of which idea," says Matthew Vassar, "arrested my attention." "Founder's Day" continues a holiday in Sayre College.

A very felicitous account and tribute to the character and qualities of David A. Sayre and incidentally of his nephew are found in the words of W. C. F. Breckenridge written on the occasion of a dinner party to celebrate the conclusion of E. D. Sayre's fifty years as a banker and the location of the bank for fifty years on one site.

Mr. Breckenridge wrote: "Lexington has been extremely fortunate in her bank officers. John W. Hunt, John Brand, John Tilford, Matthew T. Scott, Augustus F. Hawkins, James A. Grinstead and others were a remarkable group of bankers and we have long been of opinion that Madison C. Johnson was one of the half dozen greatest men with whom we ever came in contact. Among all these Mr. David A. Sayre was easily the peer. Born during the Revolutionary war, he lacked educational training, learned the trade of silver plating and came to Lexington as an apprenticed mechanic. Nine years later, in 1820, he opened a private bank as the result of so many friends depositing surplus funds in his silversmith's safe. In 1828 he purchased the site where so long D. A. Sayre & Company's bank was conducted, later adding the adjoining property as a residence. The present Security Trust & Safety Vault Company building now occupies the entire tract at the corner of Market and Short streets. Mr. Sayre was an extraordinary banker. His mind, apparently dull and slow and with meager vocabulary, resulting in heavy expression of thought, was as a matter of fact quick as lightning and saw the future at a flash. His will was as instantaneous as his mind was quick, and his business courage amounted to recklessness. His operations covered the entire South, investing in transactions in Mississippi as readily as in shoving a note over his counter. If he lost no one ever heard of it, if he won it was not proclaimed. He depended upon memory. A $5 account with a free negro was as accurately impressed upon memory as would be a $50,000 transaction with the 'old Duke.' He made in clear profit over $3,000,000.

"He was the benefactor of his family. He was a liberal contributor to the church. In his back room from 1828 until his death there were more men of character, of influence, who habitually met there than probably in any other room in the State of Kentucky. This room was the common meeting place of all classes. Here public enterprises were first discussed, then took shape and then made successful. Here Benjamin Gratz, Richard Higgins and others laid the foundation of the Agricultural Society of Fayette. Here the various turnpike corporations were formed. Here the Lexington and Frankfort and the Frankfort and Louisville Railroad Companies were discussed. Here a group organized the Lexington Cemetery. Schemes, plans, devices of all kinds for betterment of society, for the growth of Lexington, were here discussed by a race of stalwart thinkers, liberal gentleman. The Board of Trustees of Transylvania University held meetings here. Exactly what part David A. Sayre played in all this it would be difficult for anyone accurately to describe. He did not talk much, he did not take much part, but it generally turned out that adopted plans contained his suggestions, and of donors he was ever the most liberal.

"He was a strong Union man. It is not too much to say that out of meetings held here grew the action of the Bank of Kentucky, which gave to the Union Legislature unlimited means and credit; that from that office was written the letter to Mr. Lincoln which shaped his policies toward Kentucky, and that the influences originating here probably kept Kentucky from seceding and joining the Southern Confederacy.

"He selected his nephew, E. D. Sayre, as an associate, and after trusting him for a score of years executed a will that practically put Ephraim Sayre in his shoes as head of the Sayre family as well as his successor in the banking house of D. A. Sayre & Company."

EPHRAIM DANFORD SAYRE. For many years the associate, and subsequently the successor to his uncle, David A. Sayre, in the Sayre banking house of Lexington, Ephraim Danford Sayre exemplified many of those remarkable qualities of business and civic character for which the name Sayre stands as a synonym in Central Kentucky.

The lineage of the Sayre family is traced back to Paddington, Bedfordshire, England, where William Sayre died in 1564. The founder of the American branch of the family was Thomas Sayre, who is recorded at Lynn, Massachusetts, in 1638. In 1640 he settled a colony at Southampton, Long Island, where his residence, erected in 1648, is still standing.

A subsequent generation of the family removed to New Jersey. At Madison, that state, is still standing the home of Daniel Sayre, erected in 1745. During the Revolution it was occupied by his son, Deacon Ephraim Sayre, and for a time was headquarters for Gen. Anthony Wayne.

James Caldwell Sayre was born at Madison, New Jersey, in 1781 and in 1825 removed from Elizabeth, New Jersey, to Louisville, Kentucky, acquiring a farm and country home that is now within the city limits. He died at Louisville in 1847. In 1807 he married Elizabeth Periam Hamilton, a daughter of Theodore J. and Eunice (Woodruff) Hamilton.

Ephraim Danford Sayre, son of James C. Sayre, was born at Elizabeth, New Jersey, September 25, 1820, and was reared and educated at Louisville. In February, 1848, he moved to Lexington to become bookkeeper in the private bank of his uncle, David A. Sayre. He subsequently became a partner in the D. A. Sayre banking house, and at the death of his uncle succeeded to the ownership and control of the institution. He originated and was president from the beginning of the Security Trust & Safety Vault Company of Lexington. For thirty-nine years he was treasurer of the Agricultural and Mechanical Association of Fayette County and was secretary and treasurer of the Lexington Cemetery Company from 1856 until his death.

Ephraim Danford Sayre died October 23, 1899, after having been identified with Lexington banking and business affairs for a little more than half a century.

January 15, 1850, he married Mary E. Woodruff, daughter of William and Mary (Brittin) Woodruff. She was born at Elizabeth, New Jersey, November 7, 1826, and died two years after her husband. She was the mother of five children: Elizabeth Sayre, who married Hugh Courtney and died at the age of thirty-seven; Sydney, whose first husband was D. D. Bell, who died in 1892, and she is now Mrs. Arthur Cary, of Lexington; James William Sayre, of the Security Trust Company, who married Mary Lovell; Mary Sayre, wife of Gen. Roger Williams, of Lexington; and Ephraim D., Jr., who died at the age of thirty-seven.

The present home of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Cary on Bell Court was erected in 1843 by the father of D. D. Bell, Mr. Henry Bell, who married Clara Davis, and came from Salisbury, Maryland, to Lexington about 1820. He was a very prominent and successful dry goods merchant, and in later years, while retaining his home at Lexington, was associated with the great New York merchant prince, A. T. Stewart. The old Bell home has been a center of much of Lexington's social life for three generations. The home originally stood on a tract of thirty-six acres of land, so far from the center of the city as to be called the country. A mansion was erected at great expense, for many years the most pretentious home in Lexington and even to this day comparing favorably with more modern architecture. The grounds are now reduced to four acres, and more than 100 homes stand on the original tract. Henry Bell spent many years here in ease and comfort, and from this home his funeral was conducted. Of seven sons the only one to survive him was D. D. Bell, whose own death occurred a few years later. D. D. Bell and his wife, Sydney, had one daughter, Clara Bell, now Mrs. Julius S. Welsh, Jr., of St. Louis. In 1893 Mrs. Bell was married to Mr. Arthur Cary, of Louisville. Mrs. Cary is an active member of the Presbyterian Church.

ARTHUR M. MILLER. A Kentucky scientist with an unsurpassed knowledge of the physical features and geological resources of Kentucky, the services of Mr. Miller have been so important and have been so long directed for the benefit of the people of this state that his career has a special degree of popular interest. To satisfy that interest the editors of this publication have secured something more than a casual outline of his life, his experiences, and his contributions to science.

He was born August 6, 1861, a son of Robert and Margaret Ann (McQuiston) Miller. His father was a lawyer. He was early attracted to geology, his native town, Eaton, Preble County, Ohio, being so situated as to the line of contact between the upper and lower Silurian formations (now called respectively "Silurian" and "Ordovician") as to offer excellent collection ground for a variety of fossils. One of these fossils, especially the trilobite Calymene niagarensis, occurred there in such perfection that it attracted the attention of geologists and collectors to this place. The regular price, 25 cents, set per head on perfect specimens of this species by these connoisseurs readily stimulated in the small boys of the town such a zest for fossil hunting as at a certain season of the year (August), when the streams were low, to raise it to the rank of a "major (boy's) sport." Arthur M. Miller and his two brothers, Clarence and Marion, were among the most enthusiastic of these boy trilobite hunters. He was the only one of the three, however, in whom the collecting passion persisted into adult life. As he grew older his geological interests were further stimulated by the glacial phenomena exhibited in the vicinity. Prominent among these was a boulder belt or "moraine of recession" which extended across the county, taking in a part of the Town of Eaton.

After completing a course in the Eaton High School he entered Wooster University, Ohio, where he had been preceded by his brother Clarence. Dissatisfied with the facilities there for studying science, he left that institution at the end of his sophomore year, in 1882, and entered the junior year at Princeton University. Of this institution he was graduated with the degree A. B. in the class of 1884. Following graduation he taught for four years in his native county, one year as principal of the Morning Sun schools and three as principal of the Eaton High School. In 1887 he received the degree A. M. from Princeton, and in 1888 was called back to Princeton as Fellow in biology and in 1889 became professor of natural history in Wilson College for Women at Chambersburg, Pennsylvania. During the summer preceding his taking up his duties at Wilson he was in Eastern Oregon as a member of the Princeton Scientific Expedition of 1889. After teaching two years at Wilson he resigned to spend a year of study in Europe. Most of this time was spent as a student in the department of geology in the University of Munich, at that time having as its head Dr. Karl von Zittel, the most distinguished paleontologist of his time.

Probably few citizens of Kentucky are so thoroughly familiar with every portion of the state as Mr. Miller, who has filled the position of professor of geology of the University of Kentucky at Lexington for thirty years, exactly half of his present lifetime. From his student career abroad he returned to the United States in 1892 to accept the renewed tender of the Chair of Geology in the University of Kentucky, a position he had declined three years before, just as he was entering upon his duties at Wilson College. In 1895 he consented to take over for instruction the additional subject zoology, and from that time until 1911 he was head of the combined departments of geology and zoology. In 1907 he was appointed dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, the duties of which office he discharged in addition to those of professor of geology and zoology. He resigned the office of dean in 1917 when he asked and received a leave of absence of one year to accept the position as geologist for the Federal Oil Company. Since 1918 he has been back in the University as head of the department of geology.

In the pursuit of his profession he has visited nearly every county of the commonwealth. With the exception of a few geological trips to the far West and one to Eastern Europe and Western Asia in 1897, his summer vacations have been devoted to a study of the physiography, stratigraphy and mineral resources of Kentucky. In his younger days he made most of his trips by bicycle and collapsible canvas boat, the former being his mode of conveyance wherever roads were suited and the latter wherever streams could be navigated. He even succeeded in using his wheel in the most mountainous portions of Kentucky, where he had frequently to dismount and push it up long stretches of incline. In company with several of his students and in one instance with his friend, Prof. August F. Foerste, from the neighboring state of Ohio, he also used improvised houseboats for examining the geology along the main rivers of the state. Later he adopted the usual method of travel for the rougher portions of the state—that of horseback—having purchased and used for that purpose a fine gray saddle mare. Still later he adopted the automobile for making his geological trips, being one of the first four residents of Lexington to own a car, the motor power of which was generated from gasoline.

Professor Miller has never shown a disposition to capitalize to any great extent his knowledge of the geology of the state, being content to start young men along such paths leading to commercial success. Among some of the well known oil geologists who have won distinction in their chosen field the following received their geological training under his tuition: James H. Gardner, A. F. Crider, A. R. Marshall and Iley B. Browning.

Professor Miller is a Fellow of both the Geological Society of America and the American Association for the Advancement of Science. He is also a member of the American Association of Petroleum Geologists, American Association of University Professors, Kentucky Academy of Sciences, Filson Club of Louisville and Bradford Historical Association of Lexington. He has never married.

He is the author of a number of geological publications, one of the most recent of which is his "Geology of Kentucky," a work of 392 pages published by the State Geological Survey in 1919, which is a classified compend of state reports and other publications with critical comment based on original investigation. He is recognized as an authority on the geology of Kentucky petroleum. As side hobbies, possessing no economic applications, he is known to be much interested in Kentucky history and prehistory and in meteorites. He has shown particular ingenuity and persistence in running to earth any meteorites which have fallen in Kentucky during his thirty years' residence in the state. The last one, the Cumberland Falls Meteorite, which he secured and described as regards the phenomena connected with its fall, has been proved to be the most remarkable in composition of any such body that has been known to have fallen on the Western Hemisphere.

His published contributions to geology make up a notable bibliography with a wider interest than merely a summary of his individual scientific achievements. These contributions are as follows: Ultimate analyses of some Kentucky coal with calculation of their theoretical number of heat units: Inspector of Mines' Report for Kentucky, 1895; Phosphate deposit possibilities of the Devonian black shale in Kentucky: Inspector of Mines' Report for Kentucky, 1895; Hypothesis of a Cincinnati Silurian Island: American Geology, Volume 22, 1895; High level gravel and loam deposits of Kentucky rivers: Am. REV. THEOPHILUS KELLENAERS. The thirty-two years of Father Kelleners' pastorate at St. Agnes Catholic Church in Uniontown was impressive not only in length of time but in the dignity of service and the constructive efforts that signalized the pastorate. He was one of the best known and one of the best beloved priests of the Louisville diocese.

Theophilus Kelleners, son of Leonard and Barbara (Henckens) Kelleners, was born at Meerlo, Holland, April 25, 1852, and was in the priesthood nearly half a century, nearly all of it being spent in Union County, Kentucky. He finished his studies at the American College at Louvain, Belgium, and was ordained August 31, 1873. In October of the same year he reached the United States, for a short time was assistant pastor at Elizabethtown, Kentucky, was then at St. Vincent in Union County, for fourteen years was pastor of St. Anne's Church at Morganfield, and in March, 1888, began his long service with St. Agnes Church, a service that was undiminished in his zeal and efforts until his death at Uniontown March 1, 1920. The handsome new church, school and pastoral residence of his congregation was built during his pastorate. He was deeply interested in educational work, and was head and spiritual director of one of the best parochial schools in the state. Father Kelleners was a priest of ripe scholarship and well qualified for the leadership he exercised so many years in his community.

The period of his pastorate marked many of the most important chapters in the history of St. Agnes. The first pastor of the parish was Rev. James Martin, in 1869-70; followed by Rev. Edward Van Troostenberghe from 1870 to 1873; succeeded by Rev. Hugh Daly from 1873 to 1875, and Father Kelleners became pastor after Rev. M. Dillon had served thirteen years, from 1875 to 1888. For nearly half a century the Sisters of Charity have been in charge of the parochial school. While the affairs of his parish gave him a busy program Father Kelleners found time to give assistance to all movements for the betterment of the community in things material as well as spiritual.

REV. RUDOLPH CHARLES RUFF in 1920 became the successor of Father Kelleners as pastor of St. Agnes Catholic Church at Uniontown.

He was born at Louisville April 14, 1876, a son of Joseph and Walburga (Boden-Miller) Ruff. He acquired his early education in his native city, and pursued his classical and theological studies at "The Josephinum," Columbus, Ohio, where he was ordained a priest July 1, 1900, by Cardinal Martinelli. Since his ordination his life has been a round of increasing duties and responsibilities.

For five months he was assistant priest at Fancy Farm, Graves County, Kentucky, was pastor at Central City until October, 1903, for a little more than three years was located at Litchfield and for five months in 1907 was pastor at Rose Hill; for nearly a year he was pastor at Axtell, and then became assistant pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church at Louisville, where he remained until June, 1912. For six years Father Ruff was pastor of the church at Stithton. During that time the Government established Camp Knox, a military post and training school at Stithton, acquiring the site of the Catholic Church and other grounds. The church then acquired a new site and a new residence was built by Father Ruff. From December, 1918, until July, 1920, he was at Vine Grove, and in July, 1920, came to Uniontown to take up the duties of pastor of St. Agnes, after Father Kelleners had been there for thirty-two years.

WILLIAM BURNETT GOAD. On the farm where he was born and where he spent his youthful days William Burnett Goad has found the occupations and duties of mature manhood and is one of the very successful and highly esteemed farmer citizens of Union County. His home is in Sturgis, and his farm is three miles from Sturgis.

Mr. Goad was born June 3, 1861, only son and child of John B. and Rebecca (Gatlin) Goad. His parents were born and reared and married in Hopkins County, Kentucky. The paternal grandfather, John Goad, was a native of Virginia. The Goad family settled in Union County in 1860, and John B. Goad lived there until his death at the age of sixty, practicing his vocation as a farmer. He was survived by his wife three years who passed away at the age of sixty-five.

William B. Goad, while a boy, attended the common schools in his neighborhood, learned the duties of farming from his father and has been a very progressive man in his community, keeping up with advanced methods of farm management and performing his share of duties as a good citizen.

In 1891 Mr. Goad married Miss Lulu Harris, a native of Union County and daughter of Joseph Dawson and Nancy (Jones) Harris. Her father was born in Spencer County, Kentucky, and her mother in Union County. Her grandfather, Thomas Harris, was a native of Spencer County and settled in Union County when her father was an infant. Mrs. Goad's maternal grandfather, William Hardin Jones, was a native of Kentucky and an early settler in Union County. The parents of Mrs. Goad are still living, at the age of eighty, their home being a farm in Union County. Mrs. Goad is one of two children, her sister Verna being the wife of H. B. Shouse of Union County.

Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Goad: Maeolla, wife of H. D. Holt, of Sturgis, and they have one son, H. D., Jr., and Nancy Burnett, at home. Mr. Goad is a democrat, is an Odd Fellow and Knight of Pythias, and Mrs. Goad is member of the Baptist Church.

FRANK HELM CLARKE, M. D. For over forty years enlisted in the army of medical practitioners, identified with the management of hospitals and other state institutions, or engaged in private practice at Lexington, Doctor Clarke has achieved the honors and success due to able and disinterested service and has won many of the best distinctions of a professional career.

He was born at New Orleans, Louisiana, December 27, 1853, son of William Henry and Sarah H. (Whitlock) Clarke. His father and mother were both natives of Virginia. His father, who was born at Richmond, was for many years engaged in business as a merchant, at first at New Orleans and later with a wholesale grocer at Paducah, Kentucky, where he died in February, 1863. He was a whig in politics and a member of the Presbyterian Church. The mother was born in Louisa County, Virginia, and died in 1901, at the age of seventy-six. Her four sons and two daughters with the exception of one are still living, Doctor Clarke being the second in age.

Doctor Clarke attended public school in Christian County, Kentucky, graduated from the Oak Hill Academy in 1876, and took his first medical lectures at Evansville, Indiana. He graduated in medicine from the University of Louisville, did post-graduate work in the Medical School of New York City in 1882, and for a time was second assistant in the Western Kentucky State Hospital at Hopkinsville, and from 1883 to 1886 was first assistant of the Central Kentucky State Hospital at Lakeland. From 1886 to 1896 he was medical superintendent of the Eastern State Hospital, but since 1896 has been engaged in general practice at Lexington, specializing in nervous and mental disorders. All over the state his abilities have gained him the position of an authority in his particular branch of practice.

Doctor Clarke is a past president of the Fayette County Medical Society, also a past president of the Kentucky State Medical Association, and for many years he held the position of president of the Lexington Board of Health, beginning under Mayor Thomas Combs. He did much to vitalize this board as an efficient instrument in public health, and resigned therefrom in 1919. For over ten years he was a surgeon with the Kentucky State National Guard. Doctor Clarke is a trustee of Sayre College, a director of the Y. M. C. A., and is a Mason and a democrat.

JOHN BARTON, master commissioner of the Circuit Court of Campbell County, is a member of one of the old and honored families of Newport, but from an early age he chose to be dependent upon his own abilities and industry, and life has brought him several changes in environment and a constantly increasing scope of service and usefulness.

Mr. Barton was born at Newport, October 6, 1878. His father, Joseph Barton, was born in County Clare, Ireland, in 1834, was reared and educated there, and at the age of twenty came to the United States and settled at Cincinnati. He became a street contractor and in 1875 moved to Newport, where he continued his business until his death in 1889. For a number of years he had one of the largest organizations and equipment for handling contract work of various kinds. He left a large estate, much of which is still kept intact by his children, comprising ten dwelling houses and two business buildings in Newport. Joseph Barton was a democrat and a Catholic. He married Margaret O'Connor, who was born in County Kerry, Ireland, in 1847, and died at Newport in 1912. They were the parents of ten children. The four oldest Edward, Bridget, Joseph and Thomas, all died as children. The fifth is Joseph, an employe in the Government income tax department living at Newport; the sixth is John; James, whose home is at Newport, is a clerk in the United States Steel Corporation and is stationed at Elbert, West Virginia; Miss Margaret and Miss Mary live at Newport; and Michael, the youngest, is a plumber at Newport.

John Barton attended parochial schools at Newport until he was fourteen, and then went to work. His first employment, lasting two years, was with the Newport Water Department. For four years he was an employe of James Walsh & Company, distillers at Covington and Paris. For fifteen years Mr. Barton was owner and proprietor of a cafe, and has also been actively identified with the management of his father's estate.

He has always taken a deep interest in public affairs. He was the first probation officer of Newport, holding that office one year. He was appointed master commissioner and began his term of six years in January, 1916, his offices being in the court house. Mr. Barton was the first secretary of the Campbell County Chapter of the American Red Cross, and assisted in every other patriotic drive during the war. He is a democrat and a member of the Catholic Church. His home is at 1101 Isabella Street. He married at Covington Miss Johanna Myers, a native of Covington. They have two children: Margaret, born August 20, 1913, and Mary Rita, born February 26, 1916.

EDWARD B. TERRILL, a resident of Covington, is vice president of the Early & Daniel Company, Incorporated, hay and grain, one of the largest firms in this line at Cincinnati and contributing a great volume of the business that has given Cincinnati distinction as the central hay market of the United States. Mr. Terrill has been identified with this firm and this business since early manhood and is one of the best known figures in the hay market of Cincinnati.

He was born at Petersburg, Boone County, Kentucky, July 30, 1877. His father, William Terrill, was born in the same locality in 1838, was reared and married in Petersburg, was a graduate of the Ohio Medical College, and after graduation spent a quarter of a century in the active practice of his profession. In 1885 he removed to Lawrenceburg, Indiana, where he continued his practice until his death in 1886. He was a Mason, a democrat and an active member of the Christian Church. William Terrill married Ellen Berkshire, who was born at Petersburg, Kentucky, in 1857 and died at Covington in 1915. Of her two children the older, Holton, died at the age of eighteen years.

Edward B. Terrill was nine years old when his father died. He acquired his early education in Lawrenceburg, Indiana, graduating from high school in 1896. For about two years he was employed in the Cincinnati offices of the Big Four Railway Company, but in 1899 became a clerk in the Cincinnati offices of the Early & Daniel Company. From the first he made his employment pay him in addition to a salary opportunities to acquire a thorough knowledge of the business, and from one responsibility to another he has been promoted to the office of vice president of the incorporation. The offices of this company are on the third floor of the Carew Building in Cincinnati. As wholesalers of hay and grain their business covers all the eastern and southern states, and they are also exporters to Europe, Cuba and other countries. The officers of the company are: H. Lee Early, president; E. B. Terrill, vice president; Robert L. Early, secretary and treasurer.

Mr. Terrill resides at 2213 Greenup Street in Covington. He did his war work as a contributor to the purchase of bonds and as a worker in several organizations in Kenton County. He is a democrat in politics. In 1900, at Palo Park, Ohio, Mr. Terrill married Miss Bertha J. Kayser, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William L. Kayser, residents of Saylor Park. Her father is a contractor and builder. Mrs. Terrill is a graduate of the Oxford College for Women at Oxford, Ohio. To their marriage were born four children: Margaret, in 1902, Berkshire, in 1913, and Anne and Bill, twins, in 1915. The daughter Margaret is now a student in the University of Cincinnati.

W. J. BAKER. One of the leading industrial centers of Kentucky, Newport, owes much to the business known as the W. J. Baker Company, manufacturers of metal specialties, with a product that is sent to all parts of the United States. This business was established here by W. J. Baker more than fifteen years ago, and he has been the presiding genius in its successful growth.

Mr. Baker was born in Campbell County, Kentucky,

May 25, 1866, and is a member of a family that has lived in this section of the state for more than a century. His grandfather, William Baker, was born in Pennsylvania in 1787 and when a young man moved to Campbell County, Kentucky, where he married Betsey Dye. She was born in Campbell County in 1799, her father, John Dye, having been one of the first settlers in this region, locating here in time to develop a farm from the primeval wilderness. William Baker spent his active life as a farmer in Campbell County, where he died in 1880 and his wife in 1885. Their son William Baker, Jr., was born in Campbell County in 1821, and remained a resident of the county all his life. For many years he owned and conducted a farm at Cold Springs. He died in Campbell County in 1905. He was a democrat and a very loyal member and worker in the Baptist Church. It was in 1901 that Mr. Baker established a business on Pearl Street in Cincinnati for the manufacture of sheet metal specialties. In 1906 he moved the plant to Newport, and it is now housed in a large building and surrounding grounds occupying two blocks at 1029 to 1043 Saratoga Street. NATHAN POWELL TAYLOR, the commonwealth's attorney for the judicial district composed of Henderson, Union and Webster counties, is recognized as one of the most reliable and successful practitioners of his part of the state. He is a man of firm convictions, settled purpose, practical in his aims, whether as attorney, official or man, and has therefore advanced steadily to a high and substantial professional position, having been effective also in the realization of those projects which are advanced by good citizens of modern tendencies.

Mr. Taylor was born on a farm near Zion, Henderson County, Kentucky, January 2, 1864, and is a son of William H. and Mary (Powell) Taylor. His father was born at Tallahassee, Florida, a son of John S. and Elizabeth (Blackwell) Taylor, natives of Virginia and of old and highly respected families of the Old Dominion. The mother of Nathan P. Taylor was born in Henderson County, a daughter of Nathan and Mary (Smith) Powell. Her father was also born in Henderson County, and was a son of Nathan Powell, a native of Virginia and a pioneer settler of Henderson County. William H. Taylor was a farmer by occupation and lived for many years in Henderson County, where he died at the age of eighty-seven years, his wife passing away when sixty-five years of age. They were faithful members of the Baptist Church, and Mr. Taylor was a democrat in politics. They were the parents of four children, two of whom died in infancy, the survivors being: J. Stokes and N. Powell, both of whom were reared on the home farm.

Nathan Powell Taylor attended the district school in the vicinity of his father's homestead, and subsequently pursued a course in the high school at Henderson, from which he was duly graduated. Having decided upon a professional career, he read law in the office of Judge J. L. Dorsey, was admitted to the bar in 1889, and since that year has devoted himself to his calling. He began practice at Henderson, which has always been his home and the scene of his success, and after six years, in 1895, was elected on the democratic ticket to the office of state senator. Resigning in 1897, he accepted the position of county attorney, to which office he had been elected in that year, and was re-elected in 1901 and again in 1905, serving in all twelve years in that capacity. His record was a splendid one and he retired from the post with a reputation for high executive and professional abilities. He then gave his entire attention to his large and remunerative private practice until 1915, when he was elected commonwealth's attorney for a term of six years. He has repeated his success in discharging the duties of this office and has added materially to the reputation which he had already established. Mr. Taylor is one of the influential democrats of his locality and has been a prominent factor in the success of his party. As a fraternalist he holds membership in Henderson Lodge of the Knights of Pythias, and his religious affiliation is with the Presbyterian Church.

WILLIAM HOPKINS STITES, cashier of the Ohio Valley Banking and Trust Company at Henderson, has been identified with financial affairs here for nearly forty years, during which time he has worked his own way to recognition and substantial position. He has also been connected with matters of civic moment, and on several occasions has been called upon to serve his fellow-citizens in offices of trust and responsibility, in the discharge of the duties of which he has evidenced the possession of marked executive capacity.

Mr. Stites was born on a farm in Henderson County, Kentucky, June 3, 1863, a son of Richard and Ann Mary (Hopkins) Stites. The Stites family is of English origin, and the family in America is said to be descended from Dr. John Stites, who came from England early in the seventeenth century and settled in Massachusetts, where he practiced medicine and lived to be more than 100 years old. A short time before his death this remarkable man is said to have walked fourteen miles in order to visit a friend, and then to have walked back home the same day. John Stites, known as "Captain" Stites, the great-grandfather of William H., was born in New England but went to Philadelphia, where he became a large merchant of his day, as well as a ship owner and navigator and an importer of foreign goods. He was one of the very first white men to enter Chinese ports. Captain Stites was the father of a large family of children, and one of his sons was one of the few who survived imprisonment on an English prison ship during the Revolutionary war, a struggle in which other sons of the Captain served as soldiers.

Samuel Stites, the grandfather of William H., was born at Philadelphia, and came to Kentucky at an early day, settling at Henderson, where he became a merchant, and followed that occupation for many years, taking a prominent part in the early history of the community. He was married at Henderson to Rebecca Ballard Hol-loway, whose family were early and prominent citizens of the county, and they had one son, Richard, and two daughters, Rebecca, who married William S. Elma, and Lucy, who married James R. Barret. Richard Stites, the father of William H., was born at Henderson in November, 1832, and was reared and educated in this city, where he received his introduction to commercial affairs in the business establishment of his father. He first adopted the vocation of a merchant, but after several years in this capacity turned his attention to agricultural pursuits and passed his career in tilling the soil. His death occurred in 1883 on his farm. Mr. Stites took a leading and important part in civic affairs and was highly esteemed in his community for his sterling industry and many admirable traits of character. He was a democrat in politics and served as ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, to which Mrs. Stites, who survives her husband at the age of eighty-three years, has long belonged. She was born in Henderson County, a daughter of John Tignal and Lucy (Hamilton) Hopkins, her father being also a native of this county. Five children were born to Richard and Ann Mary Stites; Samuel; William Hopkins; Mary Cameron, the wife of W. F. Crockett; Richard, and Hamilton, all living.

William Hopkins Stites was born, reared and educated in Henderson County, and it has always been his home. After attaining a public school education, at the age of nineteen years, he entered the First National Bank of Henderson, in 1882, and continued to be identified with that institution, in various capacities, until 1895. In that year he embarked in the tobacco business, in which he continued six years, but in 1901 returned to banking, this time with the Ohio Valley Banking and Trust Company, as trust officer. Subsequently he was advanced to assistant cashier and in 1914 was made cashier, a position which he now holds in addition to being a member of the Board of Directors of this bank, which bears an excellent reputation among financiers in this state. Mr. Stites has been a member and president of the city school board. He is a deacon of the First Presbyterian Church of Henderson, and is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner and a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in all of which orders he has numerous friends.

Mr. Stites first married Miss Bertha Hall, by whom he had one son, Samuel. His second union was with Miss Christina Clark, of Henderson County. They have had no children.

LEVI P. SPURR who is living virtually retired on his fine farm estate nine miles southeast of the City of Lexington, has been a resident of Fayette County from the time of his birth. He is a man of superior intellectual ken, and has been a leader in progressive movements and enterprises that have tended to conserve the civic and industrial advancement of the community. He is one of the well known and highly esteemed citizens of Fayette County and is specially entitled to recognition in this history of his native state.

On a farm adjoining that on which he now resides Levi Spurr was born May 13, 1840, and he is a son of Richard and Martha (Prewitt) Spurr, the latter a daughter of the late William Prewitt, whose home was near Pine Grove, Clark County. Richard Spurr was born on the same homestead as was his son Levi, and the year of his nativity, 1812, shows that the family was established in Fayette County in the early pioneer days. William Spurr, father of Richard, was a boy at the time his parents came from the old home in Virginia and established their residence on the ancestral homestead which was the birthplace of the subject of this sketch. Richard Spurr, father of William, had been a patriot soldier in the War of the Revolution, and in making removal to the wilds of Kentucky he transported his family and household effects on flatboats on the Ohio River. In addition to securing land which the Government gave to him in recognition of his services as a Revolutionary soldier he acquired other tracts and became a large holder of land in Fayette County, besides which he selected in this state land for other soldiers who had served in the Revolutionary war. He had been an officer in the War for Independence. William Spurr inherited the old home farm, and there he continued to reside until his death. He became an extensive landholder and was one of the leaders in civic and industrial progress in Fayette County, the fine old homestead farm being still in the possession of the Spurr family and being one of the few remaining tracts that has remained continuously in possession of one family from the time of the original Governmental grant in this section of the Blue Grass state. It is a matter of family tradition that William Spurr established a small distillery store on his farm, besides which he owned a general store, a blacksmith shop and a wood-working shop in the Village of Athens, one and one-half miles distant from his home. The old stone house that was erected by his father was one of the most venerable buildings of Fayette County at the time it was finally torn down, in 1918. William Spurr became the father of three sons—Buford, William, Jr., and Richard. Buford Spurr prepared himself for the medical profession and engaged in practice at Paris, Bourbon County. The family name of his first wife was Engles, and she died after becoming the mother of one child, a daughter. For his second wife he married Miss Eliza Boone, daughter of George Boone, and their only child, George Ann, became the wife of Sidney Christian. After retiring from the practice of his profession Doctor Spurr gave his attention to mercantile pursuits at Athens, Fayette County, until his death. William, Jr., the second son, became a carpenter and contractor at Athens, and there remained until his death, his only child, a daughter, having died young. Richard, the third son, married when a young man and he purchased the old Garrard farm on the opposite side of the road from the farm on which he was born. There he died at the age of forty-two years, and his widow survived him by more than half a century, she having been ninety years of age at the time of her death. They became the parents of ten children: Richard A., the firstborn, became a farmer on the Winchester Turnpike in Fayette County, and here he died at the age of sixty-nine years. Levi P., the second son, is the immediate subject of this review. Marius A. is engaged in the insurance business in the City of Nashville, Tennessee. Robert died in young manhood. Betty is the wife of George Taylor, of Nicholasville, Jessamine County. Of the other five children none attained to years of maturity.

Levi P. Spurr remained with his widowed mother on the old homestead until he had attained to the age of twenty-eight years, his marriage having occurred seven years previously. In the meanwhile he had received excellent educational advantages, including those of Bethany College, where he was a student under Rev. Alexander Campbell, founder of what was known as the Campbellite (now Christian) Church, and where one of his school mates was Capt. James H. Rogers, of Bourbon County, of whom individual mention is made on other pages of this work. On leaving the old homestead Mr. Spurr purchased another farm in the same section of Fayette County, and in 1869 he sold this property and purchased his present farm, which comprises fifty acres and which is exceptionally well improved. In 1892 the Fiscal Court of Fayette County conferred upon Mr. Spurr appointment to the office of county road supervisor. He had previously served sixteen years as a magistrate, or justice of the peace, and thus was an ex-officio member of the Fiscal Court. He assumed the office of county road supervisor on the 2d of June, 1892, and from the beginning his administration was marked by vigorous, determined and well ordered efforts to bring about a general improvement in the highways of the county. Up to 1892 all turnpike roads in the county were operated under the old toll system, and Mr. Spurr became the vigorous advocate of the policy of maintaining free service on these roads. He prepared the Legislative bill that came to enactment and resulted in the establishing of the present system of free turnpikes in Kentucky, this bill having been presented by Judge Kincaid, who then represented Fayette County in the State Legislature. The original bill provided only for the establishing of free turnpikes in Fayette County, and the new measure met with vigorous opposition. At that time the County Court of Fayette County consisted of sixteen members and of the number only four were willing to give support to Mr. Spurr and his progressive measure. He valiantly continued his campaign, and found that the stockholders of about sixty toll roads were willing to open the toll gates on these roads, as the through-fares were paying no dividends under the toll system. The county, under the provisions of the new law, assumed charge of these turnpikes, and in his official position Mr. Spurr took charge of the repairing and general maintenance, with the result that the roads under his supervision soon became the best in this section of the state, and other toll roads were brought under the new jurisdiction. It required six years to bring this system of free use of all roads in the county, and Mr. Spurr thus found his official labors and responsibilities greatly increased. His zeal and progressiveness made him welcome all such added duties, and he not only let the contracts for the work done on the roads, but also maintained a personal supervision in order to see that the work was properly done. It has been largely due to his effective propaganda and vital campaign that practically all turnpikes in Central Kentucky are now operated under the free system. After the death of his loved wife Mr. Spurr established his official headquarters in the City of Lexington, and here he wrote many articles for the press in support of free roads, besides giving himself unreservedly to other promotive activities in behalf of the cause. His experience in this connection brought him into contact with many representative men of the state, and in opening the former toll roads in Fayette County he utilized no force and resorted to no toll-gate raiding, as became common in other sections of the state. He directed public opinion in the county until conviction was assured in the matter of the expediency of the free system, and his work has been of great and cumulatively enduring value to the county and its people. He introduced modern road-rollers and the use of oil on the roads of the county, replaced old wooden bridges with those of modern steel or concrete type, and in addition to repairing many miles of turnpike he effected the construction of seventy-two miles of new road, his ambition being to give to every farm of the county an effective outlet for the transportation of its products. Mr. Spurr continued to maintain his office at Lexington for eighteen years—until 1910—and since that time he has resided on his farm, where he is now living virtually retired. He resigned the office of road supervisor in the year 1910, after an administration that shall reflect lasting honor upon his name and that shall ever stand in evidence of his loyalty, his progressiveness and his insistent public spirit.

Mr. Spurr is now the oldest citizen to have been born and reared in this section of the country with the exception of a venerable colored man, Bob Turner. He has made a close study of road construction and maintenance, and has visited Canadian provinces in connection with his investigations in connection with good roads. He is a strong supporter of the policy of constructing national roads. The Spurr family maintained allegiance to the old whig party, but while a student at Bethany College, and later at the University of Kentucky, Levi P. Spurr was led to support the policy of state rights, as exemplified in the speeches of President Calhoun. He is now a staunch advocate of the cause of the democratic party. He was graduated in Bethany College, and his training in geology and surveying proved of great value in his later work as road supervisor of Fayette County.

Mr. Spurr was twenty-one years of age at the time of his marriage to Miss Jennie E. Winn, of Louisville, and her death occurred in 1897, on his present home farm. She is survived by two sons, Richard M. and Lee, who have the active management of the home farm, where, as bachelors, they remain with their honored father. In 1900 Mr. Spurr married Miss Bertie O. Christian, and she passed to eternal rest in September, 1912. Mr. Spurr holds membership in the Broadway Christian Church at Lexington, and is affiliated with the Masonic fraternity.

HUGH BARKER POWELL, M. D. The individual work and service of Doctor Powell as a capable physician in the Corydon community for over a quarter of a century supplements and gives continuity to splendid work in the same profession and in the same county by his father before him and also by his maternal grandfather. He represents the third generation of physicians in this family in Henderson County.

Doctor Powell was born in Corydon December 26, 1872, son of James Nathaniel and Bettie (Dorsey) Powell, both natives of Henderson County. His maternal grandfather, Dr. James N. Dorsey, graduated in medicine from the University of Louisville in 1838, and spent many years as a successful country practitioner in Henderson County. James Nathaniel Powell graduated from the University of Louisville, Medical Department, in 1862, and was in practice for upwards of sixty years. All his professional work was done in Corydon, where he lived for fifty-seven years and where he died at the age of seventy-six, a highly esteemed doctor and citizen. His wife was seventy when she died. James Nathaniel Powell was a staunch democrat, and he and his wife members of the Christian Church.

Hugh Barker Powell was the only son of his parents. They had five daughters. He grew up in his native community of Corydon, was educated in the local schools, spent two years in the University of Kentucky at Louisville, and on March 14, 1894, graduated in medicine from the University of Louisville, the school of both his father and grandfather. During the next sixteen years Doctor Powell practiced at Corydon in association with his father, and since then has carried the burdens of his profession alone. He is a member of the County and State Medical Societies, the Ohio Valley Medical Society, and has always exemplified the best qualities of a capable physician and surgeon. He is a democrat, is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias, and he and his wife are members of the Christian Church.

On June 14, 1900, he married Miss Nannie A. Moore, daughter of Benjamin Charles and Theresa Norton (Congleton) Moore. Her father was born in Georgia and her mother in Virginia. Dr. and Mrs. Powell's two children are Theresa Hugh and Margaret Elizabeth.

JOHN HENDERSON HODGE is a native Scot, came to Kentucky forty odd years ago, and has had a long and successful business career as a tobacco dealer and exporter. He is a resident of Henderson, and is active head of the Hodge Tobacco Company.

He was born at Glasgow, Scotland, August 8, 1854. His parents, James and Catherine (Henderson) Hodge, spent all their lives in Scotland. In his native land Mr. Hodge acquired a high school education, and was twenty-three years of age when, in 1877, he came to the United States. His first location was at Princeton, Kentucky, where he gained his knowledge of the tobacco industry in a local factory. He came to Henderson in 1879 and has ever been identified with some branch of the tobacco business. About ten years ago the Hodge Tobacco Company was incorporated, and their facilities have been developed for the rehandling and preparing of tobacco for export. The company maintains plants and branch establishments at Henderson, Owensboro, Paducah, Hopkinsville, Madisonville, and Slaughter'sville, and is one of the largest concerns of its kind in western Kentucky.

At Princeton, Kentucky, in 1879, Mr. Hodge married Miss Kitty Gray, daughter of William Gray of Princeton. They have two sons, James and William, both associated with their father in business, and a daughter, Catherine, wife of G. O. Letcher, of Henderson.

MONTGOMERY MERRITT, of Henderson, has been vouchsafed a long life, and, more important, has had the great satisfaction of seeing his efforts and experiences well rounded out with completeness and adequate performance. He was a boy soldier in the Confederacy, and served practically from the beginning to the very end of that great struggle. He had practiced law at Henderson fully half a century before he gave up the cares and responsibilities of a profession. His other activities have been attended with corresponding good fortune.

Mr. Merritt was born in Todd County, Kentucky. His father, Dr. Daniel Ross Merritt, was born in Williamson County, Tennessee, in 1800, settled in Todd County, Kentucky, in 1828, and combined with unusual success the vocations of farming and the practice of medicine. He lived a long, useful and exemplary life and died in 1887. The mother of Montgomery Merritt was Penelope Hannum, who was born at Russellville, Logan County, Kentucky, in 1811 and died in Todd County in 1885.

Montgomery Merritt grew up in his native county and acquired his early education in public and private schools. It was in May, 1861, before he was sixteen years of age, that he made his first application for service as a Confederate soldier. Though very youthful, he was accepted as a volunteer in the First Kentucky Infantry for a period of one year. He saw some of the fighting in the summer of 1861, but was soon stricken with typhoid and on account of physical disability was honorably discharged in December, 1861. He then returned home and remained until after the fall of Fort Donelson, when, feeling that his help was again needed, he rejoined his regiment at Orange Court House, Virginia, and served until the conclusion of his term of enlistment, in May, 1862. Then for a second time he received an honorable discharge. His military enthusiasm being unsatisfied and his loyalty to the South undimmed, he determined to stick to the fortunes of the Confederacy to the end. When he resumed services it was in the command of Gen. John H. Morgan. He was in some of Morgan's most noted raids, and was wounded only once. He accompanied Morgan on the raid through Indiana and Ohio, and was captured at Buffington's Island July 21, 1863. During the greater part of the remainder of the war Mr. Merritt was a prisoner at Camp Douglas, Chicago, until February, 1865, when he was sent to Richmond, Virginia, for exchange. He is a survivor of the guard of Confederate troops who accompanied President Davis after the evacuation of Richmond to Georgia and was present at Washington, in that state in May, 1865, when the Confederate generals saw the cause was lost, and determined to surrender. Thus Mr. Merritt was practically in service four full years, from May, 1861, until May, 1865.

The war over, he quickly readapted himself to the demands of civilian life, and resumed his education, graduating from Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tennessee, in 1869. He was valedictorian of his law graduation class. He immediately located at Henderson, and soon achieved special prominence in his profession, a prominence he continued to enjoy as long as he remained in practice. Mr. Merritt achieved real success as a lawyer without the aid of politics, and it is significant of his high position as a lawyer that he was never a candidate for more than one office. In 1877 he was elected a member of the State Legislature. In connection with his law practice he naturally accumulated many business interests. Some of the more extensive and valuable of these consisted in farm holdings and active farming. He also served as president of the Planters National Bank of Henderson and its successor the Planters State Bank for thirty-one years and as vice president of the Ohio Valley Banking and Trust Company, for seven years and as director of the Henderson Cotton Mills for thirty-four years.

Mr. Merritt is a Knight of Pythias and an Elk and a member of the Presbyterian Church. In 1871 he married Miss Mary Field Green, of Lebanon, Tennessee. For his second wife he married, in 1877, Miss Eliza B. Alves, of Henderson.

JOSEPH B. DUNKIE learned the grocery business as a clerk on Pike Street in Covington, and that one street has been the scene of his activities as an employe and as a merchant for practically forty years. For a number of years past his name has been associated with one of the largest wholesale and retail grocery houses in this section of Kentucky.

Mr. Dunkie was born at Covington October 13, 1865. His father, Benjamin Dunkie, was born in 1819, was reared in his native Shropshire, England, worked in the rolling mills in England and after coming to Covington in 1850 continued his work in iron mills. He lived a long and industrious life and was a quiet and efficient citizen of Covington, where he died in 1904, at the age of eighty-five. He was a member of the Episcopal Church, and after coming to America was affiliated with the republican party. He married Elizabeth Evens, who was also a native of Shropshire, but they were married after they came to Covington. She was born in 1823 and died in 1911. Joseph B. is the youngest of their four children. His older sister, Hattie, resides with him at Covington, is the widow of J. T. Ewens, who was a printer, member of the firm Ewens & Eberly, and died at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Selena Dunkie is the wife of Alfred Gallear, a painter living at Covington. John Dunkie, the only other son, was a railroad engineer and died at Covington at the age of sixty-nine.

Joseph B. Dunkie attended grammar school at Covington and high school one year, and at the age of fourteen began his work in a grocery store on Pike Street. Through clerkship he learned the details of the grocery business, both retail and wholesale, and at the age of twenty-one he put his modest capital and experience to work in the retail grocery and daily market business for himself. In 1911 he formed his partnership with George C. Goode, and the firm of Goode & Dunkie is the leading wholesale and retail grocery business in Covington. The store is at 19-21 Pike Street and extends through to another frontage at 18-20 West-Seventh Street.

Mr. Dunkie has prospered as a business man at Covington, is a director of the Covington Perpetual Building and Loan Association and is owner of considerable city real estate, including his modern home at 1506 Greenup Street. He contributed of his personal means and work to the success of the Red Cross, Liberty Loan, Y. M. C. A. and other drives during the World war. Mr. Dunkie is serving a four years term as a member of the Covington School Board, having been elected in 1918, and, now is the president of this board. Some years ago he served a term of similar length on the board. He is a deacon of the Madison Avenue Christian Church, is a republican, and prominent in Masonry and the Knights of Pythias. He is a past chancellor commander of Friendship Lodge No. 20, Knights of Pythias, and grand outer guard of the Grand Lodge of Knights of Pythias of the state. He is affiliated with Covington Lodge No. 109, F. and A. M., Covington Chapter No. 35, R. A. M., Kenton Council No. 13, R. & S. M., and Covington Commandery No. 7, K. T.

Mr. Dunkie married Miss Florence B. Miller at Covington in 1886. Her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Miller, are now deceased, her father having been a well known river steamboat captain. The only son of Mr. Dunkie is Ernest B., born in 1893. During the World war he was a member of the Kenton County Draft Board and gave much of his time to his patriotic duties. He is assistant cashier of the First National Bank of Covington, and he and his wife live with his parents. He married Miss Luta Keckley, a native of Covington, and both are graduates of the Covington High School.

JOHN CLIFFORD MILLS has filled the office of county superintendent of schools for Kenton County eight years. He has achieved a distinctive place and has done a distinctive work among Kentucky educators, and apparently there was a strong hereditary influence to direct him into this noble profession, since his father before him was a teacher and several of his brothers and sisters have been identified with school work.

Mr. Mills was born in Kenton County, June 4, 1879. He is of Scotch ancestry, his great-grandfather, John Mills, being a native of Scotland and was a pioneer farmer of Kenton County. His wife was Mary McCollum, a native of Kenton County. Their son, Thomas Mills, was born in Pendleton County, Kentucky, but spent the greater part of his life on a farm at Staffordsburg.

John M. Mills, father of the county school superintendent, was born in Kenton County in November, 1844, and was a school teacher until he was forty years of age. He was also an expert surveyor and civil engineer, and did much of the early engineering work in the construction of the county turnpikes. During the last eighteen years of his life he lived on the farm where his wife was born and reared, and conducted agricultural operations on an extensive scale. At this old homestead, four miles east of Independence at Staffordsburg, he died October 19, 1919. He was also identified with the democratic party and was a very active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

John M. Mills married Sarah Adaline Steers, who was born at the old homestead farm at Staffordsburg in 1848, and is now living with some of her children at 333 East Thirty-third Street in Latonia, Covington. Her father, William Steers, was born in Virginia in 1827, and acquired and developed the farm in Kenton County which for many years has been the home of the Mills family. He died at that homestead in 1883. William Steers married Miss Mary Feathers, who also died at the old homestead.

The children of John M. Mills and wife were eleven in number: T. F. Mills, a farmer at Visalia, Kenton County; E. O. Mills, county road engineer with home at Independence; M. M. Mills, a contractor and road builder with home at White Tower, Kenton County; Mamie F., wife of Atwood Hoffman, and they own and operate the old Mills homestead at Staffordsburg; W. D. Petty, an employe of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, their home being with Mrs. John M. Mills; Miss Emma F., who lives with her mother and is a teacher in the Newport schools; G. C. Mills, a teacher of mathematics and physics in a Philadelphia high school; H. H. Mills, whose home is at 212 East Eighteenth Street, Covington, and who is principal of the Eleventh District School; and Vaught, superintendent of the city schools of Bellevue, Kentucky.

John Clifford Mills spent his youthful years on the old homestead in Kenton County, attended rural schools, is a graduate of the private high school at Independence, and completed his normal course with two years in the State University of Lexington. From 1900 to 1905 he did rural school work in Kenton County. Following that for about four years he was in the insurance business as a representative of the Metropolitan Life Company at Covington. In 1909 he was given the executive responsibilities of establishing the Kenton County High School at Elsmere, and remained as principal of that school for four and a half years. In the fall of 1913 he was elected county superintendent, and was reelected in the fall of 1917. He has been the county official in charge of school administration since January, 1914, with offices in the Court House at Independence. Under the direct supervision of his office are thirty-three rural schools, six graded schools and three independent high schools. The teaching staff for these schools numbers seventy-five and the scholarship enrollment is 3,047.

Mr. Mills lives at Erlanger, where he built in 1918 a handsome brick home at 130 Commonwealth Avenue. He was a member of the Board of Trustees of Erlanger two years. He is a democrat, a deacon in the Baptist Church, is a member of the Kentucky Educational Association, is a past chancellor commander of Lafayette Lodge No. 111, Knights of Pythias, at Erlanger and a member of Good Faith Lodge No. 95, F. and A. LOUIS NUTINI is one of the well known manufacturers and business men of Covington, where he has developed an important industry making a line of novelty goods distributed throughout the United States.

He was born at Barga, Italy, October 24, 1884. This is one of the very old Italian families, the records going back well into the middle ages and a number of generations have lived in the vicinity of Barga, where Louis Nutini, grandfather of the Covington manufacturer, spent all his life. Salvatore Nutini, father of the Covington manufacturer, was born in Barga in 1863, and in early life was a farmer in that vicinity. In 1886 he came to the United States and had a plant for the manufacture of statuary in Milwaukee and also in Chicago, but traveled over much of the United States in disposing of his wares. Subsequently he made several other trips to the United States, spending four or five years each time. He is now living retired on his country estate at Barga, Italy. He was twice married. His first wife was Assunta Agnesini, who was born in Barga in 1863 and died at Milwaukee in 1887. Louis Nutini is the only child of this marriage. His father's second wife was Isola Agni, also of Barga, and they have five children: Eli, a confectioner at Paisley, Scotland; Elena, at home; Peter, who assists his brother Eli in business; Carrie and Christoph, both at home.

Louis Nutini received the equivalent of a high school education in his native town of Barga. At the age of fifteen he left school to come to the United States, and for three years was in Philadelphia assisting his father in the statuary business. On his return to Italy he followed the trade of cabinet maker for two years. In 1904 he again came to the United States, and was employed as a cabinet maker at Cincinnati until 1913. He then visited Italy for four months, and on his third trip to America returned to Cincinnati, worked at his trade two years, and in 1915 established his present business at Covington. He is now owner of a large and well equipped factory at 1340-42 Hermes Avenue, and on an average employs twenty hands to manufacture his line of novelties, including candlesticks, table lamps, floor lamps, book ends, smoke stands, nut bowls and fruit bowls. The jobbing and retail trade recognize the high standard of these goods and they are sold in practically every state of the Union.

Mr. Nutini owns a comfortable home at 25 West Twenty-eighth Street. Politically he votes the republican ticket and is a Catholic in religion. On January 24, 1916, at Covington, he married Miss Antoinetta Grover, daughter of John and Ann (Spare) Grover, residents of Covington. Her father is a steel mill worker. Mr. Cochran was born at Covington September 19, 1892. His grandfather, Joseph Bodine Cochran, was born in Alabama in 1844, and for the greater part of his life was a dealer in hardwood lumber. He lived for a number of years in Kenton County, later at Walnut Hill in Cincinnati, and after retiring from business moved to Bethel, Bath County, Kentucky, where he died in October, 1918. Throckmorton, was born in Kentucky in 1849, spent his active life as a farmer in Robertson and Pendleton counties, and is now living at Cincinnati. He married a Miss White, now deceased, but her father is living at Kentontown, Kentucky, at the age of eighty-nine. Doctor Cochran and wife had three children, Raymond A. being the oldest. HARRY WINFIELD ABBOTT is secretary and general manager of the Allen Supply Company, one of the oldest and largest concerns in Campbell County, dealing in coal and building supplies. The name Abbott is one that has been prominent in business affairs at Covington, Newport and other points in Campbell County through three generations.

Mr. Abbott's grandfather, Younglove Abbott, was born at Covington and spent all his life in that city. He was a steamboat and tobacco man, one of the notable citizens of his day and for a number of years was associated in business with the grandfather of the Hon. Thomas P. Carothers of Newport. William E. Abbott, father of Harry Winfield Abbott, was born at Covington August 12, 1853, in the same house in which his son Harry W. was born December 25, 1875. The father was reared and married in Kentucky, and for many years was an undertaker and embalmer. One incident of his professional work was his appointment on two different occasions under the quartermaster general's department at Washington to assist in bringing home from Cuba and Porto Rico the bodies of soldiers slain in those islands during the Spanish-American war. His modern home is at 639 Maple Avenue, Newport. He married in that city in 1908 Miss Emma Pfister, daughter of Fred and Rose Pfister, the latter a resident of Newport, where her father died. He was connected with the George Wiedemann Company of Newport. Mrs. Abbott is a graduate of the Newport High School.

ELMER T. GRAY, secretary of the Newport Chamber of Commerce, was an active newspaper man at Cincinnati for a number of years and his thorough training and publicity work is one of the chief qualifications for his present post of duty.

Mr. Gray was born at Cincinnati March 5, 1887. His grandfather, James Gray, was a native of County Sligo, Ireland, came to the United States when a young man, was married at Cincinnati, and followed his trade as a tailor in that city until his death in 1860. His son, Thomas J. Gray, was born in Cincinnati February 2, 1846, and soon after his fifteenth birthday he was accepted as a Union soldier for the Civil war. He joined Company F of the Sixty-first Ohio Infantry and was all through the war, later veteranizing and re-enlisting in the Sixty-first Ohio Infantry. He was severely wounded in the first battle of Bull Run and lost his hearing at Gettysburg. He participated in many other battles and was with Sherman from the battle of Chickamauga until the conclusion of the March to the Sea and through the Carolinas. For many years after the war he owned and operated an iron foundry, and from 1891 lived retired at Bellevue, Kentucky, where he died March 16, 1918. He was a life long democrat, served for eight and a half years as councilman from the Eighth Ward of Cincinnati, and was prominent both in politics and in business. Thomas J. Gray married Adeline Hartye, who was born in Cincinnati February 14, 1848, and now makes her home with her son Elmer.

The oldest of her children, Oliver Morton, who died at Cincinnati at the age of thirty-nine, was a master mechanic, and for a number of years assistant engineer at the Cincinnati Hospital. He was never an office seeker but played a prominent part in the democratic party. The second child, Percival Allen, born in 1870, is a resident of Chicago and general manager of the Feltman-Curme Company's chain of stores. Miss Lina, born in 1881, lives with her brother Elmer. Charles W., born in 1885, is assistant secretary of the Weir Frog Company of Norwood, Ohio, and lives at Silver-ton, Cincinnati.

Elmer T. Gray, the youngest of the family, attended public school at Cincinnati until he was thirteen. Since then he has been at work, both intensively and extensively. For nine years he was a page in the Cincinnati Public Library. During that time he attended a night high school four years and for three years pursued an engineering course in a Cincinnati night school. Mr. Gray became a reporter for the Cincinnati Post in 1909, and was with that journal for five years, after which he was one of the staff of the Cincinnati Enquirer until 1918. In August, 1918, he joined the National Army, being assigned to duty as machine gun instructor at the Officers' Training School at Camp Hancock, Georgia, remaining there until mustered out in December, 1919. After leaving the army he resumed his old duties with the Cincinnati Enquirer for a month, until appointed assistant city recorder at Newport. In April, 1920, he gave up this office when appointed secretary of the Newport Chamber of Commerce, with offices at 22 East Sixth Street. In addition to the routine of duties he has with the Chamber of Commerce he is also secretary of the Campbell County Good Roads Association, is chairman of the Campbell County Chapter of the American Red Cross and secretary of the local post of the American Legion. Some years ago Mr. Gray, who has been a resident of Campbell County the greater part of his life, was a candidate at the democratic primaries for county commissioner, being defeated by a small margin. He was secretary of the Democratic Campaign Committee of Campbell County during the Wilson campaign of 1912. The county was carried by an overwhelming majority, and a margin of 300 votes was secured even in the republican stronghold of Bellevue. Mr. Gray is a member of the Episcopal Church and is affiliated with Excelsior Lodge No. 369, F. and A. M., at Cincinnati, and Newport Aerie No. 289, Fraternal Order of Eagles.

Doctor Ridley served as county health officer five years, and is a member of the County and State Medical associations. He is also a Master Mason and Elk, a democratic voter and a Methodist. In 1910 he married Miss Emma Kavanaugh, of Robards, Kentucky.

GEORGE FIELDING JONES, M. D. A physician and surgeon of unusual scientific equipment and training, Doctor Jones has been engaged in a successful general practice at Henderson for the past four years.

HENRY P. BARRET. Only a mind of strength, persistent grasp and broad sweep of abilities can earn signal success in a special field already crowded with keen competitors, and at the same time retain fresh and balanced faculties for the consideration and advancement of public and social problems. Henry P. Barret is thus entitled to consideration as one of the leading citizens of Henderson, for he has not only gained well-merited success in the tobacco exporting business and in agricultural operations, but is one of the leading Masons in the State of Kentucky, and is identified with movements that are agitating thoughtful citizens as a member of the Kentucky State Commission on Charities and Correction.

Mr. Barret was born at Henderson, Kentucky, September 2, 1865, a son of James R. and Lucy (Stites) Barret, the former a native likewise of Henderson. James R. Barret was a son of John H. and Susan (Rankin) Barret, the former a native of Virginia and the latter of Kentucky. John H. Barret came to Henderson in the early '30s of the nineteenth century with his brother, Alexander B. Barret, with whom he was associated in the tobacco business for years. For a long period the tobacco firm of John H. Barret & Company bought and exported tobacco at Henderson, and with this firm James R. Barret was identified for many years. The last-named is still a resident of Henderson, where he is held in the highest esteem. The mother of Henry P. Barret, who was also born at Henderson, where she lived to the age of sixty years, was a daughter of Samuel and Rebecca (Holloway) Stites. Her father, a Quaker, came to Kentucky from Philadelphia, and her mother was brought here in arms from Virginia, her native state. To James R. Barret and wife there were born two children: Henry P.; and Susan, the wife of Dr. Samuel G. Gant, of New York City.

Henry P. Barret was reared at Henderson, where he acquired his education in the public schools and at Central University. For five years he was connected with the tobacco firm of John H. Barret & Company, and in 1888 became a tobacco exporter on his own account. He has continued in the business in addition to operating extensive farm lands and other interests. While his tobacco business has been conducted at Robard, Owensboro, Providence and Wickliffe, Kentucky, he has always resided at Henderson. In business circles he is recognized as a man of the soundest integrity, of unerring judgment and of the highest principles, in addition to being one of the best informed men in the tobacco industry in the state.

Politically Mr. Barret is a democrat, but has never sought political honors, preferring to devote his time and attention to his business interests. However, in January, 1920, he was appointed to membership on the Kentucky State Commission on Charities and Correction, a non-partisan position, by Governor Morrow, and as a good citizen he has given freely of his time and abilities to the discharge of the duties of this office. During the recent war period he served efficiently as Federal food commissioner for the Henderson Commercial District of Kentucky. Mr. Barret is one of the best known Masons in the state, a Knight Templar and a Noble of the Mystic Shrine. In 1907-8 he was grand master of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, in 1916-17 served as grand commander of the Grand Commandery of Kentucky, and has also been potentate of Rizpah Shrine.

In 1901 Mr. Barret was united in marriage with Miss Miriam Worsham, of Henderson, a member of an old and highly respected family of Henderson County.

JACOB H. GRAVES. Love of home, of peace and industry, cardinal virtues in the lives of men and nations, were the ever present and controlling influences in the life of the late Jacob H. Graves of Fayette County. A character such as that of Mr. Graves is not builded in a day—communities do not grow and develop such men in a season, and now that he has responded to the call that comes to us all, this county and state are much poorer by reason of the fact that he has gone. While he enjoyed the position of a prominent banker at Lexington he preferred the quiet, plain life of a farmer. In Fayette County in the midst of friends, many of whom knew him from childhood, he lived and died. Quietly and unassumingly he passed his years, and with friendship bonds as true as steel held a worthy place among those who knew him. A good name is the legacy he left his family even better than the broad acres he owned, as such a life is a heritage that is of more value than any other bequest, and the memory of his life is an inspiration to all who aspire to worthy place in the hearts and memory of the people, and who can tell what the full fruition will be.

Jacob H. Graves was born in Fayette County, October 25, 1846, and died at his home "Conoid" near Chilesburgh, February 14, 1921. The Graves family came to Kentucky from Virginia in the early history of this state and settled in the Brier Hill precinct where Jacob H. Graves lived at the time of his death, and where his father Robert B. Graves, his paternal grandfather Joseph Graves and his maternal grandfather Jacob Hughes lived before him. For more than a hundred years the members of this family have lived in the same immediate locality in the county, were pioneers in the settlement and development and have always been closely identified with the material, religious and intellectual progress of the county. Mr. Graves was a farmer all his life and at the time of his death was a large land owner.

He was one of the seven children, three sons and four daughters, born to Benjamin R. and Jane Hughes Graves. His father died at the age of seventy-four and his mother at eighty-one. Robert B. Graves was for many years extensively engaged in cattle feeding. He was first a whig and later a democrat in politics and he and his wife were members of the Christian Church.

Jacob H. Graves was essentially a well educated man and had a broad range of intellectual interests, was independent in politics but had voted the republican ticket in all recent presidential elections. He learned the work of his father's farm, and at the age of fourteen started modestly as a small feeder of cattle and during the succeeding years through industry, good management and wise investment became one of the largest cattle feeders in the state and the possessor of some 4,500 acres in land in the Blue Grass country. Before his death he had given 1,500 acres of this land to his children.

September 25, 1866, Mr. Graves married Miss Jennie McKenney, who was born in Clark County, Kentucky, daughter of William and Sallie (Ferguson) McKenney, being the second of their four children. Her father was a native of Virginia and her mother of Kentucky. Mrs. Graves, who survives her honored husband, is the mother of three children: Sarah, who is the wife of Reuben Clark, and has two children, Julius G. and Virginia; Miss Jane R. and Jacob H., Jr.

From resolutions adopted by the Second National Bank of Lexington is quoted the following paragraph: "In 1883 Mr. Graves assisted in organizing the Second National Bank in the City of Lexington, and held the position of director from the time of its organization to the date of his death. For a number of years he was vice president of the bank, and upon the death of the late David H. James in December, 1914, he was elected president, which position he held at the time of his death. Mr. Graves took a peculiar and just pride in the growth of the bank with which he was connected and it was largely due to his conservatism and management and to his active cooperation with the other officers of the bank that the Second National Bank was placed upon the honor roll of national banks. He was scrupulously honest in all of his business dealings, was careful and painstaking in the performance of every duty, was a wise and safe counselor, was a very patriotic citizen and used and loaned his means generously and largely for the support of every Government undertaking; he was the largest subscriber to the Liberty and Victory loans in Fayette County, during the World war, thus helping to make it possible for the forces of democracy to 'carry on,' was a loyal and steadfast friend, and an earnest member of the Macedonia Christian Church, to the support of which he was a constant and generous contributor."

To this should also be added a paragraph of similar resolutions by the Lexington Clearing House Association: "By reason of his large means, his forceful personality, his integrity and conservatism, Mr. Graves contributed largely to the success and high standing of the institution over which he presided."

As to his intimate and personal life the best tribute is found in the words written by a friend:

"Mr. Graves was in no sense an ordinary man but viewed from every phase of his many sided character he was an extraordinary man. Nature must have been in a fertile mood when he was begotten. He was three inches over six feet tall, always weighing well over the two hundred pound mark, and in this stately and noble form dwelt a soul and mind that well befitted so splendid a tabernacle.

"The touchstone of every ambition of his life was the word 'success' and it made no difference to what single point he was directing his energies, whether setting a hen, hiving a colony of bees or founding a great banking institution, or purchasing a large estate, or following a great herd of cattle to make that point a success was his business, and he never failed. His were the best chickens, his bees were the most industrious, his land was the most fertile and improved the fastest; his beeves were the best, and his bank as safe and sound in its business policy as any in the country.

"Perhaps the most striking and attractive item in the long list of his admirable qualities was his devotion to his home and his beloved children. To him there was no home like his own, and no children like his, and he loved them with a pure devotion. Indeed his success was marked at no higher point anywhere than it was in the home he established and the children he reared. His home is a stately mansion, elegant and attractive, where the finest type of Kentucky hospitality found its expression; and his three children have taken their places among the foremost citizens of the State. His supreme moments of joy were the moments he spent in his home with his loved ones, and perhaps with some cherished friend he was entertaining with them as his guest. In his devotion to his home he was an example worthy of imitation by any father of a family.

"He would have made a great natural historian. He was fond of every creature that God had made, and he gathered about him many species of wild animal and bird life of this country, just to have them near him.

"He thought long, deeply and earnestly of the things of God and of the gospel of His Son, Jesus the Christ. He was a man of faith, and put his trust in God. Brave, truthful, kind, industrious, successful, are descriptions that may be truly applied to him."

C. T. DAVIS, cashier of the Citizens Bank of Erlanger, has been identified with banking in Northern Kentucky and Cincinnati for the past twenty years. He is a citizen of positive influence in Erlanger, and his abilities have attracted attention among banking circles generally.

Mr. Davis was born in Boone County, Kentucky, July 1, 1873. He is of Welsh ancestry. His grandparents, Thomas and Elizabeth Davis, spent their active lives on a farm in Boone County, where both of them died. Thomas Davis was born near Paris, Kentucky, and the family has been in America since Colonial times. Hubbell Davis, father of the Erlanger banker, was born in Boone County in 1840 and died at Hebron in that county in 1884. His active career of about a quarter of a century was spent as a general merchant at Hebron. In partnership with his brothers J. A. and J. W. Davis an extensive business was carried on under the firm name of Davis Brothers, including the operation of several other stores in Boone County. Hubbell Davis was a democrat, and outside of his home and business one of his main interests was his membership in the Christian Church. He married Belle Hankins, who was born in Boone County in 1841 and is now living with her only son and child at Erlanger.

C. T. Davis was educated in the public schools of Cincinnati, being eleven years of age when his father died. He graduated from a preparatory high school at Cincinnati in 1891, and acquired his early business training as a merchant at Hebron. In 1901 Mr. Davis became assistant cashier of the First National Bank of Ludlow, Kentucky, remaining there six years, following which for a year and a half he was individual bookkeeper with the Fifth-Third National Bank of Cincinnati. For reasons of health he sought a change in the Far West, and during about a year at Pasadena, California, was employed by a retail lumber firm. Returning to Kentucky in 1913, he located at Erlanger, and since 1915 has been cashier of the Citizens Bank and has the active executive direction of the bank's affairs. This bank was started as a state institution in 1912, and its modern bank home was erected in that year. It has capital of $25,000, surplus and profits of $15,000, and deposits averaging $150,000. The president is E. H. Blankenbecker, of Florence, Kentucky. The two vice presidents are T. J. Stevenson, of Erlanger, and O. M. Rogers, an attorney with offices at Covington.

Mr. Davis also does a large business handling real estate and fire insurance at Erlanger. He is secretary-treasurer of the Erlanger Fair Association. During the World war he worked with the local committees for the sale of bonds and the raising of funds for other patriotic purposes, and shares in the credit for the work which gave Erlanger such an enviable reputation in going "over the top" in all drives for all purposes. Mr. Davis served as city clerk of Ludlow for four years, and for many years has held a commission as a notary public. He is a member of the State Bankers Association, is a democrat, and is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias. He has one of the best homes in Erlanger, at 125 Commonwealth Avenue.

In 1898, in Boone County he married Miss Bertha L. Gaines, daughter of James T. and Lizzie (Alloway) Gaines, residents of Boone County, where her father still conducts a large farm. Mrs. Davis finished her education in Georgetown College in Kentucky.

J. G. RENAKER is a member of an old and prominent family of Harrison County, Kentucky, and has devoted his years to varied usefulness, having been a farmer, street railway man and a banker. He is cashier of the Florence Deposit Bank, and most of his interests are now located in Boone County.

Mr. Renaker was born near Cynthia in Harrison County July 24, 1880. His great-grandfather, Noah Renaker, was the founder of the family in Kentucky. CHARLES LOUTHIAN HILDRETH. Some of the outstanding examples of good architecture in home building and public construction at Covington are credited to the professional abilities of Charles Louthian Hildreth, an architect who prior to taking up that profession was also a practical builder.

Mr. Hildreth, who has lived most of his life in Covington, was born at St. Joseph, Missouri, April 17, 1887. His grandfather Hildreth was a Virginian, a planter and a Confederate soldier, and died while in the army. He married a Miss Lindenmood, a Virginian. Stewart Hildreth, father of Charles L., was born in Wythe County, Virginia, in 1859, was reared and married there, became a merchant, and in 1884 removed to St. Joseph, Missouri, and lived on a farm near that city until his death in February, 1888. He was a democrat and was a life-long member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and at different times had been Sunday School superintendent. He married Bettie Louthian, who was born in Wythe County, Virginia, in 1868, and died at Covington, Kentucky, in 1914. In 1891, four years after the death of her first husband, she married his brother, C. W. Hildreth, and in 1895 they moved back to Wythe County, Virginia, and in 1896 came to Covington, Kentucky. Mr. C. W. Hildreth is still living at 2224 Oakland Avenue in Covington. He is a veteran railroad man and is now mill foreman for the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroad Company. Charles L. Hildreth is the younger of two children, his sister, Flora, dying at the age of eight years. His mother by her second marriage left two children: William S., who lives with his father at Covington and is a locomotive engineer for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad; and Ruth Jane, a student in the Covington High School.

Charles L. Hildreth from the age of nine years attended public school at Covington, but at seventeen left high school to go to work as clerk in a grocery store. After three years he became a carpenter's apprentice and spent two years learning the trade. Since then he has been identified with building construction work, and while contracting he diligently studied architecture, and since 1911 has had a growing business as an architect. He has specialized in high class residences, and some of the most attractive homes in Covington and surrounding towns were designed by him. He also designed the Strand Theater on Pike Street in Covington, and was also selected to design the Emanuel Baptist Church to be erected at Twentieth and Greenup streets in Covington.

Mr. Hildreth in 1920 sold his home on East Twenty-Sixth Street, this being regarded as one of the most perfectly arranged smaller homes in the city. He now resides at 2315 Madison Avenue. His offices are at the corner of Sterrett and Madison avenues. Mr. Hildreth is a republican and for two years was a member of the Board of Equalization of Covington. He is on the official board of the Baptist Church, is a member of Covington Lodge No. 109, F. and A. M., and has taken eighteen degrees in the Scottish Rite in Indra Consistory No. 2. JOHN CABELL MOSELEY, M. D. An exceptionally high degree of good service in the medical profession has been rendered at Henderson by Doctor Moseley for over twenty years. He recently founded and established a private hospital, with best modern facilities, the only institution of the kind in Henderson, and that is only one of the evidences of his real leadership in the medical profession.

Doctor Moseley was born at Henderson December 30, 1874, a son of Thomas B. and Sue Belle (Smith) Moseley, both of whom were also natives of Henderson County. His father spent his active life as a farmer and Doctor Moseley, one of seven children, grew up in a country district, acquiring a country school education. He began the study of medicine at the age of eighteen, and in 1896 received his M. D. degree from the University of Louisville.

For a brief term he practiced as a country physician, but in 1897 removed his office to Henderson City, and practically from the first has found abundant opportunity to employ his whole energies and talents as a physician and surgeon. He did post graduate work in the Post Graduate School of New York City in 1904, and has always been a close student of medical and surgical science. His private hospital was established in 1920. It has twenty beds, and in every respect measures up to the best standard of modern hospital equipment and management. Doctor Moseley served several years as Henderson county health officer and physician, and is a member of the County, State and American Medical associations.

In 1902 Doctor Moseley married Miss Myra Louise Banks, daughter of the late David Banks. They have one daughter, Martha.

JAMES RANKIN BARRET looks back over the past with the calm view of a man of fourscore, whose years have been filled with useful labors to his community and with an ever widening influence for good. He has been a life-long resident of Henderson, a member of a family whose name has been synonymous with commercial success and dignity, and in his native community has found all those interests which satisfy the man of normal ambition.

He was born at Henderson December 16, 1841, a son of John Henry and Susan (Rankin) Barret. His grandfather, Peter Straughn Barret, was a Virginian and married a Pendleton of Virginia. John Henry Barret was born in Louisa County, Virginia, came to Kentucky about 1836, and married in Henderson. His wife, Susan Rankin, was born in Henderson County, where her father was a pioneer. She died when past fifty, the mother of three children, John H., James R. and Susan R. Susan was married to James E. Rankin. John Henry Barret on coming to Henderson engaged in the tobacco business, an industry with which the name has been closely identified through the past eighty years or more. For a time he was a dry goods merchant with his brother-in-law, Mr. Rankin, but then resumed the tobacco business with his brother, Alexander B., and after the latter's death continued with his sons and son-in-law under the firm name of John H. Barret & Company. John H. Barret died at the age of seventy-two, but his tobacco business was continued until a recent date by his son James R., who is the only survivor of the children.

James R. Barret was reared and educated at Henderson, and in addition to his association with the firm John H. Barret & Company he acquired extensive farm interests and was also identified with many local business enterprises, being one of the founders of the Henderson Cotton Mills. Again and again during the past fifty or sixty years he has assumed responsibilities in connection with some movement to advance the general prosperity of Henderson and vicinity, and is known as a citizen of rare public spirit and broad generosity. He is a democrat, a member of the Presbyterian Church and is affiliated with the Order of Elks.

Mr. Barret married in 1862 Lucy F. Stites. She died in 1902, after they had been married forty years. Her children are Henry P. and Susan B. The daughter is the wife of Dr. Samuel G. Gant and lives in New York City. In 1904 Mr. Barret married Ella B. Clore.

WILLIAM POLLITT MCCLAIN is a lawyer of more than forty years successful experience, and for the greater part of that time has enjoyed a conspicuous place at the Henderson County bar, where his abilities have been pronounced in the criminal branch of practice.

Mr. McClain was born in Henderson County, a son of William and Virginia (Pollitt) McClain. His grandparents were James and Ann (Butler) McClain. The McClains were originally Scotch, and this branch of the family descended from one of two brothers who settled first in Maryland and later in Ohio. James McClain, grandfather of the Henderson lawyer, was an early settler in Henderson County, and died there in 1832, when about forty years of age. His home was in the Horseshoe Bend locality of the county, where he accumulated a large property and was a wealthy planter and slave owner. His wife was a native of Henderson County. Their children were: Jackson, who was widely known as a wealthy farmer, slave owner and citizen and died at the age of seventy-six; James, who died when comparatively young; William; Martha, who was the wife of Francis E. Walker, at one time county clerk; Ann, wife of John Stanly, an extensive land owner; and Kate, who married Dick Atkinson, son of George Atkinson, one of the historic characters of Henderson.

William McClain, who was born in Henderson County in 1825 and died in the City of Henderson in 1885, was a successful farmer and before the war owned a large number of slaves. He was an ardent democrat in politics. His wife, Virginia Pollitt, was of French ancestry, and was born at Henderson, daughter of James and Betsie (Cabell) Pollitt. Betsie Cabell, who was a daughter of Col. Joseph Cabell, was married for her second husband to Lieut. Gov. Arch Dixon, who was successor of Henry Clay in the United States Senate. William McClain and wife were the parents of thirteen children, four of whom died in childhood.

William Pollitt McClain was well educated and had superior advantages both at home and in school. He received his A. B. degree in the classical course in 1869, and studied law in the University of Virginia, graduating LL. B. in 1876. He first qualified for practice at St. Louis, Missouri, practiced there a few months, and also for a brief time was a member of the bar of East St. Louis, Illinois. With those exceptions he has been a member of the Henderson bar for over forty years, and though he has devoted his time and talents to his profession served for about twenty years as county attorney. He is a democrat in politics.

In 1882 Mr. McClain married Miss Mary Garland, who was born and reared in Henderson. Her father, Dr. Richard Garland, came from Virginia and was widely known as an able physician in Kentucky.

JOHN W. CARTER. The man who has made a success of life and won the honor and esteem of his fellow citizens deserves more than passing notice. Such is the record, briefly stated, of John W. Carter, well known citizen of Lexington, and at present the Grand Keeper of Records and Seal of the Grand Lodge of Knights of Pythias of Kentucky, as well as secretary of the board of directors of the Pythian Home. By a life of persistent and well applied energy and commendable industry led along the most honorable lines, he has justly earned the right to specific mention in a work of the province of the one in hand, along with other progressive and public-spirited men of his state.

John W. Carter was born in Panola, Mississippi, on the 13th day of May, 1852, and is the son of John and Margaret (Finnegan) Carter. His paternal grandparents, Jesse and Sarah (Elder) Carter, were natives of Lincoln County, Kentucky, and both lived to past eighty years of age. They became the parents of ten children, four sons and six daughters, the father of John W. being the oldest, and nine of the children lived to attain mature years. Jesse Carter followed farming in Kentucky for many years, but later moved to Winslow, Indiana, where he also farmed and where he spent the remainder of his days. He was a Baptist in his religious faith. John Carter, the father, was born in Lincoln County, Kentucky, on November 3, 1827, and died on August 10, 1896, being survived a number of years by his widow, who was born in County Sligo, Ireland, on May 3, 1822, and died on August 26, 1917. They became the parents of six children, all sons, of whom John W. of this sketch is the only survivor. Four of the children died in infancy and George L. died at fifty years of age, leaving a widow and two children. John Carter spent his boyhood days on his father's farm and then learned the trade of wagonmaking. Later he located at Panola, Mississippi, where he remained for seven or eight years, moving from there to Owensboro, Kentucky, where he spent his last days. Politically, he was a democrat, while his religious affiliation was with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He was a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having been a past noble grand in the latter fraternity.

John W. Carter attended the public schools of Owensboro, Kentucky, graduating from the high school. His first employment was in a drug store, where he became an expert pharmacist, and he then engaged in the drug business on his own account in Owensboro, continuing in that line for eleven years. Following that, he engaged in the general insurance business, for a number of years, although during this period he also served as cashier of the Bank of Commerce at Owensboro for eight years. Altogether he was connected with the business interests in Owensboro for thirty-one years.

Mr. Carter's connection with fraternal affairs began in Owensboro on May 13, 1873, when he was made a member of Star Lodge No. 19, Knights of Pythias, and from that time on to the present he has been a most active and efficient worker in almost every position within the order, rising to the position of grand chancellor in 1888-9. From 1890 to 1896 he was chairman of the judiciary committee of the grand lodge and became supreme representative in 1892. He became a member of the Grand Tribunal of Kentucky in 1895, at its formation, and was at once elected chief tribune. He compiled the new constitution and statutes of the order in 1895, and in 1901 he was elected Grand Keeper of Records and Seal, in which position he at once demonstrated the fitness and wisdom of the choice and in which office he has been continued to the present time. In 1908 Mr. Carter moved to Lexington, having also become secretary to the board of directors of the Pythian Home, and he has since resided in that city.

Mr. Carter is a member of the Lexington Kiwanis Club and of the Board of Commerce. He is a member of Brothers Lodge No. 132, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Owensboro, of which he is a past noble grand. He is also a member of Phoenix Lodge No. 25 Knights of Pythias of Lexington. Politically, he is a warm supporter of the democratic party and has taken an active part in local public affairs. While living in Owensboro he served as city tax collector, was city auditor for eight years, and was a member of the Board of Education for four terms, or sixteen years, being elected each time without opposition. He is an earnest and active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

On June 16, 1875, Mr. Carter was married to Catherine Haney, who was born in Owensboro, Kentucky, on July 28, 1855, and who died in Lexington on December 29, 1916. She was the daughter of William and Maria (McKay) Haney, the father a native of Pennsylvania and the mother of Kentucky. They became the parents of seven children, all of whom are deceased, excepting Mrs. J. N. Parrish who now resides in Florida. To Mr. and Mrs. Carter have been born five children, namely: Charles V., who married Helen Watkins, and they have two children, Elizabeth T. and Charles C.; Margaret C., the wife of R. S. Crowder; Maria Louise, the wife of John C. Harrison, to which union has been born two daughters, Catherine C. and Louise W.; Nancy McKay; John W., Jr. The latter was born on February 9, 1898, and received his education in the public schools of Owensboro and Lexington, after which he entered Millersburg Military Institute. On June 24, 1916, he enlisted in the United States Signal Corps, with which he served on the Mexican border up to March 27, 1917, when he was detailed for duty at various points in Kentucky. On August 5, 1917, he enlisted at Lexington for service in the World war, being first sent to Camp Stanley, and later to Camp Shelby, at Hattiesburg, Mississippi. While there he was transferred to the headquarters company of the One Hundred and Thirteenth Signal Battalion, and on November 10, 1917, he was promoted to the rank of color sergeant. On October 5, 1918, he was ordered overseas and arrived at Cherbourg, France. He immediately went forward to the battle lines, where he remained until the signing of the armistice. He was then transferred to Company C of the Three Hundred and Twenty-third Field Signal Battalion and, with his command, returned to the United States on May 3, 1919, receiving his honorable discharge from the service at Camp Taylor, Kentucky, on May 22, 1919. He is now engaged in the newspaper business in Lexington. He is a member of the American Legion and of the Knights of Pythias.

WOODFORD GAINES DUNLAP. In such men as Woodford G. Dunlap, a member of the Board of City Commissioners of Lexington, there is peculiar satisfaction in offering their life histories—justification for the compilation of works of this character—not that their lives have been such as to gain them particularly wide notoriety or the admiring plaudits of men, but that they have been true to the trusts reposed in them and have shown such attributes of character as entitle them to the regard of all.

Woodford Gaines Dunlap was born at Lancaster, Garrard County, Kentucky, on the 26th day of March, 1860, and is a son of George W. and Nancy Elizabeth (Jennings) Dunlap. George W. Dunlap was born on February 22, 1813, in Fayette County, Kentucky, and died on June 6, 1880. After completing his studies in the common schools in 1834, he entered old Kentucky University, now Transylvania University, where he completed his law studies and was admitted to the bar in 1838. He entered upon the practice of his profession at Lancaster, Kentucky, and was a prominent member of the bar there up to the time of his death. He also became a prominent leader in the public and political life of his section of the state, and in 1853 he was elected a member of the State Legislature. He was a strong adherent of the old whig party, of which he was several times a presidential elector. In 1856 he was identified with the Native American party. On May 27, 1861, he was a member of the Border State Convention, which met at Frankfort, and in the fall of that year he was elected to the United States Congress, serving during 1862-3. In 1877 Mr. Dunlap was solicited to run for the nomination for governor of Kentucky, but declined to permit his name to go before the convention. He was eminently successful in the practice of law and served as a master commissioner for a number of years. He was attorney for the National Bank of Lancaster up to the time of his death and for many years was attorney for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. He was an attendant of the Christian Church, of which he was a liberal supporter, as he was of every worthy benevolent and charitable object. He possessed a charming home in Lancaster, his residence being surrounded by twenty-seven acres of grounds, which were tastefully ornamented with trees, shrubbery and flowers, and in his home he entertained many noted persons of his day.

On May 28, 1839, George W. Dunlap was married to Nancy Elizabeth Jennings, who was born in Garrard County, Kentucky, on November 11, 1817, and who died on March 19, 1889. She was a granddaughter of Col. William Jennings, of Revolutionary fame. To George and Nancy Dunlap were born eleven children, of whom three are now living, namely: Mary D., the wife of George Denny; Rev. George W., a minister of the Episcopal Church at Escondido, California; and Woodford G., the subject of this sketch, who is the eighth child in order of birth in the family. Five of the children died in infancy and one at the age of eleven years, while five lived to manhood and womanhood and all of whom married and had children. One who knew George W. Dunlap intimately wrote as follows: "It may be truthfully said of him that he filled with signal ability every station to which he was called by his fellow citizens; and whether in the temple of justice, upon the stump or in halls of legislation his voice was chaste, eloquent and effective in behalf of what he believed to be the best interests of his country and those he was chosen to represent. He was a faithful friend, a safe counsellor and a public benefactor. His elegant home was open to all and his boundless hospitality was proverbial throughout central Kentucky." Henry Clay was a guest at his wedding.

Woodford G. Dunlap attended the public schools and completed his scholastic training in Centre College, where he graduated with the class of 1879. At the age of twenty years he engaged in the newspaper business, running the Lancaster Enterprise, a weekly paper, for about two years. In 1882 he located in Chicago and became a member of the printing firm of Cushing, Thomas & Company, but two years later he sold his interest in the business and returned to Lancaster. He was appointed a United States internal revenue gauger for the Eighth District, with headquarters at Lancaster, filling that position up to 1885, when he became traveling correspondent for the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, with Kentucky as his territory. He performed effective work in this line until 1889, when he was appointed United States internal revenue agent, a position which he filled until 1893. He then located in Lexington and engaged in the practice of law, which commanded his attention until 1905, when he became general manager for the William Tarr Distillery. On January 11, 1909, Mr. Dunlap was made vice president and general manager of the James E. Pepper & Company Distillery, a position which he filled up to December 31, 1916. In November, 1917, Mr. Dunlap made the race for city commissioner of Lexington. On the face of the returns he was defeated by eighty-seven votes, but he started contest proceedings in the Fayette Circuit Court, in which he was sustained. The opposition carried the case to the Court of Appeals, which unanimously sustained the prior decision of Judge Charles H. Kerr in the Circuit Court. Mr. Dunlap took his seat as a city commissioner on June 10, 1918, and he was assigned to the department of public property. On November 4, 1919, he was re-elected city commissioner, receiving 700 more votes than had ever been given to a candidate for that office.

Politically Mr. Dunlap is an earnest supporter of the republican party, in the campaigns of which he has been an active worker. Fraternally he is a member of Lexington Lodge No. 89, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, of which he is past exalted ruler, and of the Loyal Order of Moose, of which he is a past dictator.

On October 26, 1880, Mr. Dunlap was married to Ella B. Landram, who was born and reared in Lancaster, Kentucky, and whose death occurred on April 3, 1903. To this union were born four children, two of whom died in infancy, those who grew to maturity being, Eugenia, the wife of C. L. Williamson, a lawyer in Lexington, and Woodford George, who died in Chicago in 1909, at the age of twenty-four years. The last named had received a good education in the public schools of Lexington and in Transylvania University. For his second wife Mr. Dunlap was married to Pearl Augusta White on July 27, 1908, and to them have been born four sons, Edward G., Joseph Wolf, John Jennings and Hendricks Moore. Strong and forceful in his relations with his fellow men, Mr. Dunlap has gained the good will and commendation of both his associates and the general public, enjoying a high reputation among men for integrity and high character. Pre-eminent among his qualities is that sound judgment which is ordinarily called common sense, his good judgment extending to men as well as to measures, and he enjoys a well merited popularity throughout the community honored by his citizenship.

ARTHUR BOWER JARVIS. For many years Henderson has been one of the primary centers of the tobacco industry in America, and the local citizenship has always contained some men of international connections and associations with the tobacco trade.

Mr. Jarvis was born in a suburb of Liverpool, England, June 3, 1865, a son of Harry and Amelia (Bower) Jarvis. His father was Welsh and his mother of English lineage, and they had four sons and three daughters.

Arthur B. Jarvis acquired his education in the schools of Liverpool, England. His father, who died December 17, 1920, for many years had been an importer of tobacco, with headquarters at Liverpool, and was connected with the tobacco business for over sixty-five years. His business career was spent with one of the oldest and best known tobacco importing firms of Liverpool. The son after getting his education served an apprenticeship of four years with the same firm, and was then sent to the United States for further experience. He set sail April 5, 1885, and for the greater part of two tobacco seasons was in Clarksville, Tennessee. He then returned to England, but soon afterward was sent out to Lynchburg, Virginia, where he remained one tobacco season and then went home.

Mr. Jarvis was commissioned to come to Henderson, Kentucky, in January, 1888, where he was the local representative and agent of some English tobacco importers until 1891. The following four years he was an active associate with Edwin Hodge, under the firm name of Hodge & Jarvis, as buyers, rehandlers and exporters of tobacco. Since 1895 Mr. Jarvis has been in the business largely on his own account. He has factories in Henderson, Mayfield, Madisonville, Kuttawa and Marion, Kentucky, for handling and packing both strip and leaf tobacco, air drying and special artificial drying, conditioning, ageing and sweetening processes.

While always very busy with his private interests, Mr. Jarvis has found time to take an interest in public affairs. He has served as a member of the Henderson City Council and a member of the City Board of Education. For a number of years he has been a member of the Board of Directors of the Henderson National Bank.

In July, 1891, he married Minerva Bingham French, daughter of the late William E. French, a prominent merchant and citizen of Evansville, Indiana.

Mr. Jarvis completed his naturalization as an American citizen in 1904. He is a brother of the late Harry Sheldon Jarvis, who came to the United States in 1888.

The brothers were associated in the tobacco business for a number of years, until the death of Harry Jarvis on December 17, 1901. He was a very popular citizen of Henderson, and his death was a heavy loss to the community.

WILLIAM F. HICKEY, division superintendent of the South Covington and Cincinnati Street Railway Company, is one of the oldest men in the service of that transportation organization, having joined it about the time electric power was first generally applied to the operation of street railways in the United States.

Mr. Hickey was born at Warsaw, Gallatin County, Kentucky, June 2, 1869. His grandfather, Ed Hickey, was a native of County Tipperary, Ireland, and in 1842 brought his family to the United States and settled at Baltimore, Maryland, where he lived out his life. His son, Edward J. Hickey, was born in County Tipperary in 1836, was six years of age when brought to America, and lived in Baltimore until he was nineteen, when he accompanied his widowed mother to Cincinnati, where she had her home the rest of her life. At Cincinnati Edward J. Hickey entered the employ of the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad Company. Leaving this road in 1862, during Civil war times, he became wharf master at Warsaw, Kentucky, and after 1874 lived on a farm and was an agriculturist at New Liberty, Kentucky, where he died February 13, 1911. He was a democrat and a member of the Catholic Church. His wife was Mary Ann Ryan, who was born in County Tipperary in 1836 and died at New Liberty in 1904. Her father, Thomas Ryan, brought his family to America in 1844, located at Syracuse, New York, and while he had been a blacksmith in Ireland in this country he followed the trade of stationary engineer. In 1860 he moved to Cincinnati and in 1872 to Warsaw, Kentucky, where he died in 1873, when past eighty. His wife was Ellen Hall, a native of Ireland, who died at Cincinnati. The children of Edward J. Hickey and wife are briefly noted as follows: Alice, who became the wife of Thomas Flynn for twenty years a farmer at Crittenden, Kentucky, and both died at Dayton, Ohio; Thomas, a farmer who died at New Liberty at the age of thirty-seven; Ella, of Covington, widow of W. A. Plunkett, who was a farmer at New Liberty; Miss Mollie, of Covington; William F.; Ed J. a farmer at Ghent, Kentucky; R. J. Hickey, a farmer at Warsaw; J. M. a school janitor at Covington; James, a commission broker in Chicago; Gus and Daniel A., partners in a men's furnishing business at Canton, Ohio; and D. L. Hickey a Covington dentist.

William F. Hickey attended the public schools at New Liberty until he was eighteen, and then for a year or two followed farming in that locality. Coming to Covington in 1889, he was first identified with the transportation business as a motorman for the South Covington and Cincinnati Street Railway Company. He has been in the service of that one corporation now for over thirty years. In August, 1903, he was advanced to the post of inspector, and is a past master of every detail of the operating service, which in his time has been greatly expanded and improved. He has held his post as division superintendent since September 9, 1908, his offices being at 20th Street and Madison Avenue.

Mr. Hickey is a democrat, a Catholic, and one of Covington's popular and public spirited citizens. He was ready for every service that he could render to the cause of the Government during the World war. Mr. Hickey and family reside at 1922 Garrard Street. In 1889, the year he came to Covington, he married in this city Miss Katherine Dunlap, daughter of Robert and Katherine (Ryan) Dunlap, now deceased. Her father was a steamfitter. Mrs. Hickey died February 6, 1912, the mother of five children. The oldest is Bennett, a traveling salesman for the Western Electric Company, living at Chicago. Miss Ella May died in July, 1920.

Thomas, now train dispatcher for the Louisville & Nashville at Covington, enlisted May 20, 1917, and after six weeks of training at Washington went overseas to France with the Thirteenth Engineers Corps. He was with that notable unit of the Engineers until the close of the war, participating in the Argonne campaign and was mustered out in Camp Taylor. The fourth child, W. F. Hickey, lives at Covington and during the war was in the Officers Training Camp at the University of Cincinnati. Katherine is the wife of William Berkemeyer, a resident of Oakley, Cincinnati, Mr. Berkemeyer being purchasing agent for the Incandescent Stove & Light Company at Oakley. On February 26, 1913, at Covington, Mr. Hickey married Miss Ida B. May, daughter of J. W. and Theodosia (O'Neal) May, residents of Worthville, Kentucky, where her father is a merchant. Mrs. Hickey is a graduate of the schools of Worthville. To their marriage has been born one daughter, Jane Frances, on December 28, 1917.

STEPHENS L. BLAKELY, commonwealth attorney for Kenton County is a native of Covington and enjoys a high standing as a lawyer gained by fifteen years of active experience.

Mr. Blakely was born at Covington April 23, 1878. The Blakelys are a family that came from Lancashire, England, to America in Colonial times. His grandfather, James Blakely was a native of Virginia, was a farmer and planter in that state most of his life, but died at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in 1882. His wife, Susan Smyth, was a native of Maryland and also died in Pittsburgh. L. J. Blakely, father of Stephens L., was born in Virginia, March 4, 1844, and was graduated in law from Georgetown University in the District of Columbia. In 1870 he moved to Covington, and for thirty years was one of the leading members of this bar and also found time to devote to the literary profession and did much work as an editorial and magazine writer. At one time he was president of the City Council of Covington and was also city solicitor. L. J. Blakely, who died at Covington January 27, 1917, was a democrat, a member of the Catholic Church, and had a record as a Confederate soldier during the Civil war. He married Lillie Lendrum, who was born at Covington September 13, 1853, and is still living in that city. Stephens L. is their oldest child. Paul L. Blakely is a Catholic priest and is editor of the magazine "America" at New York City. Elizabeth Ashton is a sister in Mount De Chantal Convent near Wheeling, West Virginia. Susan Haughton is a sister in Cardone Convent at Georgetown, Kentucky. Mary Louise lives at Chicago where her husband, Louis Baldwin, is connected with the Standard Oil Company. Laurie, the youngest of the family, a resident of Covington and an employee of the Fleischman Yeast Company, was at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station at Chicago during the World war. He married Frances Shouse, daughter of Leonard Shouse of Lexington.

Stephens L. Blakely received his early education in parochial schools at Covington, and in 1898 graduated A. B. from St. Xavier's College at Cincinnati. He finished the law course and received the LL. B. degree in 1906 from the McDonald Institute of Cincinnati, and in the same year was admitted to the bar and began his practice at Covington, which has brought him a large clientage in both civil and criminal branches. Mr. Blakely was city solicitor of Covington during 1912-13. He became commonwealth's attorney in January, 1916, and his six year term has covered the war period, in which his office was burdened with especially heavy responsibilities. He has a beautiful home at Beachwood, his home being surrounded with eleven acres of well kept grounds. In 1918, leaving his practice and official duties, he enlisted in the Field Artillery, and was mustered out with an honorable discharge in December.

June 28, 1906, at Covington, he married Miss Jane Piatt, daughter of Edward Courtney and Sarah (Richardson) Piatt, the latter still living at Covington. They have four children: Stephens Buckner, born July 14, 1907; Edward Courtney, who died in 1917, at the age of nine years; Jane Ashton, born December 20, 1911; and John Ruffner, born in 1913.

REV. HERBERT F. HILLENMEYER, who since 1915 has been secretary and chancellor of the Diocese of Covington, was ordained in 1902, and all his work and activities as an official representative of the Catholic Church have been performed in his native state of Kentucky.

Chancellor Hillenmeyer is a member of a distinguished family of Fayette County, Kentucky, where he was born August 9, 1878. The name Hillenmeyer in a business way has for several generations been closely identified with landscape gardening, the propagation of nursery stock, and farming activities in the Blue Grass region. Father Hillenmeyer's grandfather was Francis X. Hillenmeyer, who was born in Alsace, France, in 1815. He learned the profession of landscape gardening, and on coming to America settled at Savannah, Georgia, but in the early forties moved to Fayette County, Kentucky, where he established and developed a nursery business whose status acquired favor and wide distribution over the entire state. He died in Fayette County in 1893. The wife of this pioneer was Mary Hahn, also a native of Alsace, who died in Fayette County. Their son, H. F. Hillenmeyer, now living at Lexington, was born near that city in 1849, and has continued the profession and business of his father all his life. He is regarded as an authority on fruit trees and horticulture in general, and a large part of the planting stock for the foundation of orchards throughout Kentucky has come from the Hillenmeyer Nursery. He was well educated, finishing his school work in St. Mary's College in Marion County. H. F. Hillenmeyer, Sr., married Mary Ossenbeck, who was born at Cincinnati in 1857. Of their children Father Hillenmeyer is the oldest. Ernest B. is a farmer in Fayette County, Ray Joseph is in the clothing business at Lexington, Maysie is the wife of E. T. Houlihan, Jr., of Lexington, and Louis and Walter are both partners in the nursery business in Fayette County.

Rev. Herbert F. Hillenmeyer spent his early boyhood at his father's country home near Lexington and attended the common schools. Six years were devoted to his classical studies in Assumption College at Sandwich, Ontario, and five years in the philosophy and theology course at Mount St. Mary's Seminary, Cincinnati. Father Hillenmeyer was ordained July 19, 1902, at St. Mary's Cathedral in Covington. Rt. Rev. Bishop P. J. O'Reilly Auxiliary Bishop of Peoria, Illinois, officiating at the ceremony. Then from 1902 to 1909 he was assistant pastor of St. Mary's Cathedral, while from June, 1909, to December, 1915, he was pastor of St. Joseph's Church at Winchester. At the latter date he was appointed to his present official duties as secretary and chancellor of the diocese of Covington, his official residence being at 1140 Madison Avenue.

GEORGE H. HEUER is a well known Covington manufacturer, and has called that city his home all his life. For a number of years he was a traveling salesman for wire goods, and later established a business of his own known as the Heuer Wire Works, one of the largest industries of its kind in the state.

Mr. Heuer was born at Covington September 18, 1873. His grandfather Heuer was born in Hanover, Germany, in 1810 and came to the United States about 1859, locating at Covington, where he lived until his death in 1884. His son, Henry Heuer, was born in Hanover in 1837, was reared and married in his native country, and soon afterward, about 1859, came to the United States and located at Covington, where until 1886 he was an employe in flouring mills. In the latter year he established a grocery store at the corner of Short Street and Hermes Avenue in Covington, and for twelve years had most of the trade in that section of the city. He retired with a competency about 1899, two years before his death, which occurred in 1900. He was a democrat and a Catholic. Henry Heuer married Elizabeth Heile, who was born in Hanover in 1835 and died at Covington in 1892. They had six children: Elizabeth, a resident of Bromley, Kenton County, widow of Fred Middendorf, a cigar maker at Covington; Minnie, the wife of Henry Umthun, with home at Covington, his employment being with the Heekin Can Company of Cincinnati; Henry, a salesman living at Columbus, Ohio; George H.; Theodore, who became noted for his attainments in theatrical circles and who died at the early age of thirty-one in New York City; and Joseph who died at Covington at the age of twenty-seven.

George H. Heuer attended the Covington parochial schools only until he was thirteen, and since then has been making his own way in the world. For one year he worked for the Hemingray Glass Company at Covington, following which he became an employe in the Fred J. Meyers Wire Works at Covington. The following four years he acquired a thorough technical knowledge of nearly all the departments of wire goods manufacture, and except for three years of official service his interests have been in the same line ever since. As a salesman he traveled over all the South, East and West sections of the United States selling wire goods. In 1912 he established the Heuer Wire Works at Sixteenth and May streets. This is an industry whose output consists of window guards, office and bank railings, wire partitions, wire baskets, wire fencing and many miscellaneous wire goods, and these products have an extensive demand and are shipped all over Kentucky, West Virginia, Virginia and other states.

For three years, by appointment of the Bridge Commissioner, Mr. Heuer was collector at the Covington and Newport bridge. He is a democrat in politics, a member of the Catholic Church and during the World war gave with unstinted liberality both means and effort to insure the success of all the war drives in the city. He has prospered in business, and is the owner of his factory and of a modern home at Short Street and Hermes Avenue, and also a dwelling at 1518 St. Clair Street.

In 1896, at Covington, Mr. Heuer married Elizabeth Kolbeck, daughter of Henry and Theressa (Kolbeck) Kolbeck. Her parents, who were not related before marriage, live at Covington, her father being a cigar maker. Mr. and Mrs. Heuer have one son, George H., Jr., born October 10, 1900, and assisting his father in business. He reached his eighteenth birthday just a few weeks before the close of the war and registered for service.

WILLIAM G. RINEY. In agricultural affairs, in business circles and in public life the name of William G. Riney is well known to his fellow-citizens in Daviess County and particularly in the community of West Louisville, where his activities have been centered. In each of his three fields of endeavor Mr. Riney has fully and capably discharged the duties devolving upon him, and the confidence and esteem in which he is generally held are but a part of the reward that comes from well-sustained and carefully directed effort.

Mr. Riney was born on his father's farm near West Louisville, Daviess County, March 13, 1867, a son of William Ray and Harriet Frances (O'Brian) Riney, both of Irish lineage, the former born at Springfield and the latter at Bardstown, Kentucky. The parents were married in Nelson County and in 1863 settled in Daviess County, where they spent the rest of their lives in agricultural pursuits, the mother dying in 1887, at the age of sixty years, and the father passing away in 1899 when seventy-five years of age. They were Catholics in religious faith. Both Mr. and Mrs. Riney were married twice. Mr. Riney's first wife, a Miss Livers, bore him three children, while Mrs. Riney's first husband was James Stuart and they had two children. Mr. and Mrs. Riney had seven children, William G. being the fifth in order of birth.

William G. Riney was educated in the rural schools and reared on the home place, and when he entered upon his career it was as an agriculturist. For the first ten years after his marriage he farmed and resided near Sorgho, and then purchased the parental homestead, where he has one of the finest frame farm residences in the county. He has other business interests, having been an extensive buyer of hogs and other live stock, identified with the Farmers Loose Leaf Tobacco Company of Owensboro, and president of the Farmers Bank of West Louisville.

Mr. Riney is a member of the Daviess County Farm Bureau Association and of the Owensboro Chamber of Commerce. He is a democrat in his political allegiance and has served eight years in the capacity of magistrate, while at the present time he is acting capably as a member of the Daviess County Board of Commissioners. His fraternal connection is with the Knights of Columbus. In 1894 Mr. Riney was united in marriage with Miss Susan Thompson, who was born in Daviess County, daughter of Samuel Thompson, and to this union there have been born eight children. Mr. and Mrs. Riney and their children are members of the Catholic Church.

JEROME S. HALE is the fortunate owner of Fair View Farm, ten miles south of the City of Lexington, on the Richmond Turnpike, and his abiding appreciation of the attractions and resources of his native county is clearly shown in the care which he has given in maintaining his fine farm at the highest standard, even as he delights in making the pleasant home a demonstration of the fact that the generous and gracious hospitality for which the South has ever been noted is still in evidence. Mr. Hale traces his lineage to distinguished English and American ancestry, and of the family one of the most celebrated in Great Britain was Matthew Hale, Lord Chief Justice of England, the name Matthew having been retained by each successive generation of the family in America as a tribute to this distinguished ancestor.

On a farm not far distant from his present home in Fayette County Jerome Stone Hale was born on the 2d of August, 1862. He is a son of Abram R. and Martha A. (Evans) Hale, the latter a daughter of Peter Evans, who was one of the sterling citizens and successful farmers of Fayette County. Abram R. Hale was likewise born in Fayette County and was a son of Matthew Hale, who was born in Fleming County, this state, and who was a youth at the time of the family removal to Fayette County, where he passed the remainder of his life. He was one of the venerable and honored citizens of Lexington at the time of his death. Abram R. Hale gained his early education in the schools of Fayette County, and as a youth became a clerk in one of the leading mercantile establishments in the City of Lexington. There he eventually became associated with his brother Garland B. in opening a well equipped dry-goods store about the year 1845. For several years thereafter the business was conducted under the firm name of G. B. & A. R. Hale, and the fraternal and partnership alliance continued until Abram R. met a tragic death, as the result of injuries received when he fell through a trap door in the firm's store on West Main Street. He was about forty-five years old at the time, and it was not until two months later that his posthumous son, Jerome S., of this sketch, was born. After the death of her husband Mrs. Hale sold his interest in the mercantile establishment and returned to the vicinity of her parents' home. She purchased the old Hale farm, and there she reared her children, it having been on this farm that the son Jerome S. was born. Later Mrs. Hale resided on the Isaac P. Shelby farm, and there she died at the age of sixty-seven years. Evans, the eldest of her children, was a resident of Hamilton, Ohio, at the time of his death, when sixty-eight years of age. Garland remained a bachelor until his death, August 12, 1912, at the age of sixty-one years and he had been up to that time associated with his brother Jerome S., likewise a bachelor, in progressive farm enterprise. Abram, Jr., the third son, was a resident of Fayette County during his entire life, except for a period of two years passed in Oklahoma, and he was fifty-six years of age at the time of his death. His widow, as will be more specifically noted in a later paragraph, presides over the domestic economies and social activities of the home of her husband's youngest brother, to whom this sketch is dedicated. Frank, the fourth son, is a prosperous farmer residing not far distant from the home of his brother Jerome. Emma, the only daughter, was sixteen years of age at the time of her death. Jerome S., as may be inferred, is the youngest of the children.

Jerome S. Hale is indebted to the schools of Fayette County for his youthful education, and in his independent career he was most graciously associated with his brother Garland in farm industry until the death of the brother, as recorded in the preceding paragraph. It was about the year 1908 that the brothers became associated in purchasing the farm of 164 acres that is still under the active ownership and management of the surviving brother. The two had for nine years conducted operations on about 500 acres of the Shelby estate, but since 1908 Jerome S. has confined his activities to his home place, upon which evidences of thrift and good management are everywhere to be seen. The house is commodious and is always kept in the best of repair, as are all other buildings on the place, and fences and other minor accessories never show any semblance of neglect. Mr. Hale has revitalized the normally fertile soil through scientific methods and progressive policies, and he has made his farm one of the model places of his native county. He and his brother Garland maintained the closest and most gracious of fraternal companionship until the ties were severed by the death of the latter, and in their business affairs their alliance was likewise inseparable. For a number of years they raised and trained standard-bred horses, and though they had no ambition for reputation in turf circles they raised a number of fine trotting horses that were sold at handsome prices. The Hale farm is given over to well diversified agriculture and to the raising of cattle and other livestock. Mr. Hale is a staunch democrat and takes loyal interest in public affairs, especially in his home community and native county. The fine old house on his farm was erected in the '50s by Dr. Joseph Marshall, a cousin of Mr. Hale, the Doctor having finally removed to Illinois, in which state he passed the remainder of his life. The popular chatelain of Mr. Hale's pleasant home is the widow of his brother Abram. Her maiden name was Annie Cassell and she was born and reared in Fayette County. Her father, George Cassell, was assisting the sheriff of this county in the pursuit of two escaped convicts in 1884, and when the criminals were surrounded in the field to which they had fled they opened fire on their pursuers and in the fusillade killed Mr. Cassell, who was then fifty-two years of age and who had served as a soldier of the Confederacy, in the command of Gen. John Morgan. While with the troops of this famed Confederate raider Mr. Cassell was captured by the enemy, by whom he was held a prisoner of war at Camp Douglas in the City of Chicago until the close of the war. His daughter Annie was born while he was thus held in captivity, and after the war he returned to Fayette County, where he remained until his tragic death. Mrs. Abram Hale has four sons—Garland B., Abram Rhodes, George Cassell and Ephraim Simmons,—all of whom reside at Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. Mrs. Hale has been housekeeper for her brother-in-law since 1915, and she has a wide circle of friends in her native county.

HENRY SCOTT BERRY, a prominent and successful farmer, leading business man and influential and public-spirited citizen of Daviess County, residing just west of Owensboro, has passed his entire life in this community, where he has built up and maintained a reputation for integrity in business affairs and dependability in citizenship. He is a native son of Daviess County and was born on his father's farm March 11, 1864, his parents being Edward C. and Sallie A. (Hagan) Berry.

An interesting history surrounds the name of Berry and the family has played no inconsiderable part in civic and military life. John B. Berry, the grandfather of Henry S. Berry, was born in Maryland and as a young man came to Kentucky and settled in Nelson County, where he became a prominent and successful farmer. After the Mexican war he bought three farms in Daviess County to the west of the City of Owensboro, and on these properties his sons Edward C., Jerre I. and William L. Berry located, subsequently becoming farmers and prominent citizens of the county in their day. John B. Berry and his wife, whose name was Ann Hagan before marriage, had five sons, Edward C., Nicholas T., Jerre I., William L. and Robert M., and three daughters: Ann, who married Jerre Hagan, of Nelson County; Mary E., who married Melvin Buckley; and Fannie, who married Judge Thomas McIlvoy. John B. Berry never lived in Daviess County, but passed the greater part of his long and useful life in Nelson County. The Berry family is descended from ancestors who were numbered among Lord Baltimore's colonists of Baltimore, and is of English lineage.

Edward C. Berry was born in Nelson County, Kentucky, March 22, 1823, and in 1848 located on the farm which had been bought by his father for him. In 1868 he established the E. C. Berry whiskey distillery on the bank of the Ohio River, about three miles west of Owensboro, which he operated until his death in 1877, the same being afterward sold in the settling up of his estate. From 1868 to 1876 he resided near his distillery, and continued his farming interests even while in the distilling business, and his endeavors in life were rewarded with consistent and gratifying success. Beyond serving several years as a magistrate he never held public office, but all times was a progressive citizen and a prominent promoter of the interests of the county, including the Daviess County Agricultural Fair, which was an institution of great importance and interest during the early days. He was a democrat in politics and very strongly in favor of the cause of the Southern Confederacy. He was a life-long Catholic and died firm in that faith September 14, 1877, at the present home of his son, on the Berry Road just west of the city limits of Owensboro, this farm having been purchased by him in 1876. Mr. Berry was married December 31, 1850, to Sallie A. Hagan, who was born near St. Mary's, Kentucky, September 14, 1834, and survived her husband many years, dying January 6, 1914. They had seven children who grew to maturity and six of them are still living, all being reared in the faith of the Catholic Church. At the outbreak of the Mexican war Edward C. Berry raised for that struggle a company at Lebanon, Kentucky, of which Edward Graves was made captain, Mr. Berry being made second lieutenant and later advanced to first lieutenant. He served gallantly during that war and returned to Daviess County, where he was equally faithful and courageous in the discharge of the duties of citizenship during his later years.

Henry Scott Berry was reared on his father's farm and educated in the public schools of Owensboro and at St. Mary's College. Farming has been his occupation in the main, although he has been and is connected with various other business interests, at this time being president of the Owensboro Forging Company, president of the Daviess County Farm Bureau and vice president of the Kentucky State Farm Bureau. For several years he was president of the Green River Tobacco Association. Mr. Berry was married July 9, 1901, to Miss Bessie Ewing, a daughter of the late Samuel Ridley Ewing of Daviess County. Mr. and Mrs. Berry are the parents of two daughters: Elizabeth and Sallie May, both residing at home. The family belongs to the Catholic faith and are communicants of St. Stephen's Church of that denomination at Owensboro.

SAMUEL B. VANCE was in many respects one of Kentucky's leading lawyers during the last half of the nineteenth century, a man whose intellect and substantial attributes of character were widely esteemed not only in this state but in Indiana, where he practiced for some years.

He was born in 1829 and died in 1901. A native of Tennessee, he was left an orphan and from early manhood lived at Henderson. He was a graduate of law of Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tennessee, and began practice at Henderson in 1853. His first associate in the law was Archibald Dixon, and later he had as partners John W. Crockett, Ben P. Cissell, John Young Brown and Montgomery Merritt, men of great ability who appreciated his own singularly good qualities. In the meantime two of his sons were growing up and were preparing themselves for legal careers, and in 1879 the firm became S. B. and R. D. Vance, consisting of the senior Samuel B. Vance and his two sons, Robert D. and Samuel B., Jr. In 1880 Samuel B. Vance, father and son, moved to Evansville, Indiana, and were active members of the bar of that city until the death of the son. In 1890 the elder Vance returned to Henderson and for a decade continued the work of his profession as a member of the firm S. B. and R. D. Vance.

During his residence at Evansville he was democratic candidate for presidential elector in 1888, and led his ticket as to votes cast. After returning to Kentucky he was elected in 1893 a member of the Legislature. His service in the Legislature is distinguished by the authorship of the "Husband and Wife Bill" sometimes erroneously called the "Weisinger Act," with which Senator Weisinger had nothing to do except vote for it in the Senate. This bill was enacted March 15, 1894. One of the two pens with which the Governor signed the bill is now possessed by Mr. Robert D. Vance, while the other was given to Mr. Beckner, who so ardently supported the bill in the House.

Mr. Vance was an active Presbyterian and for many years served as elder of the First Presbyterian Church at Henderson. He was affiliated with the Masonic fraternity.

In his twenty-fourth year, at Henderson, he married Miss Nannie Dixon, daughter of Robert and Mary Ann Dixon. She was a devoted wife and mother, a woman of exceptional force of character, and died in 1903. Her five children were Cordelia, Robert D., Mary V., Samuel B. and Andrew C., all of whom are still living except Samuel.

ROBERT D. VANCE. Since 1853, when the late Samuel B. Vance began practice at Henderson, the family name has been continuously associated in that city with some of the best qualifications and abilities of the legal profession. Robert D. Vance is a son of Samuel B. Vance, and he has given over forty years to the law in his native city.

He was born at Henderson April 20, 1857, and grew up in the home of a successful lawyer and from early youth was inspired with high ideals. He acquired a high school education, also was a student under Prof. Morris Kirby and read law under his father. He was admitted to the bar in 1879, and for many years was in practice with his father under the name S. B. and R. D. Vance. He was also an associate in practice for a time with John Brown Young and also with the late John F. Lockett. Since 1906 Mr. Vance has been a member of the law firm Vance and Heilbronner.

During the early years of his career Mr. Vance took an active part in politics as a democrat, and in 1888 was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention at St. Louis. For many years, however, the law has received his almost undivided attention, and he has achieved much of the success that is the chief reward of the legal profession. He has practiced in all the State and Federal courts.

On October 31, 1888, Mr. Vance married Miss Annie Beatty, who was born at Henderson, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. I. Beatty. To their marriage were born two daughters, Susanna, now deceased, and Cordelia. Susanna was the wife of Thomas J. Johnson, who graduated from West Point Military Academy, was an officer in the United States forces in the Philippines, later was at Camp Pike, Arkansas, with the rank of major, and in April, 1917, went overseas as lieutenant-colonel in the regular army. He was with the Expeditionary Forces nearly eighteen months, until the signing of the armistice, and is still an officer in the regular army. Cordelia, the only surviving daughter, is the wife of William D. Lambert, a Henderson merchant.

SAMUEL BROWN BERRY. Just east of Stanley in Daviess County is found the modern, highly improved and well developed farm of Samuel Brown Berry, one of the successful agriculturists and well-to-do citizens of this locality. Mr. Berry has been a life-long resident of Daviess County, where he has worked out a well-merited success, and at this time his property consists of 380 acres of valuable land.

Mr. Berry was born on his father's farm in Daviess County June 10, 1860, a son of William L. and Elizabeth A. (Brown) Berry. The Berry family is of English origin and the original American settlers of the name formed a part of Lord Baltimore's party in Maryland. The family has played no small part in the military and civil history of the country and has contributed men of strength and worth to various important positions. John B. Berry, the grandfather of Samuel B. Berry, was born in Maryland and as a young man came to Kentucky and settled in Nelson County, where he became a prominent and successful farmer. After the Mexican war he bought three farms in Daviess County, to the west of the City of Owensboro, and on these properties his sons Edward C., Jerre I. and William L. Berry located, subsequently becoming farmers and prominent citizens of the county in their day. John B. Berry married Ann Hagan, and they became the parents of five sons and three daughters: Edward C., Nicholas T., Jerre I., William L., Robert M.; and Ann, who married Jerre Hagan, of Nelson County; Mary E., who married Melvin Buckley; and Fannie who married Judge Thomas McIlvoy.

William L. Berry was born in Nelson County, Kentucky, and was the recipient of one of the farms purchased by his father following the close of the Mexican war. There he engaged in agricultural pursuits, and some time later also engaged in the distilling business, conducting a distillery in Daviess County and operating his farm until his early death, at the age of forty-four years, in 1873. His wife had passed away in 1863, when only thirty-four years of age. They were the parents of three children: Ida, who is deceased; Samuel Brown; and Robert L., now deceased.

Samuel B. Berry was given a public school education in the rural districts of Daviess County and was reared on the home farm. His father died when he was only thirteen years of age, and he early learned the lessons of self-reliance and entered upon his career when he was little more than a lad. He received some property through inheritance, and to this by dint of hard work, continued application and good management he has added from time to time until he is at present the owner of a handsome and well-developed farm of 380 acres, lying just east of Stanley. Here he has substantial buildings and modern improvements, and is carrying on extensive operations along the most highly approved lines of procedure. Mr. Berry is a democrat in his political views, but has never sought public office. He and the members of his family belong to the Catholic Church.

Mr. Berry was married in 1885 to Miss Rosa Lancaster, the estimable daughter of John R. Lancaster, an agriculturist of Daviess County, and to this union there have been born eleven children, of whom Ida died at the age of twenty-two years, one child died when two years of age, and a third at the age of ten years, those surviving being: William L., Richard, Alois, John R., Robert Edward, Charles, Samuel and Eugene. The family is highly regarded in Daviess County, where its members have numerous friends.

WILLIAM RIDGELEY GRIFFITH, of Daviess County, is a descendant of one of the earliest settlers of his county and a member of one of the very best families of Kentucky. Joshua Griffith, his great-grandfather, was born in Maryland, whence he came to Kentucky. The founders of the Griffith family came from Wales to Maryland during the Colonial epoch of this country, there being originally four brothers, whose descendants today number legions.

A son of Joshua Griffith was William Ridgeley Griffith, grandfather of the William Ridgeley Griffith whose name heads this review. He married Arria Moseley and they had several children, among them being DeWitt Clinton Griffith, father of William Ridgeley Griffith. His birth occurred near Utica, Daviess County, Kentucky, October 14, 1828. He was reared in his native county, and educated at the old Transylvania University of Kentucky. DeWitt Clinton Griffith was a man of fine physical appearance, and was possessed of strong intellectuality and force of character. He was a thorough gentleman, sweet-spirited and beloved by all who knew him. A large landowner and successful planter, he had many interests in his community. He married Mary Frances Crawford, of Mount Sterling, Kentucky, a lady of rare accomplishments and culture, and they became the parents of children as follows: Elizabeth, who married John G. Weir; William Ridgeley, who was born in Daviess County, May 7, 1857; and Mary, who died at the age of eight years. The mother of these children died in 1865, aged thirty years, and their father married for his second wife, Miss Belle Weir, a daughter of James Weir of Daviess County, and she bore him the following children: Sue G., who married Guy M. Dean; Weir, who lives at Owensboro, Kentucky; Anna B., who never married, and now resides at Washington, District of Columbia; Arria, who is the wife of Harry McGinnis, of West Virginia; and DeWitt Clinton Griffith, who resides in New York City, New York. The second Mrs. Griffith died about 1915, surviving her husband some years, as he passed away in 1898. He was a staunch democrat, and served as a member of both houses of the State Assembly of Kentucky.

William Ridgeley Griffith was reared in his native county, and in 1876 was graduated from Centre College. Later he studied law and was admitted to the bar at Owensboro, but never engaged in the practice of his profession. For two years he was private secretary of Governor Buckner, but resigned to become the first secretary of the Kentucky State Railroad Commission, which position he held for about four years, during that period residing at Frankfort, Kentucky. In 1893 he became chief of finance in the post-office department at Washington, District of Columbia, and served as such for four years, and this was followed by some years' experience as a newspaper writer in New York City, New York, and Owensboro, Kentucky.

In 1904 Mr. Griffith was united in marriage with Miss Aurelia Hickman, a daughter of William Hickman, a pioneer physician of Daviess County, where Mrs. Griffith was born and reared. Mr. and Mrs. Griffith reside on the old homestead of her father near Browns Valley, where they have a beautiful brick residence which they built in 1905. They are noted for their generous hospitality, and their home has many times been the scene of happy social functions. Their many friends regard them as royal entertainers and are delighted to be guests of their home. For some years past Mr. Griffith has followed farming as an occupation.

LUTHER C. LITTLE. At McKee, the judicial center of Jackson County, is to be found a goodly contingent of able and successful representatives of the legal profession, and among the number thus upholding the high standard of the profession in this county is Mr. Little, who is a native son of Kentucky. He was admitted to the bar in 1913, and has since been established in active general practice at McKee. He has won specially high standing as a criminal lawyer, and is conceded to be the leading practitioner in connection with criminal law in the Twenty-seventh Judicial District of Kentucky, with many important forensic victories to his credit in the presentation of criminal cases of important order. Mr. Little's great-grandfather Little was the pioneer representative of the family in the Blue Grass state, he having been born and reared in North Carolina, whence he came in an early day to Breathitt County, Kentucky, where he passed the remainder of his life, as a representative of agricultural industry. His son Ebenezer, grandfather of the subject of this sketch, passed his entire life in Breathitt County, and in addition to becoming a successful farmer he there was engaged in lumbering operations for many years.

Luther C. Little was born in Breathitt County, July 14, 1876, and is a son of Daniel and Sallie (Gambill) Little, both likewise natives of Breathitt County, where the former was born, October 18, 1839, and the latter on October 21 of the same year, their home being now maintained at Annville, Jackson County. Daniel Little was reared to manhood in his native county, there his marriage occurred and there he continued his active association with farm enterprise until 1879, when he removed with his family to Jackson County and settled near Annville, where he became the owner of a large tract of land and where he has long been engaged in farming on an extensive scale. He is now one of the substantial and venerable citizens of this county, is a stalwart supporter of the principles of the democratic party, and he and his wife are members of the Baptist Church. During the period of the Civil war he served two years as a member of the Breathitt County Home Guard. Of the children the eldest is Alfred, a prosperous farmer of the Moore's Creek District of Jackson County; Berry is similarly engaged in the same part of the county; Elizabeth died at the age of nineteen years; Isabelle is the wife of J. R. Cunagin, a farmer of the Moore's Creek District; Malvry, is the wife of C. C. Black, a farmer and carpenter, and they reside at Bowling, Laurel County; Thomas H. is a farmer and merchant in Garrard County; Luther C., of this sketch, was the next in order of birth; Squire is a farmer in the vicinity of Moore's Creek, Jackson County, and is also a successful teacher in the rural schools; Catherine, who died at the age of thirty-four years, was the wife of Frank Lewis, who is a farmer near London, Laurel County.

Luther C. Little was about three years old at the time of the family removal to Jackson County, where he early began to assist in the activities of the home farm, the while he profited fully by the advantages afforded in the local schools. In pursuance of his higher education he entered the normal department of Berea College in Madison County, and in this institution he was graduated as a member of the class of 1898. Two years previously he had become a teacher in a rural school near Annville, Jackson County, and he continued his effective service in the pedagogic profession five years, during three of which he was principal of the public schools at Annville. Thereafter he was for four years a successful traveling salesman through Eastern Kentucky for the Belknap Hardware & Manufacturing Company of Louisville, and in the meanwhile he continued to maintain his home in Jackson County. In November, 1907, his popularity in his home county was attested by his election to the office of sheriff, of which he continued the efficient incumbent four years. During this period he found opportunity to follow the course of his ambition, and applied himself closely to the study of law, in which he made substantial advancement, with the result that he was admitted to the bar in 1913, as noted in the opening paragraph of this review. He has continuously been engaged in practice at McKee since his retirement from the office of sheriff, and his unequivocal success has fully justified his choice of vocation.

Mr. Little is found loyally arrayed as an advocate of the principles of the republican party, and he and his wife are members of the Christian Church at McKee. He is affiliated in his home village with William McKinley Lodge No. 793, Free and Accepted Masons, and McKee Council No. 165, Junior Order United American Mechanics, and at Welchburg he holds membership in the lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. On Godfrey Street, at McKee, Mr. Little owns not only his attractive home property, but also the building in which his law office is maintained, and 1½ miles north of the county seat he owns an excellent farm of 120 acres. In connection with the World war the various activities centered in Jackson County found Mr. Little a loyal and vigorous supporter, and under appointment by Governor Stanley he was legal adviser of the Jackson County Draft Board, besides which he served on the local committees in charge of the various drives for the sale of the Government war bonds, as well as in support of Red Cross and Young Men's Christian Association service in connection with the war. His financial contributions to these various causes were in harmony with his resources available for such application.

At Welchburg in 1898 was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Little to Miss Mary Johnson, daughter of the late John and Martha (Powell) Johnson, the father having been an extensive farm owner near Welchburg, in which village he was also engaged in the general merchandise business. Conrad, eldest of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Little, was born July 17, 1899, and remains at the parental home; Mattie is married and she and her husband reside in the City of Detroit, Michigan; Sallie is the wife of Tal Martin, a merchant at Sandy Gap, Jackson County; Cora, John and Daniel are the younger members of the parental home circle and all are attending the public schools of McKee.

HARRY MOORES has been a resident of Fayette County since 1886, and here has made a record of substantial and worthy achievement in connection with agricultural and livestock industry. He now has the active management of the fine old Payne farm, which passed as an inheritance to his wife and her sister Laura, and which is situated near the Village of Athens, on the Walnut Hill Turnpike, ten miles southeast of the City of Lexington.

Mr. Moores was born on his father's farm near Kirksville, Madison County, Kentucky, on the 4th of March, 1868, and is a son of Josiah and Elizabeth (Scrivener) Moores. His paternal grandfather, Hon. William Moores, was a prominent farmer near Irvine, Estill County, and represented his district in the State Legislature. He continued his residence in Estill County until his death, when about seventy years of age. Josiah Moores was born and reared in Estill County and eventually removed thence to Madison County, when a young man. There he continued his residence until 1886, when he came to Fayette County and established his home on a farm on the Richmond Turnpike. He passed the closing period of his life in the village of South Elkhorn, this county, and was seventy-two years of age at the time of his death, in 1914. His widow passed to the life eternal in January, 1919, at the age of seventy-five years. Both were devout members of the Christian Church, in which he had given faithful service as an elder and a deacon, his fervent Christian faith having been exemplified in all the relations of his long and useful life. Of his large family of children eleven attained to maturity and of the number ten are living at the time of this writing, in 1920: Lucy, the wife of Richard P. Smithy, died in young womanhood; James is a resident of Richmond, Madison County; Rueben resides in Nelson County; Eliza is the wife of J. A. Todd, of Richmond, Madison County; Harry, of this sketch, was the next in order of birth; Minnie is the wife of Milton W. Barker, of whom individual mention is made elsewhere in this work; Willie is the wife of D. P. Farney of Lexington; and Joseph, Marshall, Robert and Shelby are associated in successful farm industry in Bourbon County.

Harry Moses

Harry Moores is indebted to the schools of his native county for his early educational discipline, and he was eighteen years of age when he accompanied his parents on their removal to Fayette County in 1886. Here he was for six years employed on the stock farm of William C. France, on the old Frankfort Turnpike, and he then became associated with his brother James in renting a farm on the Richmond Turnpike. There he continued operations until his marriage, in 1901, since which year he has maintained the management of the fine old homestead, inherited by his wife and her sister Laura. This farm was acquired by Henry C. Payne, father of Mrs. Moores, and is better known as the old Prewitt homestead. On this well improved farmstead Mr. Moores is successfully giving his attention to diversified agriculture and stock-raising, and he is known as one of the progressive farmers and citizens of Fayette County. He has given considerable time also to the insurance business, as a representative of and underwriter for the Hurst Home Insurance Company. He is independent in politics but has had no ambition for public office.

In 1901 was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Moores to Miss Mattie Payne, daughter of Henry C. Payne, of whom individual mention is made on other pages of this publication. The attractive and hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. Moores is brightened by the presence of their four children—Robert, Harry Prewitt, Laura Prewitt and Joe Henry.

HAMPTON F. MINTER. It speaks well for this native son of Jackson County when it is stated that he has proved most effectively his pedagogic and executive ability in his administration of the office of county superintendent of schools, and it is to the credit of the people of Jackson County that they have thus marked their recognition of his ability by selecting him for this important office.

Hampton Flanery Minter was born on the homestead farm of the family, near the present village of Welchburg, Jackson County, November 16, 1873. His parents, William and Cynthia A. (Mainous) Minter, were born in Virginia, the former in the year 1833 and the latter in 1834. Their marriage was solemnized in Lee County, that state, within whose gracious borders the respective families were founded in the Colonial period of our national history. William Minter was a son of Charles Minter, who passed his entire life in the Old Dominion state, where he became a prosperous planter and slaveholder in Lee County. His death occurred in that county, as did also that of his wife, whose family name was Flanery. One of their sons, the late Landon C. Minter, sacrificed his life while serving as a gallant soldier of the Union in the Civil war, he having been a captain of Company G, Eighth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, with which he was mustered into service at Lebanon, Kentucky, January 15, 1862, and his death occurred on the 15th of February of the following year, as the result of wounds he received while taking part in the historic battle of Stone River. William Minter, father of the subject of this review, likewise volunteered for service as a soldier of the Union, but was rejected on account of physical disability.

William Minter continued his residence in Virginia until about the year 1859, when he came to Kentucky and established his residence in Wolfe County. Within the period of the Civil war he removed to Owsley County, and there the family home was maintained until about 1870, when removal was made to Jackson County. Mr. Minter engaged in farm enterprise in the Pond Creek district of the county, and also followed the trade of blacksmith, in which he was a skilled workman. His death occurred at what is now Welchburg, this county, in April, 1883, and his venerable widow now resides in Owsley County, in the home of her daughter Laura, wife of Enoch Holcomb. William Minter was a man of strong mentality and well fortified convictions, was a Republican in politics, and he served a number of terms as a magistrate in Jackson County. Of the children of William and Cynthia A. (Mainous) Minter the firstborn was Carter, who died in Jackson County when twenty-one years of age; Mrs. Mary A. Fields, a widow, resides in the state of California; Amanda became the wife of Cyrus Powell, who is a farmer and fruit-grower in California, and in that state her death occurred when she was fifty-five years of age; Lazarus L. is a farmer near Lawson, Missouri; Charles McClellan was drowned while engaged in stretching a ferry cable across the Umpqua River in the state of Washington, he having been forty-five years of age at the time of his death; Sallie Jane died at the age of fifteen years; Laura is the wife of Enoch Holcomb, a prosperous farmer in Owsley County, Kentucky; John Emerson is a farmer in the vicinity of Hamilton, Missouri; Dempsey died in childhood; Hampton F., of this sketch, was the next in order of birth; and Mrs. Martha Watson resides near Mount Vernon, Illinois, where her husband is a substantial farmer.

The rural schools of Jackson County, afforded Hampton F. Minter his preliminary educational discipline, and in select schools he acquired the equivalent of a high-school course, besides which he attended one year in the normal course, Sue Bennett Memorial School at London, Laurel County. He has manifested special predilection for study and reading, and through self-discipline has gained a really liberal education. He continued to attend schools at intervals until he was twenty-three years of age, and in the meanwhile, about the time of attaining to his legal majority, he had initiated his successful career as a teacher in the rural schools of his native county. He made a splendid record in the pedagogic profession, continued his active service as a teacher in the public schools for a period of fourteen years, and taught his final term of school in the year 1917. All of this service had been rendered in his native state, save for a period of eight months devoted to teaching in the schools of Ochiltree County, Texas.

Mr. Minter was elected county superintendent of schools for Jackson County in November, 1905, assumed his official duties in the following January, and continued in effective service in this capacity for the regular term of four years. For the ensuing five years he was employed in the treasury department of the United States Internal Revenue Service, with headquarters in the City of Lawrenceburg, and November, 1917, he was again elected county superintendent of schools in his native county. He initiated his second four-year term in January, 1918, and his administration has been marked by splendid advancement in the work of the schools under his jurisdiction, he having shown marked discrimination in co-ordinating the school activities in the county and bringing the rural as well as the village schools up to a high standard of efficiency. The county maintains seventy-six schools, has a corps of seventy-nine teachers, and its enrollment of pupils aggregates 4,000. Mr. Minter has found time and opportunity to give some attention to the private study of law, and he was admitted to the bar in the year 1908. He has practiced law to a limited extent, but has continued to make educational service his principal work.

Mr. Minter expresses his political convictions by his alignment in the ranks of the republican party, and he and his wife hold membership in the Reformed Church in America, in which he is serving as a deacon of the church in his home village of McKee, judicial center of Jackson County. Here, in 1921, he is serving as master of William McKinley Lodge No. 793, Free and Accepted Masons, besides which he is noble grand of Clark Lodge No. 217, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, an office in which he has served several terms. He is a stockholder of the Jackson County Fair Association, is the owner of two small farms in Jackson County, with a total area of 119 acres, and owns also the residence property which represents his home, on Main Street, McKee. Mr. Minter gave earnest and loyal service in the furtherance of local patriotic movements during the nation's participation in the World war, and his financial contributions were limited only by his available means. He served as a member of the executive committee of the Jackson County Chapter of the Red Cross, of which chapter he was finally made chairman, and he was Government appeal agent of the Jackson County Draft Board. He gave much time and thought to such patriotic service and gave much aid in furthering the various local drives in support of the Government war bond issues.

On the 14th of November, 1907, at Greenhall, Jackson County, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Minter to Miss M. Emily Minter, the two families being of remote kinship. Mrs. Minter is a daughter of Emery and Elizabeth (Carmack) Minter, the latter of whom is deceased and the former of whom is a retired farmer, residing at Greenhall. Mr. and Mrs. Hampton F. Minter have no children.

LEWIS P. LAY has in varied lines been prominently concerned with public and industrial progress in Southeast Kentucky, is one of the honored and influential captains of industry in this section of the state and maintains his residence at Williamsburg, judicial center of Whitley County. He is president of the Lot's Creek Coal Company and is identified also with other important coal-producing companies in this part of the state, besides which his constructive powers have been brought effectively into service in the promotion of other lines of business enterprise.

Mr. Lay was born in Scott County, Tennessee, January 17, 1866, and his father Rev. Michael Lay, is now living virtually retired at Pleasant View, one of the attractive villages of Whitley County, Kentucky. Rev. Michael Lay was born in Campbell County, Tennessee, in the year 1842, was there reared and educated, there his marriage was solemnized, and there he continued his active alliance with farm enterprise until, a few years after his marriage, he removed to Scott County, that state. There he followed farming and continued his earnest ministerial service until 1889, when he became the owner of and established the family home upon a farm in the Marsh Creek district of Whitley County, Kentucky. He held status as a successful exponent of farm industry in this county until 1920, since which year he has lived retired at Pleasant View. As a clergyman of the Baptist Church he began preaching when a youth of but eighteen years, and his zealous and effective labors as a minister were actively continued until 1920. He occasionally responds to calls for such service at the present time, and his consecrated labors have done much to advance the moral standards in the various communities in which he has rendered pastoral service in the course of his long, active and righteous life, the influence of which has been benignant in all its relations. He is a man of broad mental ken, strong convictions and distinct capacity for leadership in popular sentiment. His political allegiance is given to the republican party. He is a son of William L. Lay, who was born in Knox County, Tennessee, in 1809, and who died in Whitley County, Kentucky, in 1906, at the patriarchal age of ninety-seven years. William L. Lay passed the major part of his active life as a farmer in Campbell County, Tennessee, and from 1901 until his death he lived in well earned retirement and comfort in Whitley County. His wife, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Ellison, was a native of Whitley County, Kentucky, where her parents were pioneer settlers, and her death occurred in Campbell County, Tennessee. The lineage of the Lay family tree traces to Irish and Holland Dutch origin, and the first representative of the family in America settled in North Carolina in the early Colonial period of our national history.

Rev. Michael Lay married Miss Elizabeth Lay, of remote family kinship, she having been born in Campbell County, Tennessee, in 1841, and her death having occurred at Marsh Creek, Kentucky, in 1896. Of the children the eldest was Spencer F., who was a school teacher in Scott County, Tennessee, at the time of his death, in 1884; Lucinda became the wife of John Wood, a farmer and merchant of Marsh Creek, Whitley County, where the death of both occurred, Mrs. Wood having survived her husband and having passed to the life eternal in the year 1917; the subject of this sketch was the next in order of birth; and D. M. is a prosperous farmer in Garrard County.

The preliminary education of L. P. Lay was obtained in the rural schools of Scott County Kentucky, and thereafter he attended Cora College at Pleasant View, Whitley County, Kentucky, besides having passed two years as a student in an excellent academy at Huntsville, Tennessee. Thereafter he continued his studies for another year in Cora College, which institution he left in the year 1889. At the age of eighteen years he initiated his successful service as a teacher in the public schools of Scott County, Tennessee, where he continued his effective pedagogic labors five years. In 1889 he engaged in independent farm enterprise in the Marsh Creek district of Whitley County, and three years later he went to Jackson County, Alabama, where he held for two years the dual position of bookkeeper and clerk in the commissary department of a large lumber and stave company. For one year thereafter he was bookkeeper and business manager of the extensive Huffman lumber business at Tallahassee, Florida, and he then returned to Whitley County, Kentucky, and resumed farm operations on Marsh Creek, besides which he served three years as deputy sheriff of the county. He continued his progressive farm activities until 1899, when he removed to Williamsburg, the county seat, where he served five years as assistant postmaster. In November, 1903, he was elected circuit-court clerk of Whitley county, and by re-election in November, 1909, he continued the incumbent of this office for twelve consecutive years.

In 1911 Mr. Lay became one of the influential factors in the organization of the Farmers Bank & Trust Company of Williamsburg, and upon its incorporation he was elected its first president, an office of which he continued the incumbent until 1918, when he resigned. He did much to upbuild the substantial business of this institution, which has a capital stock of $50,000, a surplus fund of $20,000, and deposits of fully $400,000. Upon severing his association with the executive control of this institution Mr. Lay became secretary and treasurer of the Lot's Creek Coal Company, and in the following year, 1919, he was elected president of this important company, of which he has since continued the chief executive officer. The valuable bituminous coal mines of this corporation are in Perry County and have an output capacity of twelve carloads a day. Mr. Lay is a director of the Drake Blue Gem Coal Company at Nevisdale, Whitley County; is a stockholder in the Golden Ash Coal Company, the mines of which, in Harlan County, have capacity for the producing of fifteen carloads of coal a day; he continues as a substantial stockholder in the Farmers' Bank & Trust Company of Williamsburg; and he is a stockholder in the Williamsburg Electric Company. He owns the business block in which his offices are established, on Main Street, the ground floor of the building being used for mercantile purposes and the second floor for offices. He is the owner also of a one-half interest in the Williamsburg Post Office Building on Depot Street; and his home residence property, with a two-story house of thirteen rooms, is one of the most modern and attractive in the city, with desirable location on Third Street.

Mr. Lay has been progressive and successful as a business man and has at all times stood exponent of loyal and liberal citizenship. He is a stalwart in the local ranks of the republican party, he and his wife are active members of the Baptist Church in their home city, and here he maintains affiliation with Williamsburg Lodge No. 11, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and Williamsburg Council No. 186, Junior Order of United American Mechanics. Mr. Lay showed his sense of patriotic stewardship not only in making liberal subscriptions to the Government bond issues, Savings Stamps, Red Cross work and other mediums of humane service in connection with the World war, but also gave active aid in the promotion of the various local drives in support of these all-important movements.

The year 1896 recorded the marriage of Mr. Lay to Miss Permella E. Richardson, whose parents, Michael and Nannie (Mahan) Richardson reside on their homestead farm two miles west of Williamsburg. J. Edward, the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Lay, died at the age of five years, five months and five days.

ADAM T. SILER claims Whitley County as the place of his nativity, is a scion of a sterling pioneer family of the county, and has here found ample scope for individual achievement and service. He was formerly a successful and popular teacher in the schools of this part of the state, has concerned himself loyally with civic and material affairs and progressive activities in the county, is a representative member of its bar, and that his influence is still further extended needs no further voucher than the fact that he is president of the Bank of Williamsburg, the county seat, where also he is junior member of the leading law firm of Tye & Siler.

Adam Troy Siler was born on the old home farm of his father on Tackets Creek, Whitley County, near the Village of Pleasant View, and the date of his nativity was February 13, 1870. He is a representative of the fourth generation of the Siler family in Whitley County, and this in itself is evidence that the family name has been identified with the history of the county since the early pioneer period. His paternal great-grandfather, Jacob Siler, was a native of North Carolina, and was a young man when he came to the wild and picturesque mountain district of Southeastern Kentucky and initiated the development of farm land in Whitley County, where he continued as a pioneer exponent of agricultural industry until the time of his death, and where he played an effective and honorable part in general development and progress along both civic and material lines. He was of German lineage, and the founders of the American branch of the Siler family settled in North Carolina in the Colonial period of our national history.

Adam Siler, grandfather of the subject of this review, was born in Whitley County in the year 1795, and here he passed his entire life, which came to a close in the year 1882. As a farmer he ably carried forward the work which his father had instituted, and he represented the best in the communal life of his native county, where he commanded secure place in popular confidence and goodwill. He was one of the venerable and honored native sons of Whitley County, at the time of his death, and his wife, whose maiden name was Polly Brock, was born in this county in the year 1800, so that she was an octogenarian at the time of her death, in 1881, about one year prior to the death of her husband.

Terrel Siler, son of Adam and Polly (Brock) Siler, was born on the old family homestead in Whitley County in 1835, and, like his forebears, he became a prominent representative of farm enterprise in this county, where he continued to maintain his home until his death in 1913, and where he well upheld the high honors of the family name. He was a stalwart republican and was an active member and liberal supporter of the Baptist Church, of which his widow likewise is an earnest member. The maiden name of Mrs. Siler was Mary Blakely, she was born in Whitley County in the year 1841, and she is now a loved and revered member of the family home circle of her son Adam T., immediate subject of this sketch. The eldest of the children was William A., who was a merchant at Pleasant View, this county, at the time of his death in 1892; Lillie F., who now resides at Lot, this county, is the widow of Henry S. Jones, who was a merchant at Pleasant View at the time of his death; John M. is engaged in a teaming enterprise at Packard, this county; Cynthia is the wife of Ulysses S. Jones, a wholesale grocer at Jellico, Tennessee; Adam T., whom name introduces this review, was the next in order of birth; Martin V. is a commercial traveler and resides at Jellico, Tennessee; W. C. likewise is a commercial traveling salesman and maintains his residence at Jellico; Dr. J. E. is a leading physician and surgeon at Lot, Whitley County, and is a veteran of the World war service, he having been a first lieutenant in the medical corps of the United States Army and his service having included three months in France, where he was on duty at a base hospital; Ulysses S. resides at Packard, Whitley County, and is purchasing agent for the Mahan-Jellico Coal Company.

Adam T. Siler early began to lend his aid in the work of the home farm, and the rural schools of his native county gave him his preliminary education. In 1887 he was graduated from Cora Institute at Pleasant View, and thereafter he taught one term in a rural school at the head of Sheep Creek, Whitley County, his initial pedagogic service having rendered him a stipend of twenty-one dollars a month, out of which emolument he paid seventy-five cents a week for board and room. In 1888-9 he attended the Glasgow Normal School at Glasgow, Kentucky, and for two years thereafter he continued his effective service as a teacher in the district schools of his native county. He then entered the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio, in which old and well ordered institution he was graduated as a member of the class of 1892, with the degree of Bachelor of Science. He then gave two more years of service as a teacher in the rural schools of his home county, and recognition of his ability and sterling character then came in a significant way, in that he was elected county superintendent of schools for Whitley County, an office in which he served two terms of four years each—1893-1901. He did much to advance the standard of the schools of the county and made a record of faithful and effective service. In the meanwhile he studied law under the preceptorship of J. N. Sharp, of Williamsburg, one of the most brilliant members of the Whitley County Bar, and in 1898 was admitted to the bar of Kentucky. While still in service as county superintendent of schools he established himself in the practice of law at Williamsburg, where he has gained success and reputation as a resourceful trial lawyer in connection with both civil and criminal cases and as a well fortified and conservative counsellor. His professional coadjutor in the firm of Tye & Siler is H. H. Tye, and they maintain their offices in the old Williamsburg Bank Building on Main Street. The firm is retained as local attorneys for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad; the Southern Railway; the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway; the Western Union Telegraph Company, and many of the important coal-mining corporations of Southeast Kentucky.

Mr. Siler has given yeoman service in the councils and campaign activities of the republican party in his native county, and he served two terms, 1904-11, as a member of the State Board of Railroad Commissioners, of which he was chairman during his second term. He also served two terms, 1908-16, as chairman of the Republican Executive Committee of the Eleventh Congressional District of Kentucky, this making him also a member of the Republican State Central Committee. He is a trustee of the Baptist Church at Williamsburg, and maintains lively interest in all departments of its work. He is affiliated with Williamsburg Lodge No. 490, Free and Accepted Masons; Kenton Chapter No. 148, Royal Arch Masons, Cumberland Commandery No. 40, Knights Templar, all at Williamsburg and with the Kentucky State Bar Association.

Mr. Siler is president of the Bank of Williamsburg, which was organized, as a state bank, in 1884, and which now bases its operations upon a capital stock of $60,000. It is one of the strong and well ordered banking institutions of this part of Kentucky, with surplus and undivided profits aggregating $67,000, and with deposits of $900,000. T. B. Mahan is vice president of the bank; T. Scott Siler, individually mentioned on other pages, is its cashier; and Zebulon Ward is assistant cashier.

Mr. Siler has other large and important capitalistic interests. He is president of the Jellico Grocery Company, which is engaged in the wholesale grocery trade at Jellico, Tennessee; is president also of the Kingsport Grocery Company, a similar concern established at Kingsport, Tennessee; is vice president of the wholesale grocery house of the Mahan Company, which maintains well equipped establishments at Winchester and Hazard, Kentucky; is vice president of the Lot's Creek Coal Company of Whitley County; is heavily interested in coal lands in Harlan County; is the owner of a well improved farm of 150 acres near Lot, Whitley County; and his home property, on Ridge Avenue, is one of the best in Williamsburg.

Patriotic loyalty, zeal and liberality marked the service of Mr. Siler during the climacteric World war period. He had much of leadership in the local drives for the varied war causes, made his financial subscriptions of ultimate liberality, and as chairman of committees in charge of Liberty Loan and Red Cross campaigns in Whitley County he devoted much time and energy to such promotive work.

The marriage of Mr. Siler occurred December 1, 1898, at Campbellsville, Kentucky, and he has three children: Lillian is the wife of Clarence L'Aerni, general manager of the Jellico Lumber Company at Jellico, Tennessee; Eugene E. is at the time of this writing, in 1921, a member of the senior class in the University of Kentucky at Lexington; and Irma Katharine is a student in the Ward-Belmont School in the City of Nashville, Tennessee.

T. SCOTT SILER, the efficient and popular cashier of the Bank of Williamsburg, at the judicial center of Whitley County, is a descendant of Jacob Siler, who was born in North Carolina, a representative of a family of German lineage that was founded in that commonwealth in the Colonial period of American history. Jacob Siler as a young man became one of the early settlers in Whitley County, Kentucky, where he reclaimed a farm from the pioneer wilds and where he passed the remainder of his life. He reared a fine family of sons and daughters, and the Silers have in the succeeding generations continued to be prominently identified with civic and material activities in this section of the Blue Grass state. Of this sterling pioneer family, founded in Whitley County considerably more than a century ago, many direct and incidental records are given in other parts of this publication.

Burgess Siler, son of Jacob the pioneer and grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born on the old home farm near Lot, Whitley County, and in that locality he passed his entire life, his death having occurred in 1865. He became one of the extensive and successful farmers of his native county, and was influential in community affairs. His first wife, whose maiden name was Mary Crowley, passed her entire life in the vicinity of Lot, this county, and the second wife, whose family name was Fuson, likewise lived all her life in this county.

Benjamin Siler, son of Burgess and Mary (Crowley) Siler, was born on his father's farm near Lot, this county, in 1831, and died near Saxton, this county, in 1871. He became the owner of one of the large farm estates of his native county, and his entire active career was marked by close and effective association with agricultural and livestock industry in Whitley County. In politics he supported the cause of the republican party, and he took loyal interest in all that touched the welfare of his home county. His wife, whose maiden name was Susan Adkins, was born in Whitley County, July 5, 1835, and she survived him by many years, the closing period of her life having been passed in Williamsburg, where she died on the 19th of September, 1918. Of the children the eldest is Miss Rhoda, who maintains her home at Williamsburg; T. Scott, of this sketch, is the next younger of the children; Alcy is the wife of J. Wesley Perkins, an engineer in the service of the Proctor Coal Company, and they reside at Williamsburg; W. B. is a prosperous merchant at Williamsburg; and Miss Mary J. resides with her eldest brother in this city.

T. Scott Siler supplemented the discipline of the rural schools by attending Cora College at Pleasant View, Whitley County, where he received high school education under Prof. William A. Nesbit. He continued to attend school at intervals until he was twenty-three years of age, his birth having occurred on his father's home farm in Whitley County, not far from the City of Jellico, Tennessee, on the 23rd of November, 1863. He gave twelve years of effective service as a teacher in the rural schools of Whitley County, and from 1898 until 1900 he was here actively engaged in farm enterprise. In the latter year he became a mechanical engineer in connection with a coal mine, and he continued to be thus engaged until 1904, when he became bookkeeper in the Bank of Williamsburg, in which he won promotion to the position of assistant cashier and of which he has been the cashier since 1910. This is one of the specially substantial and important banking institutions of Southeast Kentucky, and its inception dates from the year 1884. It now has a capital of $60,000; surplus and undivided profits aggregate $67,000; and the deposits have reached the significant aggregate of $900,000. Adam T. Siler, who is president of the bank, is the subject of personal mention on other pages of this volume; T. B. Mahan is vice president of the institution, and Zeb Ward is assistant cashier.

Mr. Siler is a republican, and his public spirit was effectively exemplified in his two years of service as a member of the City Council of Williamsburg. He and his wife hold membership in the Baptist Church in their home city, and he is affiliated with Williamsburg Lodge No. 490, Free and Accepted Masons. In addition to being a stockholder in the bank of which he is cashier he is a stockholder also in the Mahan-Jellico Coal Company at Packard. At Williamsburg he owns the modern residence property which represents the home of him and his wife, who have no children. Mr. Siler devoted much time to promoting the sale of Liberty and Victory Bonds in Whitley County at the time of the World war, and he made his individual subscriptions of notably liberal order.

At Dishman, Knox County, in 1892, Mr. Siler wedded Miss Mollie Tye, daughter of P. N. Tye, who was a prosperous farmer, his activities as an agriculturist having been prosecuted at different times in Laurel, Knox and Whitley counties, and both he and his wife are now deceased.

ORMAN JONES has given splendid service in the furtherance of educational work in Southeastern Kentucky, where he holds the chair of history and French in Cumberland College at Williamsburg, Whitley County. He has been a valued member of the faculty of this institution since the year of 1891, identified himself with the same when it was still known as Williamsburg Institute, and has been a resourceful and influential factor in the development of the college into one of the leading educational institutions of this part of the Blue Grass state.

Professor Jones was born at West Jefferson, Madison County, Ohio, October 27, 1867, and is a scion of an old and honored family of the Buckeye state, his paternal grandfather, Rev. Isaac C. Jones, having passed his entire life in Ohio and having been a distinguished pioneer clergyman of the Baptist Church in that commonwealth. He was for many years engaged in the work of the ministry in West Jefferson and vicinity, and was revered alike for his fine intellectuality and his noble character. His death occurred in the early '40s, at West Jefferson, and there also occurred the death of his wife, whose maiden name was Eliza Mills and who was born and reared in Madison County, Ohio. Their son, C. C., father of him whose name initiates this review, was born at West Jefferson, Ohio, in 1828, was reared and educated in his native county and with the passing years he became a specially successful business man and substantial capitalist in his native state. His death occurred at Columbus, its capital city, in 1891. He was a stalwart and well fortified advocate of the principles of the republican party, and he and his wife were zealous members of the Baptist Church. Mrs. Jones, whose maiden name was Sarah Burrows, was born in the state of New Jersey and her death occurred at Granville, Ohio. Of the children the eldest was Thomas, who was living in the City of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, at the time of his death; Samuel achieved distinctive success as a man of affairs and was a resident of Columbus, Ohio, at the time of his death; Dr. L. E. Jones is a representative physician and surgeon at Montague, Michigan; Dr. C. W. Jones was engaged in the practice of medicine at West Jefferson, Ohio, at the time of his demise; Prof. Gorman Jones, of this sketch, was the next in order of birth; Clara, who died in the City of Canton, Ohio, was the wife of Rev. J. W. Roberts, who is a clergyman of the Baptist Church and who now resides at Toledo, that state; Dr. C. C. Jones is a representative physician and surgeon at Canton, Ohio; and the other four children died in infancy.

Prof. Gorman Jones acquired his earlier education in the public schools of West Jefferson, Ohio, where he was graduated in the high school as a member of the class of 1883. He then entered Denison University at Granville, Ohio, in which institution he was graduated as a member of the class of 1890 and from which he received the degree of Bachelor of Arts. At the university he was an ambitious student and was also a popular figure in connection with undergraduate affairs, his fraternal affiliation there having been with the Beta Theta Pi, in which he still continues to maintain lively constituent interest and alliance.

In January, 1891, Professor Jones came to Williamsburg, Kentucky, and became an instructor in Williamsburg Institute, which, with expanded curriculum, is now chartered under the title of Cumberland College. Thus his pedagogic service with this institution has been continuous for thirty years, and his ability and enthusiasm have made him a potent force in the advancing of the interests of the college in all lines and in raising it to a standard that marks it as one of the leading centers of high education in this part of Kentucky. On College Hill he owns his modern and attractive residence property, and aside from his long and effective service as a member of the faculty of the college he has entered fully into community affairs and had not a little leadership in popular sentiment and action. He is a republican in political allegiance, and he served two terms as a member of the City Council of Williamsburg. He is a member of the directorate of the Bank of Williamsburg, is financially interested in several coal-mining companies in this section of the state, and is known and honored as a loyal and progressive citizen of his adopted city and county.

With characteristic nerve and loyalty Professor Jones entered actively into the promotion of the various patriotic services and objects in Whitley County at the time of the World war. He served as chairman of the Whitley County chapter of the Red Cross during the entire period of American participation in the war, and he retains this position at the time of this writing, in the summer of 1921. He touched closely the limitations of his financial resources in making subscriptions to the Government war loans, Savings Stamps, etc., and in his contributions to other patriotic mediums of service, besides taking active part in the local drives in support of these objects.

At Greenfield, Ohio, in 1892, Professor Jones wedded Miss Olive Miller, daughter of the late R. H. and Cynthia (Shoemaker) Miller, both of whom died at Greenfield, where the father was a representative banker and influential citizen. Mrs. Jones was summoned to the life eternal in the year 1910, at Williamsburg, Kentucky, and she is survived by four children: Dorothy remains at the paternal home and is a successful and popular grade teacher in Cumberland College; Virginia was graduated in this institution as a member of the class of 1921; Lowell is a student in the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, one of the foremost institutions of music in the state of Ohio; and Nettie was born December 28, 1909, only a few months prior to the death of her mother.

In the City of Chicago, the great western metropolis, in December, 1915, was solemnized the marriage of Professor Jones to Miss Mary Fullerton, daughter of Dr. Stuart and Alice (Miller) Fullerton, the latter of whom still resides in that city. Doctor Fullerton was long a representative physician and surgeon at Hillsboro, Ohio, where he also conducted a drug business. Mrs. Jones is a leader in the representative social activities of Cumberland College and the community in general, and is the gracious and popular chatelaine of the attractive family home.

L. STEELY SILER, M. D., has not found it essential or expedient to go outside the boundaries of his native county to find an inviting field for the practice of his profession, and he is numbered among the able and representative physicians and surgeons of Whitley County, where he maintains his residence and professional headquarters in the City of Corbin. He was born in Whitley County on the 2d of March, 1878, a son of Adam and grandson of Benjamin F. Siler, the latter of whom was born in South Carolina, in 1795, a representative of a family, of German lineage, which was founded in South Carolina in the Colonial period of American history. In Germany the original orthography of the family name was Seiler. Benjamin F. Siler was a young man when he came to Kentucky and settled in Whitley County, where he became a pioneer farmer and where he gained no little reputation as a skilled hunter of the many kinds of wild game then in evidence in this section of the state. In this county was solemnized his marriage to Nancy Warner, who passed her entire life in Whitley County, where her parents were early settlers. Mr. and Mrs. Siler continued to reside on their old home farm until the close of their lives.

Adam Siler was born on the old homestead in this county in the year 1832, and with the passing years he made a splendid record of successful achievement in connection with farm industry in his native county. In 1909 he retired from his farm and established his residence at Jellico, Tennessee, which city lies adjacent to his old home county in Kentucky, his loved and devoted wife having passed the final days of her life in Whitley County, to which she returned for medical treatment on the part of her son, the subject of this sketch, and here her death occurred in March, 1920. She was a devout member of the Baptist Church, of which her husband has long been an active member. Her maiden name was Nancy Snyder, and she was born in Whitley County in the year 1838. Mr. Siler is still living, virtually retired at Jellico, Tennessee. He was long an influential figure in connection with community affairs in Whitley County, and his political convictions place him loyally in the ranks of the republican party. Of the children the eldest is Amanda, who is the widow of W. M. Archer, whose death occurred on their farm which is still her place of residence, in Whitley County; Hester is the wife of Josiah Smith, a retired merchant and real estate broker residing at Jellico, Tennessee; Melba is the widow of Kiah Smith, who was a farmer near Jellico, Tennessee, where his widow now resides; John Q. was one of the prosperous farmers of Whitley County at the time of his death, in 1909; Simon P. resides at Wilton, Knox County, and is actively associated with the North Jellico Coal Company; Mary who died at Clate, Knox County, in 1911, was the wife of William Smith, now engaged in farm enterprise near Jellico, Tennessee; Rachel is the wife of D. B. Scott, postmaster at Jellico, Tennessee; Lucy is the wife of G. W. Nicholson, a merchant at Hazard, Perry County; Benjamin F. is engaged in the wholesale grocery business at Owensboro, Kentucky; Dora is the wife of Rev. E. W. Roach, a clergyman of the Baptist Church, and they reside at Hazard, judicial center of Perry County; Dr. Siler, of this sketch, was the next in order of birth; and Everett W., who is in the employ of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, resides at Jellico, Tennessee.

Dr. Siler found the period of his childhood and early youth compassed by the conditions and influences of the home farm, the while his preliminary education was gained in the rural schools of Whitley County. His higher education along academic lines was acquired in Cumberland College at Williamsburg, and in preparation for his chosen profession he entered the old Hospital College of Medicine in the City of Louisville, in which he completed the prescribed curriculum and was graduated on the 1st of July, 1903. Upon thus receiving his degree of Doctor of Medicine he engaged in active general practice at Woodbine, Whitley County, which place continued the center of his successful professional activities until the 1st of May, 1920, when he removed to the City of Corbin, where he has since continued his earnest and effective labors as one of the efficient, popular and representative physicians and surgeons of his native county. His office is established in the Sutherland Drug Store on Center Street, and in his practice he maintains partnership alliance with Dr. F. S. Smith and Dr. G. T. Corum, this constituting one of the specially strong professional firms of the kind in this part of the state.

Doctor Siler maintains active affiliations with the Whitley County Medical Society, the Kentucky State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. His political alignment is with the republican party, he and his wife are active members of the Baptist Church in their home city, and his Masonic affiliations are here briefly noted: Woodbine Lodge No. 866, Free and Accepted Masons, of which he is past master; Kenton Chapter No. 148, Royal Arch Masons, at Williamsburg; Cumberland Commandery No. 40, Knights Templars, at Williamsburg; Kentucky Sovereign Consistory, Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite, at Louisville, in which he has received the thirty-second degree; and Kosair Temple of the Mystic Shrine in the same city. He holds membership also in Corbin Lodge No. 52, Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

Doctor and Mrs. Siler delight in extending to their many friends the hospitality of their beautiful and spacious home at 300 Gordon Avenue, a property owned by them and recognized as one of the most attractive and modern residence places in the City of Corbin. The Doctor was characteristically vital and loyal in supporting and advancing the various war measures and activities in his native county during American identification with the great World war. He aided the local drives in support of the Government war loans, etc., and his own financial contributions to the war objects were consonant in their liberality. On the 3d of October, 1918, he was commissioned a captain in the medical corps of the United States Army, but the signing of the historic armistice brought a cessation of active hostilities before there came a demand for his active service.

November 26, 1903, recorded the marriage of Doctor Siler to Miss Nannie Tye, who likewise was born and reared in Whitley County, where her father, a retired farmer, now maintains his home at Tidalwave. Mrs. Siler is a daughter of Henry H. and Lucy (Ward) Tye, the latter of whom is deceased. Doctor and Mrs. Siler have two children: Floy, who was born July 15, 1907, and Happy Jack, who was born April 12, 1911, and who well merits the personal name which he bears.

SAMUEL JUDSON ROBERTS. The career of Samuel Judson Roberts in Kentucky was one of such exceptional quality of achievement that there can hardly ever be a time when it will not be an inspiration to recall the manner of his coming to the state, what he attempted to do, and the results that followed his twenty-five years of citizenship.

Before he came to Kentucky the years of his life were largely identified with his native State of Ohio. He was born at Pomeroy, Ohio, February 11, 1858, of Welsh parentage. His father was Rev. Edward Roberts, a prominent Baptist minister, who died when Samuel J. was a small boy. The latter's mother married his father's brother, who exercised a kindly influence over the youth. Samuel J. Roberts passed his boyhood largely in Canton, Ohio, where he attended public schools and the Avery Academy. His choice of a career was early made, and at Cleveland he secured a nominal position on the Cleveland Leader at the age of nineteen. In 1882 he returned to Canton and became identified with the circulation department of the Canton Depository, one of the old and conservative papers of Ohio. In its service he continued six years, and in the meantime was elected and served as a member of the city council, being the youngest member of the council Canton had ever elected up to that time. His record justified his nomination as republican candidate for mayor, but he was defeated by a small majority. It was at Canton that he became personally acquainted with and formed a life-long admiration for the great Ohioan, William McKinley. Mr. Roberts was chairman of the convention in which Mr. McKinley was first nominated by his district for Congress.

Samuel J. Roberts

Mr. Roberts left Canton in the spring of 1888 to come to Lexington, Kentucky. The object of his coming and the significance of it all is perhaps best expressed in a concise tribute written after Mr. Roberts' death by his veteran competitor in journalism, Desha Breckenridge, who though running an opposition paper and on the opposite side in politics could appreciate what Mr. Roberts' purpose was and how faithfully he carried it out.

"When after an absence of several years," wrote Mr. Breckenridge, "we came out to Lexington to cast our first vote for president in 1888 we were told an Ohio Republican had come to Lexington and started a Republican afternoon paper. With the ignorance of youth, and the certainty of prejudice, we predicted his end—and that quick—ignominious failure. Yesterday, when upon our return from an absence of a few days, we were met with the news that that Republican from Ohio, who had come to Lexington twenty-five years ago, was dying, we knew, from the shock to us, how deep would be the shock to the community; from the sorrow we felt, how widespread would be the grief of this community. We realized, more fully than we had ever before realized, that Sam Roberts had succeeded, succeeded in a community that was hostile to the ideas that he represented and the principles he advocated when he first came to Kentucky. Twenty-five years ago it seemed impossible that he, or anyone, could succeed in the task he undertook. Today there is no man, whether he was friend or opponent, who will deny his success; there is no man who will not admit that it was fairly won and justly deserved.

"It was a daring thing Mr. Roberts did. The people of Kentucky were divided during the war. Thousands fought under the Stars and Bars, equal thousands under the Stars and Stripes. Some of the best intellect and best blood of the state was given to the Union cause. But after the war Kentucky, Fayette County, Lexington, were almost solidly Democratic. Business and social life were largely dominated by political views. The passions, the prejudices engendered during the war, were strong. Fraud and force and corruption tolerated, if not justified, to prevent the triumph of the Republican party. The bugaboo of Negro domination was kept ever present before the people of the state. There was no Republican newspaper in Central Kentucky; there had never been an afternoon newspaper, nor had any daily newspaper ever been a financial success in Lexington. For a Northern man to come to Lexington and start an afternoon Republican newspaper seemed the height of folly.

"And yet Mr. Roberts made the Lexington Leader a success. From its first issue till today he made it the best paper published in Lexington. He cared but little for the editorial page. He devoted comparatively little thought or attention to his editorial columns. But he had the capacity to recognize and so to publish the news as to make of his newspaper the best newspaper and to make it a real influence in the community. Through it he built up the Republican party. He strove persistently and insistently for fair elections.

He urged always the political union of those who believed in fair elections and an honest count. He advocated always the legal and peaceful method of accomplishing that which he and his followers sought to accomplish. Nothing deterred him from a course he had mapped out for himself. No labor was too arduous, no vigil too long for him to undertake to accomplish his purpose. He shrank from the performance of no duty as he saw his duty. Day and night he labored when he first started the Leader, day and night he labored when the Leader was a success financially and politically. He was lavishly generous to those he loved and scrupulously punctilious in the discharge of every obligation he accepted. Simple with the simplicity of self-respect was his mode of life when he was struggling against great odds and in financial straits; equally simple with the simplicity of modesty was he when he was blessed with abundance. Of perfect habits, without any of the minor vices, he was tolerant of the faults and foibles of others. His death will be felt as a personal loss by hundreds who did not know him personally; it will be recognized as a loss to the whole community by the whole community. And so this morning we speak not for ourselves alone, nor chiefly, but for the people of Lexington, Democrats and Republicans alike, when we lay on his coffin the tribute of our personal sorrow and bear public testimony to the loss his death is to the city which he chose as a home and by his service to which he gave proof of his love for his home."

His paper was first known as the Kentucky Leader, later the Lexington Leader, and was the first afternoon paper ever issued in Central Kentucky. It was first owned by a stock company, and during the years of struggle against adversity the office of publication was several times changed, but in 1903 occupied the handsome building which was its home for the last ten years of its founder's life. For several years he had been sole proprietor, and he left it a valuable newspaper property.

One of the early distinctions that came to him in the state was his election as president of the Kentucky Press Association at the Frankfort meeting in 1893-94. This was the first time the State Association had conferred the presidency upon a republican editor. The following year he was chosen chairman of the Republican State Campaign Committee of Kentucky. After the defeat of Harrison by Cleveland in 1892 he was the first editor in Kentucky to advocate editorially the candidacy of William McKinley as the logical standard bearer of the republican party. Then he was chosen chairman of the Republican State Campaign committee to manage the memorable campaign of 1896. In the words of a committee of Fayette County republicans, commenting upon the result that in that year Kentucky cast her first electoral vote for a republican candidate for president, "how much influence the individuality of Mr. Roberts had upon the reversion of sentiment here and throughout the state we realize more and more as we better understand the force and character of this indefatigable man of purpose." As a deserved recognition for his splendid services in carrying Kentucky President McKinley appointed Mr. Roberts internal revenue collector for the Seventh Kentucky District, with headquarters at Lexington. He took charge of the office October 11, 1897, and held it for thirteen years lacking one month, until September 1, 1910. He was reappointed by President Roosevelt, and as collector made a splendid record for efficiency and popularity with the men in the service under him, all of which was appreciated when he retired from office by letters of congratulation from President Taft and former President Roosevelt and other officials. The last public honor that came to him was in 1911, when Governor Willson appointed him a member of the Kentucky Election Commission. For years both personally and through the columns of the Leader he had made a courageous fight for cleaner elections, and his appointment on the State Election Commission was a recognition of this patriotic, earnest effort. His example and courageous stand for decent methods and fair play while a member of the board had a salutary effect which was reflected in the election throughout the state that year.

Mr. Roberts was also one of the first editors in the Central West to advocate the Commission plan of government, publishing and writing articles in its favor for a year or more before the plan was seriously considered in Kentucky.

He was still in the prime of his usefulness and only fifty-five years of age when death came to him and stayed his hand on March 23, 1913.

On November 10, 1888, soon after he had started his journalistic enterprise at Lexington, Mr. Roberts returned to Canton, Ohio, and married Miss Anna Trout, a daughter of Joseph F. and Caroline (Meyer) Trout. Her parents were both natives of Ohio. Mrs. Roberts was the eighth in a family of eleven children, seven of whom are still living. Her father was a former county clerk of Stark County, Ohio, was a democrat in politics and a member of the Catholic Church. Mrs. Roberts, who resides at 226 West Second Street in Lexington, was intimately associated with her husband in his journalistic career and contributed in no small degree to the success of the Leader.

While Mr. Roberts was getting his early training as a newspaper reporter at Cleveland the news came over the wire to the Cleveland Leader of the death of President James A. Garfield. Young Roberts was at once delegated by his superiors to deliver the news to President Garfield's mother, Mrs. Eliza Garfield, at her home in Hiram, Ohio. It was a difficult and delicate duty, but he always had good reasons to recall the visit, since while he was there Mrs. Garfield showed him a letter from the President dated at Washington August 11, 1881, and written by the President and signed by him, telling his mother that he was doing well and was going to recover. The letter she gave to young Roberts later, and Mrs. Roberts possesses the document today.

Out of many fine things that were appropriately said of Samuel J. Roberts referring not only to his work as a newspaper man but his character as a citizen, this sketch must conclude with a brief quotation from a tribute paid by Judge Charles Kerr, who said:

"Samuel Judson Roberts came to Lexington twenty-five years ago. Immediately he became a citizen of Lexington. Her people became his people and her interests his interests. An alien it may be, but in the end a brother. His reception was not cordial, his mission was not received with favor. But the force, the power, the determination of that stranger was soon recognized, and in the years that have intervened no man has made a greater impress upon the community than has he, none so universally endeared himself to all classes.

"Never wavering, never compromising a single conviction, hewing to a line he himself had made, he yet drew to himself, silently, unconsciously, it may be, a strength and a following no one man in all this community possessed.

"No cause which he championed ever met an ignominious defeat, none which he opposed that did not feel the weight of his opposition.

"Nor did he ever use the great influence which he possessed for ignoble purposes. That for which he stood always had behind it the force of conviction. To him, more than all others combined, do Lexington and Fayette County owe the great change that has taken place in the conduct of our elections. No matter what the issue, no matter what the stake, he never receded from the one position he constantly espoused, that no victory was worth the gaining that was not gained by honest methods."

REV. AMBROSE REGER, O. S. B. In all that implies consecrated devotion have the able and earnest labors of the honored pastor of Sacred Heart Church at Corbin, Whitley County, been carried forward with a singleness of purpose and with fruitful results that must continue long to be of cumulative value in community life. His work has been not alone for the spiritual and temporal advancement of the Catholic parish over which he has pastoral charge, but also, and in a most significant way, for the furtherance of educational advantages in this mining district of Kentucky, where illiteracy has long been notable, owing to the circumstances and conditions of time and place, and his uplifting influence has touched with benignancy all phases of communal life in the field where his labors are staged. With self-abnegation and unremitting effort; with tireless energy and undaunted courage; with the loyal stewardship of one called to and fitted for high service, has he bent his energies to the work of his parish and to the development and upbuilding of St. Camillus Academy, a church institution that is doing a great and wonderful service in advancing educational standards in Eastern Kentucky. As pastor, priest, executive, citizen and man, Father Ambrose, as he is affectionately known, must be accorded recognition in this history if it is to justify its assigned functions as representing the Eastern, as well as the other parts of the fine old Blue Grass state.

Father Reger was born at Saulorn, in picturesque Bavaria, Germany, and the date of his nativity was July 1, 1872. He received his preliminary educational discipline in the Benedictine Monastery at Metten, Germany, where also he completed his classical and his initial philosophical courses of study, and in 1892 he came to the United States and entered St. Bernard's College of the Benedictine monastery at Cullman, Alabama. There he completed his courses in philosophical and theological lines, and on the 26th of February, 1897, he was ordained to the priesthood of the Catholic Church by Bishop Heslin, of the Diocese of Natchez, Mississippi. Thereafter, by reason of his specially high scholarship, he was retained as professor of dogmatic theology in the theological seminary of his alma mater, besides serving simultaneously as professor of Latin and mathematics in the college in which he had shortly before been graduated. He continued his services in this dual capacity until 1902, and for the last five years, 1898-1902, he served also as prior of the monastery.

In the year 1902, fortified both for his ecclesiastical functions and for effective educational work, Father Reger came to Corbin, Kentucky, and organized the parish of the Sacred Heart Church, over which he has maintained pastoral charge during the entire intervening period, the parish having been served previously under missionary auspices and having been attended by priests from Middlesboro, who had here conducted services of the church once each month. Father Reger has supervision also of the missions at East Bernstadt, London, Barbourville, Jellico and Gatliff, Kentucky, and it may readily be understood that large and varied are the demands placed upon his mind and heart as he labors zealously for the uplifting of his fellow men and follows as best he can in the footsteps of the Divine Master whom he serves. He has effected the erection of new church edifices at London, Barbourville and Gatliff, has infused spiritual and temporal zeal among the Catholic families of the large mountain district touched by his service, and has been specially successful in the upbuilding and unifying of the parish of the Sacred Heart Church at Corbin. He has as an efficient and valued assistant in his work Father Henry Watson, and in the local educational field he attributes advancement primarily to the able and devoted service of the Sisters of Divine Providence, who preside over St. Camillus Academy. Of so great importance is the work of his school that a specific review of its history will be given in later paragraphs.

Father Ambrose Reger is a son of Francis and Katharine (Strobel) Reger, both natives of Bavaria, Germany, where the former was born in 1827 and the latter in 1830. Both passed their entire lives in their native province, where the father died in 1897 and the mother in 1902. Francis Reger, a man of superior mentality and sterling character, devoted his active career to farm industry, and both he and his wife were devout and zealous communicants of the Catholic Church, in the faith of which they carefully reared their children, the eldest of whom, Miss Anna, still resides at the old home in Bavaria; Rev. Michael is pastor of a Catholic Church in Griesbach, Bavaria; Sister Aniceta is a Franciscan nun in the convent at Mellersdorf, Bavaria; Father Ambrose, of this review, is the youngest of the surviving children; and ten children died before attaining to adult age.

A signal honor came to Father Ambrose Reger in the spring of 1921, when he was appointed dean of diocesan deanery at Lexington, a recognition which he has fully merited through his ability and service.

From an attractive brochure issued in 1920 in connection with St. Camillus Academy, and entitled "They Shall Know," are taken, with certain elimination and paraphrase, the following pertinent extracts, which are well worthy of reproduction in this connection.

"Eighteen years ago the present pastor of Sacred Heart Church, Rev. Ambrose Reger, O. S. B., was sent to Corbin to take charge of the church and missions. One of his first acts was to undertake the founding of a parish school. At that time the town had two schools, both being primary, no subjects being taught above the sixth grade. The larger of the two was managed by the Episcopalians, the other being the public school. In these early days Corbin's population numbered 800, there being but twelve Catholic families in the community. There was no residence for a priest, much less accommodations for a school. Plans were made at once to erect a suitable building to serve both purposes. Pending the erection of this building the school began its work on the first Monday in September, 1902, in the church, half of which had been curtained off for this purpose, with the pews serving in the joint capacity of seats and desks. The first day's attendance showed the enrollment of twenty-two pupils. The school and its efficient teacher was very popular from the beginning, so that in the course of the second year the attendance had grown to forty-five pupils. In the meantime the proposed building, a two-story frame structure, had been erected, and in the Easter week of 1903 the transfer from the church to the new school was made. Miss Annie Rauckman, a young lady from Alabama, was engaged as the first teacher, at the munificent salary of $25 a month. Unfortunately Miss Rauckman could not return for a third term, so Miss Virginia Reiss, of Louisville, taught Sacred Heart School from 1904 to 1905. She was succeeded by Miss Sarah O'Mahoney, of Lexington, who had charge of the school during the following three years. During all this time the school enjoyed the patronage of the best people of Corbin, irrespective of creed and denomination."

It should be noted incidentally that the school's maintenance in the early days depended largely upon financial aid obtained by Father Reger from extraneous sources, and that after the lapse of six years he made earnest efforts to place the school in charge of some Sisterhood of the church. Right Reverend Bishop Maes, of the Diocese of Covington, finally prevailed on the Sisters of Divine Providence, of Newport, to have pity on the little mountain child and to mother the little waif into vigorous life. Early in September, 1908, the first two Sisters of Providence arrived in Corbin.

At that time the school had six grades, with about fifty pupils, boys and girls, of whom about one-half were Protestants. From this time forward came consecutive growth and advancement, and the Sisters began to make plans for enlarging the school. In the winter of 1914-15 was purchased a tract of thirty-five acres of land within the corporate limits of the city. The following summer recorded the laying of the cornerstone of the new building, and at Easter-tide of 1915 the school was transferred to the new and handsome building and marked the beginning of St. Camillus Academy, of which the following consistent statement has been made: "St. Camillus has proven itself in every respect a great success." The future of the academy is most promising, and its field of usefulness is destined to expand with the accession of consecrated financial aid that is demanded and for which vigorous efforts are being put forth at the time of this writing. The academy is both a boarding and day school, and seventeen Sisters are retained in its pedagogic service. The school has classical, English, scientific and religious course, a well ordered commercial course, and excellent work is done in the teaching of mathematics, English, French, Latin, history, vocal and instrumental music, art, domestic science, etc. From this point follows further quotation from the same source as that from which were derived the preceding initial statements concerning the academy:

"The dull clouds of the past have rolled away and the future seems bright and sunny. The result of long years of work, labor and patience is about to be realized. This brings joy, not only to the good Sisters of Divine Providence, but also to other friends of the institution, who have made possible this wonderful progress. It also brings satisfaction to all in Kentucky who hold education sacred and seek to better the status of their fellow men. This era means the fulfillment of love's labor, and means the realization of St. Camillus ranking with the best educational institutions of the state. Spacious laboratories, dormitories, domestic-science rooms, gymnasium and a new chapel, which were by far the most pressing needs of St. Camillus Academy, are more than a dream, they are about to become a reality. In no other section of the country could such an addition to a building possibly mean so much, for here is the vast territory which is known as the most illiterate section of Kentucky and the United States in general. Lying snugly among the hills and adjacent to this vast tract of land stands St. Camillus Academy, a place of refuge, an oasis in the desert where these thirsty souls may drink at the fountain of knowledge and where life to them can begin anew.

"Rev. Ambrose Reger, O. S. B., has given his services to the academy during the past eighteen years absolutely without remuneration. He has donated his best energies toward building up the academy. The people of the diocese owe an everlasting debt to Rev. Ambrose Reger for his services in building up this institution, and it is becoming that they do their part in the present undertaking, and thereby encourage Father Ambrose Reger and the good Sisters in their great and unselfish labor."

WILLIAM J. LOGSDON. The initiative and executive ability of this progressive young business man has come effectively into play in his service as cashier of the Security State Bank in the City of Corbin, Whitley County, a position which he assumed on the 15th of January, 1921. The bank opened for business on August 20th of the preceding year, and it occupies a modern brick building erected for its use on First Street, the equipment of the institution being of the most approved modern type, and the facilities being in consonance with the substantial and constantly expanding business. Operations are based on a capital stock of $25,000, deposits now aggregate $85,000, and the surplus fund is $2,500. D. F. Brown is president of the bank and G. F. Weaver its vice president. It has secure place as one of the substantial and well-ordered banking institutions of this section of the state, and its service touches closely the civic and material interests of the community in which it is established.

William Jennings Logsdon was born in the City of Owensboro, judicial center of Daviess County, Kentucky, on the 16th of November, 1895, and is a son of John W. and Katherine (Wagner) Logsdon, who still reside in that city, the father having been born in Hart County, this state, in 1856, and the mother having been born in Southern Indiana in 1857. John W. Logsdon was reared and educated in his native county, and is a son of the late John Logsdon, who was a pioneer farmer in Hart County, where he continued to reside until his death. As a young man John W. Logsdon established his residence in the City of Owensboro, and there he served sixteen years as chief of the fire department. He has been influential in political and civic affairs in that city, is a democrat in faith and service, and he and his wife are communicants of the Catholic Church. In his home city he is actively affiliated with the Knights of Columbus. Of the children the eldest is Claude S., who is a successful contractor and builder at Owensboro; Clarence W., is a progressive farmer near Maceo, Daviess County; Edwin W., is employed in a leading department store in the City of St. Louis, Missouri; and William J., of this review, is the youngest of the number.

After having attended St. Francis Academy in his native city William J. Logsdon there completed a course in the Central Normal Business College, in which he was graduated as a member of the class of 1915. He then became a messenger in the service of the National Deposit Bank of Owensboro, and by his efficiency he won promotion to the position of paying teller in this institution, with which he continued his association in this capacity until 1918, when he became individual-deposit bookkeeper in the National Bank of Commerce in the City of Louisville. One year later, in connection with the nation's war activities, he became civilian clerk in the construction division at Camp Taylor, near Louisville, in which service he continued eight months, at the expiration of which he became teller in the National Bank of Middlesboro, Whitley County, where he continued his service until he was called to his present office, that of cashier of the Security State Bank at Corbin. Mr. Logsdon has identified himself fully and loyally with the interests of the community in which he has established his home, and is popular in both business and social circles. He is a democrat in politics, and he and his wife are communicants of the Catholic Church. Mr. Logsdon did his part in the furtherance of war service in his native city, aided in the drives in support of the Government loans, savings stamps, Red Cross and Knights of Columbus work, etc., and made his personal financial subscriptions of consistent liberality.

On the 5th of December, 1920, at Jeffersonville, Indiana, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Logsdon to Miss Mary Greenwell, daughter of Nicholas Greenwell, who is engaged in the lumber business at New Haven, Kentucky. Mrs. Logsdon was graduated in a Louisville seminary for young women, and is of the gracious personality which makes for unqualified social popularity.

ALLAN W. BAKER has been established in the successful practice of law at McKee, judicial center of Jackson County, since 1889, and is recognized as one of the able members of the bar of this section of his native state. His great-great-grandfather (Renta Dan) John Baker, a native of North Carolina, became a pioneer settler in Owsley County, Kentucky, where he was a member of a substantial colony of North Carolina families who settled within the borders of the county at a time when it was practically a wilderness. As a resourceful farmer this sterling pioneer contributed his quota to the civic and industrial development and upbuilding of Owsley County, where he died at an extremely venerable age. His son, Julius Bob Baker, great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch, passed his entire life in Owsley County, where he followed farm enterprise throughout his active career and where he stood exponent of loyal communal spirit. His son, Boston, grandfather of him whose name initiates this review, was born in Owsley County in the year 1800, and as he was a representative of the third generation of the family in that county, the date of his birth indicates that the family name must have been associated with the earliest stages of development in that county. He continued his residence in his native county until about 1845, when he removed to Clay County, where he continued his activities as a farmer until the close of his life. He was a loyal soldier of the Union in the Civil war and lived less than a decade after its close, his death having occurred in the year 1874. His wife, whose maiden name was Sallie Rogers, was born and reared in Clay County and was a resident of Owsley County at the time of her death. Their son, George W., was born in Owsley County, in 1832, and died at Manchester, Clay County, in 1898, he having been killed in connection with a feud existing among the Baker, Howard and White families. His marriage to Rachel Strong was solemnized in Clay County, she having been born in Breathitt County, in 1837, and her death having occurred on the home farm in 1888. This farm, ten miles north of Manchester, continued to be the residence of George W. Baker until the death of his wife, in 1888, when he removed to Manchester, where he continued to be engaged in the practice of law until his tragic death. He was a man of strong mentality and had effectively equipped himself for the profession in the work of which he was engaged. He served four terms as county attorney of Clay County, was a republican in politics, and had much of leadership in public sentiment and action in his community. Of his children the eldest, Thomas J., who was born in 1861, likewise became a victim of the family feud already mentioned, he having been killed in 1889 and having been at the time a prosperous farmer in Clay County; Allan W., of this sketch, was the next in order of birth; Anderson C. is a farmer in Laurel County; Wiley B. owns and conducts a general store in Clay County; Gardner is a farmer in that county; Iby, who resides at Berea, Madison County, is the widow of Christopher Jackson, who was a merchant at London, Laurel County, at the time of his death; Annie is the wife of George Hays, a farmer near McKee, Jackson County; D. H. is engaged in the practice of law at McKee; Abner, likewise a lawyer by profession, is engaged in practice at Fresno, California; Robert is a prosperous farmer in Jackson County; and Sallie, who resides in Clay County, is the widow of Carlo L. White, who was a farmer and merchant in that county.

Allan Wilson Baker was born in Clay County, Kentucky, on the 23d of January, 1864, and after having profited by the advantages of the rural schools he pursued a higher course of study in the academy at Burning Springs. He left school when nineteen years of age and thereafter studied law under the effective preceptorship of his father. He made substantial advancement in the assimilation of the science of jurisprudence, and was admitted to the Kentucky bar a few days after attaining to his legal majority. For one year thereafter he was engaged in practice at Hyden, Leslie County, and he then established himself in practice at Manchester, judicial center of his native county, where he remained until 1889, when, after the assassination of his elder brother in connection with the family feud already mentioned, he determined to emancipate himself from the workings of the ancient enmity, and accordingly he removed in that year to the county seat of Jackson County, where he has since been established in the practice of his profession, with secure vantage-ground as a resourceful trial lawyer and well fortified counsellor. His practice has involved his appearance in many important contests in both the criminal and civic departments of law, and his reputation in his profession is founded on work successfully achieved by him. He owns his office building and residence property on Water Street, and is one of the progressive and public-spirited citizens of McKee. Mr. Baker is the owner of five farms in Jackson County, with a total area of 200 acres, and he has besides his home place another residence property at McKee.

Mr. Baker has been a leader in the councils and campaign activities of the democratic party in Jackson County, and in the primaries of 1919 his name appeared as candidate for nomination to the office of attorney general of Kentucky, but though he made an excellent showing he failed to receive the nomination. He is a stockholder in the Owsley County Deposit Bank at Booneville, and in a fraternal way is affiliated with McKee Lodge No. 217, Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He was a vigilant and influential worker in furthering the success of the Jackson County drives in support of the various Government loans and other war activities in connection with the World war, made liberal investments in bonds and contributed his quota to the support of Red Cross and Young Men's Christian Association activities.

January 1, 1901, recorded the marriage of Mr. Baker to Miss Sylvania A. Bennett, who was born and reared in Jackson County, and who is a daughter of the late Robert and Sarah (Hamilton) Bennett, her father having been a substantial farmer near McKee. In conclusion is given brief record concerning the children of Mr. and Mrs. Baker: Cleo K., who was born in the year 1903, was graduated in Berea College, in Madison County, and is, in 1921, a successful and popular teacher in the public schools of that county; Marion E., who was born in 1905, is a student in Berea College; and Sylvia, who was born July 11, 1909, is a student in the public schools at McKee.

D. GRANT COLLIER. The president of the Jackson County Bank at McKee is a native son of the county and is a citizen whose high standing in the community makes specially consistent his recognition in this history. He has wielded large and benignant influence in connection with civic and business affairs in his native county, and stands as a true apostle of progress and prosperity.

Mr. Collier was born on the homestead farm of his father near Welchburg, Jackson County, on the 3d of September, 1868. His grandfather, David Collier, who was born in Virginia, in 1793, became a pioneer settler and substantial farmer of Wolfe County, Kentucky, where he passed the remainder of his life. George W. Collier, father of the subject of this review, was born in Lee County, Virginia, in 1830, and died at London, Laurel County, Kentucky, in 1906. He was reared to manhood in his native county, and in that state was solemnized his marriage to Miss Sarah Flanery, who was born in Wise County, Virginia, in 1833, and who since his death has continued to maintain her home at London, Kentucky. George W. Collier came to Owsley County, Kentucky, about the year 1855, and there he continued his activities as a farmer until the late '60s, when he removed to Jackson County and settled on the farm near Welchburg, which continued to be his home until about 1903, when he removed to London, Laurel County—largely for the purpose of securing proper medical service, his health having been greatly impaired at the time and his death having there occurred about three years later. He was a republican, and while he had no desire for public office he served one term as assessor of Jackson County. He was a zealous member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, as is also his widow, and was affiliated with the Masonic fraternity. He was a valiant young soldier of the Union in the Civil war, in which he served as a member of Company D, Sixth Kentucky Cavalry, with which fine command he continued in active service three years and participated in many important engagements, including the battles of Shiloh, Stone River, Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge. He contributed much to the civic and industrial advancement of Jackson County, where he improved one of the valuable farm properties of this section of the state and where his sterling character ever gave him secure place in popular esteem.

At this juncture is consistently entered brief record concerning the children of George W. and Sarah (Flanery) Collier: Jane is the widow of J. H. Hughes and resides at Winchester, Clark County, her husband having been a representative farmer in that county; Filmore is a resident of Jackson, Breathitt County; Nancy E., who died in 1920, was the wife of John C. Bowling, M. D., who is engaged in the practice of his profession at London, Laurel County; Cynthia L. is the widow of Daniel Reid and resides on her home farm near London, Laurel County, the death of her husband having there occurred in December, 1920; James R., a traveling salesman by vocation, resides in the City of Knoxville, Tennessee; D. Grant, of this review, was the next in order of birth; Virginia is the wife of G. C. Goodman, M. D., who is engaged in practice at Welchburg, Jackson County; Sherman was a successful farmer in Laurel County at the time of his death, in 1905.

D. Grant Collier passed the period of his childhood and early youth on the old home farm, and after having profited by the advantages of the rural schools he continued his studies at Williamsburg Institute and the high school at East Bernstadt. At the age of sixteen years he proved himself eligible for pedagogic honor and became a successful teacher in the rural schools of Jackson County. After having been thus engaged three years he was for eighteen months employed in a general store at Welchburg, and the next three years, 1890-92, found him employed in the office of the collector of customs for the Kentucky district in the City of Louisville. Thereafter he completed the work of two full terms in the law department of the University of Louisville, and in 1892 he was admitted to the bar at McKee, judicial center of Jackson County. In that year he here engaged in the active general practice of his profession, and he has gained and maintained secure vantage ground as one of the able and representative members of the bar of his native county. He served most effectively as county attorney from 1898 to 1902, and he then resumed the private practice of law at McKee. He interrupted his professional work by one year of service as storekeeper and gauger in the United States Internal Revenue Service, with headquarters at Lawrenceburg, Anderson County. In November, 1905, Mr. Collier was elected county clerk of Jackson County, and by re-election in 1909 he continued the incumbent of this office eight years. While he still gives more or less attention to the work of his profession, he has since 1914 owned and conducted the leading general merchandise store at McKee, where he has also been president of the Jackson County State Bank since the year 1911. He is a stockholder in the Henry Clay Fire Insurance Company of Lexington, Kentucky, and has substantial and valuable real estate interests in Jackson County, including his handsome and modern residence property on Wall street, McKee. Mr. Collier, a man of vision, loyalty and civic liberality, has had much of leadership in the communal life of his native county, and he has been specially prominent in connection with the councils and campaign activities of the republican party in this section of the state. It is interesting to record that he is serving as chairman of the Republican County Committee of Jackson County, especially in view of the fact that his honored father held this position for many years. He and his wife are leading members of the Reformed Church at McKee, in which he is serving as an elder. He is past master of William McKinley Lodge No. 793, Free and Accepted Masons, at McKee, where he is also past grand of Clark Lodge No. 217, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and he is affiliated also with the Modern Woodmen of America and the Knights of Pythias.

As may readily be understood, Mr. Collier was one of the foremost in connection with local war activities during America's participation in the World war, and his wife was scarcely less active and influential, besides which they gave the elder of their two sons to the nation's military service with the American Expeditionary Forces in France. Mr. Collier was chairman of the united war work campaign in Jackson County, and in this drive the county made a splendid record, by raising more than its assigned quota in support of the various Government bond issues and other war measures. He served on the fuel administration board of the county, and on committees in charge of Red Cross and Young Men's Christian Association work, as well as on those in supervision of the various drives for the sale of Liberty and Victory bonds, savings stamps, etc., the while his personal subscriptions were among the most loyal and liberal recorded in the county.

At Greenhall, Jackson County, in the year 1895, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Collier to Miss Fannie Minter, daughter of William E. and Eliza (Carmack) Minter, the latter of whom is deceased. Mr. Minter is one of the representative farmers in the vicinity of Greenhall. Mrs. Collier, a woman of culture and gracious presence, has been a leader in the social activities of McKee, and besides this she has the distinction of being postmistress of this village, an office of which she has been the efficient and popular incumbent since 1914. She was a most zealous and earnest factor in local war activities, as previously intimated in this review, and handled all of the war savings stamps sold in Jackson County, with a record of having sold stamps to the value of $22,000. Mrs. Collier completed her education by attending the Kentucky University in the City of Lexington.

In this concluding paragraph is offered brief record concerning the children of Mr. and Mrs. Collier: Hugh M., who was born January 1, 1896, remains at the parental home and is assistant cashier of the Jackson County Bank. He represented his native county as a gallant young soldier in the World war, and was in service in France for a period of eleven months. He won advancement to the office of second lieutenant and continued his service with the American Expeditionary Forces until the armistice brought hostilities to a close. He was in the Meuse Argonne offensive. He was graduated in the McKee High School and also in the Kentucky University at Lexington, from which he received the degree of Civil Engineer. Harry E., the youngest son, was born in 1903, was graduated in the high school at Maryville, Tennessee, as a member of the class of 1920, and is now a traveling salesman, while remaining a member of the parental home circle. Lucile F., who was born in 1906, is a member of the class of 1922 in the Sue Bennett Memorial School at London, Laurel County. The second son, D. Grant, Jr., was born in 1898 and died in the following year, aged one year and four months.

WILLIAM CUNAGIM is engaged in the successful practice of law at McKee, judicial center of Jackson County, and that he is a representative lawyer of this county is more gratifying to note by reason of the fact that he is a native son of the county and a scion of one of its sterling pioneer families. His paternal grandfather, Wiley Cunagim, was born and reared in Virginia, where his marriage occurred and whence he and his wife shortly afterward immigrated to Kentucky and settled in Owsley County, where they remained until about 1845. They then removed to Jackson County, where he obtained land and became one of the substantial pioneer farmers in the vicinity of Peoples. Both he and his wife, whose family name was Angell, here passed the remainder of their lives. Their son, Lewis, father of the subject of this sketch, was born in Owsley County, in 1841, and thus was a child at the time of the family removal to Jackson County, where he was reared on the old home farm and where he became a successful farmer in the vicinity of Parrot. He continued as one of the prosperous farmers and honored citizens of that locality until his death, in 1897. He was a republican in politics, served one term as justice of the peace and was influential in community affairs, though he had no ambition for public office. He became a clergyman of the Baptist Church, and his earnest services as a minister in Jackson County were continued many years. Further honor attaches to his name by reason of the gallant service which he gave as a soldier of the Union in the Civil war. In 1863 he enlisted as a member of the Forty-seventh Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and with this command he continued in active service eighteen months, within which he participated in a number of skirmishes and other minor engagements. Shortly after the close of the war he married Miss Angeline Forbush, who was born in the Middlefork District of Jackson County in 1848, and who survived him a number of years, she having remained on the old home farm near Parrot, until her death, in 1912, and she likewise having been a devout member of the Baptist Church. Wiley, the eldest of the children, is a farmer in the vicinity of Parrot; Nancy Ann became the wife of S. J. Nelson, a farmer in that same locality, and there her death occurred; Rachel is the wife of Jeremiah Lakes, a farmer near Loam, Jackson County; William, of this sketch, was the next in order of birth; Daniel and Clark are successful representatives of farm industry near the old home place, and Clark conducts also a general store; Lizzie is the wife of W. M. Morris, a farmer near Middlefork, Jackson County; Lewis is a merchant at McKee, where he also owns and operates a flour mill; John is a farmer near Parrot; Miss Lucy resides at McKee, the judicial center of her native county.

William Cunagim early gained practical experience in connection with the activities of the home farm, and in the meantime he profited by the advantages of the rural schools of the locality. He continued to attend school at intervals until he had attained to the age of thirty-two years, and he was associated with the operation of his father's farm until he was twenty-one years old, when he initiated independent farm enterprise. After being thus engaged six years he was for eight years a successful and popular traveling salesman through Kentucky, where he sold boots and shoes and dry goods. He thus continued his service until 1913, when he began preparing himself for the legal profession. To compass this end he took a course in the Chicago Correspondence School of Law, and applied himself so effectively in this connection with the excellent institution in the great western metropolis that he made substantial advancement in his studies, which were continued six months under the preceptorship of the law firm of Little & Moore of McKee. Thereafter he attended the law department of the Kentucky University at Lexington, for one term, besides there gaining valuable experience in real court practice under Judge Lafferty. He was admitted to the bar in the year 1916, and has since been engaged in active general practice at McKee, where his ability and personal popularity have gained to him a representative clientage and given him secure standing at the bar of his native county.

Mr. Cunagim is inflexible in his allegiance to the republican party, he holds membership in the Missionary Baptist Church, as did also his wife, and his fraternal affiliations are as here noted: Pond Fork Lodge No. 601, Free and Accepted Masons, at Bond; McWhorter Lodge No. 245, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, at McWhorter. Loyal and effective aid was given by him in connection with the various local activities in the period of the World war, and as a citizen he is deeply interested in all that concerns the well-being of his native county and state.

In 1912 Mr. Cunagim wedded Miss Jane Combs, who likewise was born and reared in Jackson County and whose death occurred in 1914. She was not survived by children. Mrs. Cunagim was a daughter of Martin Combs, who is a farmer near Parrot, and her mother, whose maiden name was Aley Combs, is deceased.

LEVI W. POWELL has demonstrated in his native county distinctive success proclivities in connection with farm industry and no less of executive ability in his administration as Circuit Court clerk of the county. He is now the incumbent of the office mentioned and is one of the efficient and popular officials of Jackson County. He was born on his father's farm, in the northern part of Jackson County, on the 8th of July, 1882, and is a representative in the fourth generation of a family that was founded in this country by his great-grandfather, Abraham Powell, in the pioneer days, this sterling pioneer having been a native of North Carolina and having reclaimed and improved a productive farm after establishing his home in Jackson County, Kentucky, where he passed the remainder of his life. His son, Calvin, grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born on the ancestral homestead in this county March 15, 1835, was long numbered among the vigorous and successful exponents of farm enterprise in the county and is now one of its venerable and honored citizens. He is living virtually retired after many years of productive endeavor, and resides near Kirby Knob, this county. His wife, whose maiden name was Rosa Rogers, passed her entire life in Jackson County and was well advanced in years at the time of her death. Larkin A. Powell, father of him whose name introduces this article, was born in Jackson County in the year 1859, and here his death occurred in 1896. In connection with farm enterprise he fully upheld the prestige of the family name, and for a number of years he conducted a general store at Brazil, this county, where in the meantime he gave loyal service as a member of the school board. His political convictions were manifested in his adherence to the cause of the republican party, he was affiliated with the Masonic fraternity, and both he and his wife were earnest and helpful members of the Baptist Church. Mrs. Powell, whose maiden name was Mary Belle Rose, was born in Jackson County in 1866, and here her death occurred in 1889. Of the children the eldest was Albert Curtis, who was serving as a soldier in the Spanish-American war at the time of his death, when eighteen years of age, his remains being interred in a cemetery in the City of Lexington, Kentucky; Levi W., of this review, was the second in order of birth; Ollie Elizabeth, whose death occurred in 1919, was the wife of Dillard Durham, who is a prosperous farmer near Sand Gap, Jackson County; Sarah Ella is the widow of Newton J. Coyle and resides at Foxtown this county, where her husband was engaged in the general merchandise business at the time of his death; and George W.

is a farmer in the Sand Gap district of his native county. For his second wife Larkin A. Powell married Maggie Coyle, who was born in the year 1873 and who passed her entire life in Jackson County, where her death occurred in 1901, she likewise having been a zealous member of the Baptist Church. Of the second marriage were born three children: Maude Lee is the wife of Elmer Clemmons, and they reside in the City of Lexington, this state, where Mr. Clemmons is a street-car conductor; Frank Leslie is a farmer near McKee, judicial center of Jackson County; and Lillie May died at the age of twenty-one years.

In gaining his rudimentary education Levi W. Powell availed himself of the advantages of the rural or district school near the home farm, and thereafter he continued his studies in the public schools at Hyden, Leslie County, and the high school at Berea, Madison County, in which he was graduated as a member of the class of 1902. For seven years after leaving school he did effective work as a traveling salesman of fruit trees, a vocation to which he gave his attention during a period of seven years, within which he also engaged in independent farm enterprise in his home county. He became also a successful merchant at Sand Gap, where he conducted a well equipped general store until 1915, in November of which year he was elected to his present office, that of Circuit Court clerk of Jackson County. He assumed his official duties in January, 1916, for a term of six years, and removed to the county seat, McKee, where he has since maintained his residence. He was re-elected to the office in 1921. While a resident of Sand Gap he there served as a member of the school board, and he still takes vital interest in educational matters and all else concerning the well-being of his native county. His political allegiance is given to the republican party, he and his wife are active members of the Presbyterian Church, and he is affiliated with William McKinley Lodge No. 793, Free and Accepted Masons, at the county seat, and also with McKee Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics. Mr. Powell is still an influential representative of modern farm industry in his native county, where he owns a well improved and valuable farm of 255 acres 1½ miles east of McKee, and he is the owner of another good farm, of 100 acres, near Sand Springs, this county.

During American participation in the World war Mr. Powell showed no apathetic or casual interest, but was alert and patriotic in furthering the war service activities in his home county, where he aided in the drives for subscriptions to the Government war bonds and savings stamps and also made personal investments to the consistent limit of his available resources.

December 17, 1903, recorded the marriage of Mr. Powell to Miss Sallie Ann Harrison, who likewise was born and reared in Jackson County, her father, Lafayette Harrison, being a representative farmer in the vicinity of Sand Gap, this county, and her mother, whose maiden name was Edith Jane Lakes, being deceased. Mr. and Mrs. Powell have six children, whose names and respective dates of birth are here made a matter of record: Leonard, May 18, 1906; Laura Belle, August 25, 1908; Leslie, born in 1910; Larkin, August 25, 1915; Logan A., 1917; and Lawrence, February, 1921.

RUFUS LISLE was one of the stalwart Kentuckians of the last century, a noted business man, owner of several large farms, and well known for years through his active interest in the turf and track. His home for many years was at "Lisland," the farm and home where Mrs. Lisle and her daughters still reside. This country homestead is two miles northwest of Lexington on the Leestown Pike, and is a place of historic interest and has many associations with the Lisle family.

The late Rufus Lisle was born in 1818 in Clark County, near the Kentucky River, not far from old Boonesboro. His parents were James and Nancy Lisle, both of whom lived out their lives in Clark County. Rufus Lisle married at Boonesboro in 1849, Mary Margaret Halley, who was born in that historical locality August 10, 1829, a daughter of Samuel and Miriam (Elkins) Halley. For some years after their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Lisle lived at Winchester, where he conducted a hotel. Then removing to Lexington, in partnership with his father-in-law, Samuel Halley, he bought the Broadway Hotel, which stood on the corner now occupied by a Piggly-Wiggly store. He conducted that hotel several years. In the meantime Samuel Halley bought at Paynes Depot in Scott County property on which he duplicated his old home at Boonesboro. That house burned, but was rebuilt, and Samuel Halley lived there until his death, being killed at a railroad crossing. Rufus Lisle continued the hotel and then engaged in farming at White Sulphur in Franklin County. Later he did an extensive business as a mule buyer and trader at Lexington in company with Mr. Hall. In conjunction with that business he owned a farm four miles from Lexington on Leestown Pike. He acquired the property now known as Lisland about 1870. There stood on the land an old colonial brick house, and in that property he lived out his life and died there November 15, 1891. He owned about two hundred acres in Lisland, also a farm of similar extent further out, and another place of five hundred acres near Georgetown in Scott County.

Rufus Lisle was one of the founders and a director of the Fayette National Bank. He also owned a large rice plantation in Louisiana and visited that property yearly. The practical operations of his Kentucky farm largely devolved upon tenants. Lisland he made noted as the home and breeding ground of some splendid race horses, and he bred several Derby winners. He was exceedingly fond of that sport, which constituted his amusement and recreation. He was never an aspirant for public office, was a man of retiring disposition, and belonged to no church or fraternity. He was philanthropic by nature, gave liberally to the poor, and many a man now successful in life recalls with special gratitude some assistance given him in his early struggles by Rufus Lisle. He lived to a good old age, but was active in business until the last.

Some years after his death Mrs. Lisle built the present house at Lisland. This house was constructed from plans selected by Mrs. Lisle and her daughters. The old farm remains about the same in extent, and its successful operation is largely in the hands of Miss Virginia Lisle. Mrs. Lisle is past ninety, but takes much interest in life and the affairs around her. She is a devoted member of the Broadway Christian Church. The home of the Lisle family has long been noted for its hospitality, and is one of the real social centers of the community. Mrs. Lisle and her daughters have given much of their time to church, club and social activities, and the daughters were especially interested in the Red Cross during the World war. Their home is a large and commodious residence in the midst of a grove of native trees and though convenient to the city advantages of Lexington it still retains all the charm of the country.

Mrs. Lisle was the mother of ten children, eight of whom reached mature years. Her son Samuel was drowned at the age of twenty-one. James Lisle became a lawyer by profession, practiced at Lexington, spent some years in the west and engaged in farming in Scott County until on account of ill health he retired to Versailles, where he died in 1916. He married Miss Patty Williams, and is survived by two children, Rufus, a farmer in Jessamine County, and Lillian, at home with her mother. Lizzie Lisle died at the age of twenty-five. Fanny, the second daughter, was killed in a runaway accident and was also twenty-five at the time of her death. Virginia and Nancy both live at home, and Virginia has shown the rare qualities of a successful farm manager. Miriam is Mrs. G. N. Pettit and lives with her mother and sisters. Halley, the only living son, is a rancher at Quemado, New Mexico. He married Mary Stoll of Lexington, daughter of Charles Stoll, long an active member of the Lexington bar and later of New York City. Halley Lisle and wife have four children: Halley, Jr.; Charles Stoll; Rufus and Thomas Kinnaird.

PETE S. WHITLOCK, high sheriff of Madison County, is a man of resourcefulness and has proved his personal qualifications in an experience that has covered a wide range of activities from a western cowboy and motorman on a street car to handling the duties of one of the most important of county offices. He was also county assessor one term.

Sheriff Whitlock was born near Kirksville, in Madison County, September 26, 1867. His grandfather was a Virginian, a farmer in Culpeper County all his life. Richard Whitlock, father of Sheriff Whitlock, was born at Gordonsville in Culpeper County in October, 1829, lived there until the death of his father while he was still a boy, and then came to Madison County, Kentucky, and grew up in the home of his uncle, Frank Long. As a young man he turned his efforts to agriculture and earned a well merited success in that vocation. He lived in Madison County until 1881, when he removed to Fayette County and continued farming there for many years. He died in January, 1917, while visiting near Whitehall, at Foxton in Madison County. He held such offices as magistrate and constable, was a democrat and a very devoted member of the Christian Church. He was also a Royal Arch Mason. Richard Whitlock married in Madison County Elizabeth Tudor, who was born in that county in 1831 and died in Jessamine County in 1876. She was the mother of ten children: George, a merchant at Kirksville, who died at the age of twenty-four; William, a farmer near Kirksville; Albert, a farmer who died near Kirksville in 1886; Richard, a merchant and farmer who died at Lexington; Robert, a farmer who died at Lexington in 1904; Thomas, who lives on his farm near Kirksville; Alice, who died in Fayette County in 1886, wife of Tinsley West, who is a farmer near Sulphur Well in Jessamine County; P. S. Whitlock; Mollie, who died in Texas in 1901, wife of Speed Taylor, a farmer near Fort Worth; and Amanda, wife of Joe Long, a magistrate and farmer near Kirksville. Richard Whitlock married for his second wife Elizabeth Stinnett, who was born in Fayette County and died there in 1891. By this union there were four children: Charles, deceased; John, a merchant at Lexington; Annie, wife of Will White, and living on her father's old homestead in Fayette County; and Sam, a farmer at Valley View in Madison County.

Pete S. Whitlock lived on his father's farm until he was thirteen, and during that time attended rural schools. On leaving home he began earning his own living as a farm laborer in Madison County, and at the age of twenty went to Texas, first locating at Sherman, then in Clay County, and his experience as a cowboy also took him over the Red River into Indian Territory. For two years he was a merchant at Dallas. After being away 5½ years Mr. Whitlock returned in 1893 and was engaged in farming near Richmond until 1906. He then removed to Lexington and was a street car motorman about eighteen months and then was employed in railway shops about eight months. In 1908 Mr. Whitlock bought a farm at Kirksville, and Madison County people knew him first in the role of an enterprising and successful farmer. He still owns a farm of 100 acres near Ruthton, Madison County, and another place of thirty-eight acres on Muddy Creek.

Mr. Whitlock in 1913 was elected county assessor, an office he filled from 1914 to 1918. In November, 1917, he was elected sheriff, and is now rounding out his term of four years, with offices in the courthouse. In his official capacity and as a loyal citizen he gave an effective hand to assisting in all the patriotic activities of Madison County during the World war. He is a democrat, a member of the Christian Church, and is affiliated with Madison Lodge No. 183, A. F. and A. M., Madison Lodge No. 14, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Floating Canoe Tribe No. 76, Improved Order of Red Men, Lexington Council No. 24, Junior Order United American Mechanics, and the Knights of Pythias.

In 1891, at Richmond, he married Miss Annie Long, daughter of William N. and Martha E. (Turner) Long, substantial farmers of Madison County. Sheriff and Mrs. Whitlock have four children: Eva, book-keeper in her father's office, wife of Ed Warford, who is deputy sheriff under Mr. Whitlock; James, also his father's deputy; Elizabeth, attending the eighth grade; and William in the fourth grade of the public schools at Richmond.

JAMES W. WAGERS, Circuit Court clerk of Madison County, has given practically all his time and fidelity to this county office since he left school and began his independent career. Mr. Wagers represents an old family of Madison County. His grandfather, Ambrose Wagers, was a native of Virginia and was one of the early settlers near Waco in Madison County, and lived there until his death. He was a blacksmith by trade, but he established and developed the old Wagers homestead two miles south of Waco. His first wife was Miss Parks, a native of Estill County, who died on the farm near Waco. His second wife, Sallie Ann Boyd, was born in Estill County in 1820, a daughter of John G. Boyd, who had been a soldier in the Revolutionary army. She died on the old farm in February, 1889. Of her five sons one was the late W. Joe Wagers, and two others are still living, A. B., a livestock commission dealer at the Union Stockyards in Cincinnati; and B. P. Wagers, a farmer at Richmond.

W. Joe Wagers spent all his life at Waco, Kentucky, where he was born June 3, 1858, and died March 16, 1915. His energies were effectively bestowed upon his extensive farming interests in that community. He was a democrat, and a leading member of the Baptist Church. He married Amelia Thorpe, who was born in Madison County, May 4, 1857, and is still living at the old homestead.

James W. Wagers, only son of his parents, was born at Waco, October 7, 1877. He attended the rural schools, completed his junior year in Central University at Richmond, and after leaving university in 1899 assisted his father on the home farm until December, 1901. At that date he became deputy Circuit Court clerk of Madison County under his uncle, S. H. Thorpe. Two years later, when Roy C. White succeeded to the circuit clerkship, he was retained as deputy, and continued so for twelve years. In November, 1915, he was the successful candidate for election as Circuit Court clerk, and began his six year term January 1, 1916. He received the democratic nomination as candidate for re-election in 1921.

Mr. Wagers is a member of the Baptist Church and is prominent in fraternal circles, being a member of Richmond Lodge No. 25, F. and A. M., Richmond Chapter No. 16, R. A. On September 12, 1916, at Waco, he married Elizabeth Searcy, daughter of C. L. and Mollie (Covington) Searcy, of Waco. Her father is a farmer and also president of the Waco Bank. Mrs. Wagers is a graduate of the Madison Female Institute of Richmond. They have two children, Charles Searcy, born September 3, 1917; and Edith Woods, born December 19, 1919.

BEN F. EDWARDS has to his credit at least twenty-five years of work in educational affairs in Kentucky. He is the present superintendent of schools for Madison County, with official headquarters in Richmond. He comes of a family of educators and professional people, and nearly all his brothers and sisters at some time or other have taught school.

Superintendent Edwards was born in Estill County, Kentucky, September 9, 1874. His grandfather, George Edwards, was a physician and surgeon, practiced his profession for many years in Lee County, Virginia, where he was born, but late in life moved to Jackson County, Kentucky, where he died. Frank Edwards, father of Ben F., was born in Lee County, Virginia, in 1840, was reared there, and about the close of the Civil war moved to Estill County, Kentucky. In the Civil war he was a Union soldier, having enlisted in 1861 in the Kentucky cavalry. He was all through the struggle, participating in the battles of Murfreesboro, Vicksburg, Missionary Ridge, Lookout Mountain and Chickamauga and other campaigns. He married in Estill County, and there acquired some very extensive interests as a farmer and land owner. While still superintending his farming affairs he moved, in 1889, to College Hill in order to give his children the advantages of the very excellent schools there. He died at College Hill in Madison County in 1912. He was a republican and for a number of years held the office of deputy sheriff in Estill County. Another intimate attachment was his membership in the Baptist Church, and he was a member of the Masonic fraternity. Frank Edwards married Nancy Chaney, who was born in Estill County in 1849, and is still living at College Hill. They had a large family of fourteen children, and all those that reached mature years, except one, taught school. The oldest, James, taught during his early life in Estill County and later was a civil engineer at College Hill, where he died at the age of fifty-two. John, who also was a school teacher, died at College Hill at the age of thirty-seven. Lucy, the third child, died when twelve years of age. Rebecca is the wife of J. A. French, a banker at Freelandville, Indiana. The fifth in age is Ben F. Edwards. B. J. Edwards and George G. Edwards both became physicians and practiced at Corbin, Kentucky, where Dr. B. J. still lives and where George G. died at the age of thirty-eight. Alice is the wife of W. M. Mellon, a retired merchant at College Hill. Edward E. is also a physician and surgeon, practicing at Irvine. G. L. Edwards is a farmer living at College Hill. Lula died at the age of five years, and the next in age, also a daughter, died in infancy. W. S. Edwards for a number of years has been a professor in Union College at Barbourville. The youngest of the family, C. M. Edwards, is station agent for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company at Ravenna, Kentucky.

Ben F. Edwards acquired his early advantages in the rural schools of Estill County, and was fifteen years of age when, in 1889, the family moved to College Hill. There he attended public school, graduating from high school and also gaining the equivalent of the freshman year in college. He completed his junior year in the University of Kentucky at Lexington, and for two years was a student in the Eastern Kentucky State Normal at Richmond, leaving normal school in 1912. At the age of twenty he began teaching in the rural schools of Estill County, and his work continued there for a period of ten years and then for a similar period he was identified with the schools of Madison County. In November, 1917, he was elected county superintendent for Madison County and has filled that office since January, 1918, having been re-elected in 1921. Madison County has a large school system, with sixty-eight white schools and twenty-three colored schools, the average enrollment being about 5,000. There are 125 teachers in the county.

Mr. Edwards is a member of the Kentucky Educational Association, is a democrat, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and is affiliated with Madison Lodge No. 14, Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In May, 1916, at Shelbyville, Kentucky, Mr. Edwards married Miss May Eades, daughter of Woodson and Nora (Schooler) Eades, residents of Shelbyville on a farm. Mrs. Edwards completed her high school education at Union City. The two children of their marriage are Frank Woodson, born June 22, 1917, and Reva, born March 14, 1919.

WILLIAM E. LUXON, who was born and reared in Madison County, has given his time and energies effectively to farming, the tobacco industry and the automobile business, and is one of the busiest men in Richmond today.

His ancestors for generations lived on the Isle of Guernsey as British subjects. His grandfather, William Luxon, was born there in 1802 and in 1837 brought his family to the United States and located at Lexington, where he was in business as a coal operator. In 1911 he built the first loose leaf tobacco warehouse at Cynthiana, and was one of the principal owners of that property until 1916. He then built a loose leaf tobacco warehouse at Richmond, and is president of the Home Loose Leaf Tobacco Warehouse of that city and is rated as the largest tobacco dealer in Madison County. THOMAS JACKSON COATES, who has been president of the Eastern Kentucky State Normal School at Richmond since 1917, is a native of Eastern Kentucky and the many years he has devoted to education, from country schools to the scope of his present duties, have brought him many well deserved honors in educational circles.

Mr. Coates was born at Pikeville in Pike County, March 17, 1867. His grandfather, Aaron T. Coates, was born at Londonderry, Ireland, and came to America more than a century ago. He was a pioneer in Southern Ohio at the old educational center of Athens, where he followed farming the rest of his life. He married a Miss Thompson, who also died at Athens. Aaron T. Coates, father of Thomas J. Coates, was born at Athens, Ohio, February 14, 1814, and became a tanner by trade. At the beginning of the war with Mexico he entered the volunteer forces and served throughout that struggle in the army of General Scott. He was twice severely wounded. Not long after the close of the war with Mexico, in the earliest '50s, he came to Kentucky, locating in Johnson County, where he married and where he followed his business as a tanner. In 1862 he moved to Pikeville, where he continued active in the tanning industry until he retired in 1890, and then lived at Greenville and after 1897 at Princeton, Kentucky, where his death occurred in February of that year. He was a democrat in politics, a member of the Presbyterian Church, and a Mason. Aaron T. Coates married Jallana P. Wells, who was born in Johnson County, Kentucky, in 1837, and died at Richmond in 1910. She was the mother of only two children: Her daughter, Elizabeth, living at Pikeville, is the widow of W. O. B. Ratliff, who was a lawyer and timber dealer at Pikeville.

Thomas Jackson Coates grew up and received a common school education in Pike County, and for five years was a country school teacher there. In the intervals of teaching he has been constantly a student, and he holds the degrees A. B. and A. M. from the Southern Normal School of Bowling Green, has a certificate from the Cook County Normal School and the Emmons Blaine School of Education at Chicago, and also took work in the Normal Department of the State College at Lexington. He is a graduate of the Lexington Business College.

Mr. Coates was for six years principal of the graded school at Greenville, twelve years superintendent of the city schools at Princeton, four years superintendent of city schools at Richmond, and for six years was state supervisor of rural and village schools in Kentucky. His wide experience and his personal qualifications made him in every way an ideal selection for his duties as president of the Kentucky State Normal School. He has served as an instructor in more than a hundred teachers' institutes in Kentucky, Tennessee and Ohio, and at one time was president of the Kentucky Educational Association. He is a member of the National Education Association. Mr. Coates is author

He is an elder in the Presbyterian Church, is affiliated with Richmond Lodge No. 25, A. F. and A. M., Richmond Chapter No. 16, R. A. M., Richmond Commandery No. 19, K. T. During the World war he was a member of the Madison County Council of Defense, and gave every possible aid to the Government. His friends say that he sold real estate in order to increase his purchases of Liberty bonds. Mr. Coates owns a modern home at Frankfort, though Richmond is his place of residence.

At Greenville, Kentucky, in 1893, Mr. Coates married Miss Della D. Myers, daughter of David and Martha J. (Martin) Myers, now deceased. Her father was a Greenville druggist. Mrs. Coates is a graduate of Greenville College. Mr. and Mrs. Coates have a family of talented children. The oldest, David Myers, volunteered as a soldier in June, 1917, was assigned to duty as a musician and went overseas to France in 1918, and was abroad six months. He lives at Richmond and is Kentucky representative of the prominent general publishing house of McMillan Company, handling their school text books in Kentucky. The second son, Lieutenant Aaron T. Coates, now at home, volunteered in November, 1917, for the aviation corps, and was in New York City ready to sail when the armistice was signed. He is now a second lieutenant in the Aviation Reserve Corps. The third child, Mabel Ruth, graduated from the Eastern Kentucky State Normal School in 1920 and is finishing her higher education in the Kentucky State University at Lexington. Rowena, who graduated from the Eastern Kentucky State Normal in 1921, is a teacher in the public schools. The younger children are: Lena Martine, attending the Eastern Kentucky State Normal School; James D., a junior in the Richmond High School; Thomas Henry, in the eighth grade of the grammar school; Della Marie, a school girl; and Elizabeth, who died at the age of nine months.

EASTERN KENTUCKY STATE NORMAL SCHOOL. This is a brief article supplementing the general history of education in Kentucky and presenting some of the detailed facts in the history of one of the two State Normal schools, that at Richmond.

The State Normal schools of Kentucky owe their origin to the Act of 1906, introduced by R. W. Miller of Madison County, passed by unanimous vote and signed by Governor Beckham, March 21st. Commissioners appointed by the Government selected as the site for the Eastern School, Richmond, and Bowling Green as site for the Western School. Richmond gave to the state for the home of the Normal school the building and campus of old Central University, the famous Presbyterian institution which was removed to Danville and united with Center College in 1901. The school therefore has grounds beautiful in themselves and with years of educational and scholastic traditions. The first president of the Eastern Normal School was Ruric Nevel Roark, and the model school was opened September 7, 1906, and the Normal school formally opened January 15, 1907. The original act devoted $5,000 for repair and equipment of the buildings and $20,000 as an annual maintenance appropriation, and a special appropriation of $150,000 for new buildings and equipment was made by the Act of 1908, and in 1912 an additional annual appropriation of $35,000 was made to those previously made. In 1918 the system of support was changed to a millage basis, based on assessed taxable property, the amount thus assured being now over $100,000 annually.

The buildings on the campus include University Hall, a structure remodeled from old Center University, Roark Hall, for offices and laboratories, New Training School Building, Memorial Hall, men's dormitory, Sullivan Hall, women's dormitory, gymnasium, Model Rural School Building, president's house, and new dormitories for women erected under a recent appropriation by the Legislature. The school also has a farm known as Stateland, used for demonstration purposes in the department of agriculture in the Normal school.

The Eastern Normal School has had three presidents, Doctor Roark, the first president, died in the spring of 1909. His successor was John G. Crabbe, who left his post as state superintendent of public instruction to become president of the Richmond Normal. He was president until September 1, 1916, and is now president of the Colorado State Teachers College. The president of the Eastern Kentucky State Normal School since 1917 has been Thomas J. Coates.

WILLIAM H. FELIX, D. D. No name recorded in the memorial annals of Kentucky history, is held in higher and more grateful remembrance than that of the late Rev. William H. Felix, D. D., for years a prominent figure in the various activities of the Baptist congregations, and which he served with fidelity and devotion up to the date of his resignation from church work in 1908.

William H. Felix was a son of Josiah and Jane (Shouse) Felix and was born in Mortonsville, Woodford County, Kentucky, October 6, 1838, and passed suddenly to his reward at Clearwater, Florida, January 6, 1912, being then in his seventy-fourth year. He was one of a large family born to his parents, there being four sons and seven daughters. His preliminary education was secured in the home schools of Woodford County and he later took the course in Georgetown College, also taking theology, and was graduated from that institution with the class of 1860. He was also admitted to the bar, but preferred to plead rather in the sacred than in the civil courts.

The first pastorate held by the Rev. William H. Felix was offered him in 1860, the scene of his labors being at Newcastle, Kentucky, where he remained until 1862, when he was called to the first church in Lexington. Here he spent seven years, or until 1869, when he was called to the Pilgrim Baptist Church, New York City, serving in that church for one year. In 1870 the Reverend Felix returned to Kentucky and became pastor of the First Baptist Church at Covington, and served this congregation continuously for fourteen years. He then served one year at Hillsboro, and during the following year served Union, Berry and Cynthiana. In 1887 he was recalled to the First Church in Lexington and served until January 1, 1898, when he took charge of David's Fork, and there remained in the service of the church until 1908, when he was reluctantly compelled to give up active ministerial work owing to the condition of his health.

The Reverend Felix was twice married. His first wife was Miss Mattie Hayden, of Newcastle, to whom he was married on December 31, 1861. To this union four daughters were born: Mrs. H. M. Wright, now deceased, who formerly lived in Dixon, Illinois; Mrs. J. J. Caldwell, of Visalia, Kentucky; Mrs. R. M. Cummins, deceased; and Mrs. H. M. Wright, of Chicago, Illinois. In June, 1870, his wife died, and in 1871 he traveled extensively in Europe and in the Holy Land. On July 21, 1874, he married for his second wife Miss Camilla Hemingray, of Covington, a daughter of Robert Hemingray, a native of Pennsylvania, who settled in Covington, where he established a glass factory. To this union two children were born: William H. Felix, Jr., deceased, and Anna B. Felix, now the wife of T. J. Weathers, of Chilesburg.

In his private life Doctor Felix was devoted, conscientious and wise; he was a model host, prudent and hospitable. As a pastor he was diligent, persistent, safe and successful, and as a preacher he analyzed and argued well and never fell below the expectations of his hearers. He was a deep thinker and profound and logical reasoner; he had real convictions and not mere notions. He was a charming and powerful speaker, conviction waited on his words, and hundreds were converted by his sermons. While he was always fair to an opponent and never sought controversy, yet his capacity and courage in contending for any cause he espoused made him a formidable antagonist in debate.

In addition to his intense and arduous pastoral duties Doctor Felix served his denomination in many other ways. He was a skilled parliamentarian, and was for many years moderator of the Kentucky General Association. For a long period he was a trustee of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, and took a deep interest in the life and doings of that institution. In earlier years he was much in demand as an evangelist and lecturer, and was frequently called long distances to deliver lectures and addresses at the close of schools. His local work was supplemented by occasional strong and vigorous pamphlets. He was a ripe scholar and a great advocate and supporter of denominational schools, and was one of the prime movers in organizing the Baptist Education Society of Kentucky. He was beloved of all classes, and his untiring devotion to the churches he served will long help to keep his memory fresh in the recollection of his hosts of friends in the various communities in which he resided and labored for the Master.

JOHN NOLAND, who represents the fifth generation of the Noland family in Madison County, has played an important part in local affairs as an educator, as a successful attorney at the Richmond bar for the past decade, and was a leader in all the local war activities.

The Noland family originated in Ireland. They were Colonial settlers in Maryland. The great-grandfather of the Richmond lawyer was a native of North Carolina, and two of his brothers were killed at the battle of Cowpens during the Revolution. He himself came as a pioneer into Madison County, and spent the rest of his life on a farm which he reclaimed from the wilderness. Their son, Nathan Noland, was born in Madison County in 1817 and died there in 1899. He was a farmer and slaveholder, a captain of militia, and a citizen of very high character. His wife was Margaret Broadus, who was born in Madison County in 1830 and died there in 1919.

Elbridge Noland, father of John Noland, the lawyer, was born in Madison County in 1845, and devoted his active years to farming. Elbridge Noland and wife had a family of seven children: George H., a farmer living at Richmond; John, Margaret, wife of Sam Baldwin, a Madison County farmer; Marv, wife of R. O. Moberly, owning and operating the old homestead; James, who died in 1801, at the age of eight years; Thomas T., a junior lieutenant in the United States navy who during the war was stationed off the coast of Spain; and Nathan, who was manager of the home farm prior to his death, which occurred in the Richmond Hospital in October, 1918, at the age of twenty-eight.

He attended rural schools and had duties on the farm, also attended the preparatory department of Central University, and took the full four years' course in Central University at Richmond, graduating Bachelor of Literature in 1899. From the fall of that year for ten months he was an instructor in the preparatory department of the University, and was then elected principal of the high school department of the Richmond city schools, an office he held five and a half years. In November, 1905, Mr. Noland was elected county superintendent of schools for Madison County and by re-election in November, 1909, held that responsible post for eight years, from 1906 to 1914. In the meantime he had studied law at Central University, was admitted to the bar in 1910 and began practice, and since retiring from the office of county superintendent had given his entire time to a large and important civil and criminal practice. His offices are at the corner of Main and Second streets, opposite the Court House.

His success as a lawyer has been accompanied by a constant and deep interest in public affairs, particularly the matter of good schools. He is chairman of the Richmond School Board, was a member of the County Board of Teachers Examiners from 1901 to 1906, and during the war he almost gave up his professional work to attend to his duties in connection with various war activities and was chairman of the Speakers Bureau for the Liberty Loan drives and chairman of the Four Minute speakers and of the Council of National Defense for Madison County.

He taught in the preparatory department of the University, read law at home, attended lectures at the University of Virginia and was admitted to the Richmond Bar in January, 1891, and immediately began there the practice of his profession, which continued until he went upon the bench. He was elected county judge of Madison County in November, 1909, beginning his term in January, 1910, was re-elected in 1913, and served acceptably until December, 1915, when he resigned. He received the democratic nomination for circuit judge in the Twenty-fifth Judicial District in August, 1915, and was elected without opposition in November of the same year. In 1921 he was renominated and re-elected for a second term of six years, without opposition in either political party. It is reported by those who have business in his courts that he has been a faithful, fair, firm and industrious public official, and served to the satisfaction of the bar, and people of his district.

Judge Shackelford has been for many years a member of the Kentucky State Bar Association, the Filson Club, the Pendennis Club, the Lexington Club, a director in the Madison National Bank at Richmond and a consistent democrat in politics. He is an elder in the First Presbyterian Church, a past master of Richmond Lodge No. 25, F. and A. M.; past high priest of Richmond Chapter No. 16, R. A. M.; past commander of Richmond Commandery No. 19, K. T.; past grand high priest of the Grand Chapter of Kentucky; past exalted ruler of Richmond Lodge No. 581, B. P. O. E., and has served as deputy G. E. R., for the Eastern District of Kentucky.

Judge Shackelford is a son of Captain James T. Shackelford, born June 23, 1834, and died November 11, 1904, and Mary Keen, born June 5, 1847, and now living at Richmond. She was a daughter of Oliver McDowell Keen, of Fayette County, and Sally Clay, of Bourbon County. The latter daughter of Sidney Payne Clay and Nancy Keen and granddaughter of Gen. Green Clay, of White Hall, and his wife, Sally Lewis, daughter of Col. Thomas Lewis and Elizabeth Payne. Sally Clay's maternal grandparents were John Keen, son of Francis Keen and Mary Bowman, daughter of Col. Abraham Bowman and Sarah Henry. Oliver McDowell Keen was the son of Oliver Keen, son of Francis Keen and Sally McDowell, the daughter of Capt. James McDowell and Mary Paxton Lyle, and granddaughter of Judge Samuel McDowell, an eminent Kentucky jurist and president of all the conventions held at Danville leading to the admission of Kentucky into the Union and president of the first constitutional convention, and his wife Marv McClung.

James T. Shackelford as a young man made the wagon trip across the plains in the early '50s, and at San Francisco met William Walker and was of his party in his first filibustering expedition to Nicaragua and received from General Walker a commission as captain. Upon his return to the United States he settled in Missouri, and was in business in St. Louis at the outbreak of the Civil war. He was captain of state militia and was captured with those forces at Camp Jackson by General Lyons and paroled as a Confederate prisoner of war. He returned to Kentucky during the war and married, first, Mary Bates, of Clark County, of which union one son, D. Bates Shackelford, survives. He married for his second wife Mary Keen in January, 1869. Captain Shackelford was the son of John Hockaday Shackelford and Malinda Miller, daughter of Daniel Miller and Susannah Woods. Her paternal grandparents were Robert Miller and Margaret Maupin and her maternal grandparents were Capt. John Woods, son of Michael Woods and Mary Campbell, and Susannah Anderson, daughter of Rev. James Anderson.

Captain Shackelford's paternal grandfather was Col. George Shackelford, son of Lyne Shackelford and Elizabeth Taliaferro. Col. George Shackelford was married in Kentucky to Martha, daughter of Edmund and Martha Otey Hockaday. Not to pursue these genealogies further, it suffices to say that Judge Shackelford's ancestry, whether English, Scotch-Irish, Welsh, French or Palatinate German, occupied respectable stations in the society and public affairs of their times and all coming to Kentucky from Virginia during the earliest settlement of the former state contributed their full share in carving a commonwealth from the wilderness.

On January 27, 1907, at Paris, Kentucky, Judge Shackelford married his cousin, Anne Louise Clay, daughter of Hon. Cassius M. Clay, Jr., and his wife, Sue Elizabeth Clay, daughter of Samuel Clay, Sr., and Nancy Wornall. Samuel Clay was a son of Henry Clay and Mary Helm and grandson of Dr. Henry Clay and Rachel Povall. Cassius M. Clay, Jr., was a farmer but took an active part in public affairs, being a member of the Kentucky general assembly from Bourbon County, his residence. He was a member of the State Senate and was president and one of the most distinguished members of the Constitutional Convention of 1890-91. He was the son of Hon. Brutus J. Clay, of Bourbon, and Ann Field, daughter of Ezekiel Field and Patsy Irvine, of Madison, grandson of Gen. Green Clay and his wife, Sally Lewis, and on the maternal side of William Irvine and Elizabeth (Betsy) Hockaday, daughter of Edmund Hockaday. Ezekiel Field's father, was Ezekiel, and he was killed at the battle of Blue Licks. His grandfather, Col. John Field, was killed at the head of his regiment at the battle of Point Pleasant in 1774.

There have been born to Judge and Mrs. Shackelford six children, three of whom died in infancy. The three surviving are Anne Field, born in May, 1912, Mary Keen, born August 7, 1913, and a daughter, Rodes Clay, born February 13, 1919.

SPENCER C. NUNNELLY. The name Nunnally has more than an ordinary significance in Kentucky farming circles. Half a century ago the Nunnelys were acknowledged without a superior in the making and finishing of plows, and the owners of a Nunnely plow had an implement that could be depended upon to give all the service reasonably to be expected. Their vocation as expert mechanics is still a feature of the farm four miles north of Lexington on Georgetown Pike, where Spencer C. Nunnally and his sons still continue the shop in which so many fine plows were made in former years. The blacksmith shop, however, is not now the most distinctive feature of "Durodale," the enterprise of its owners having extended into the thoroughbred stock business, specializing in Kentucky jacks and the noted Duroc hog, and some of the best stock of these breeds found in a number of states is produced at Durodale.

Spencer C. Nunnally, senior partner of the firm Nunnally & Sons, was born in Fayette County December 18, 1857, son of Dudley V. and Juretta (Hudson) Nunnally. His father was born in Pulaski County, Kentucky, a son of William Nunnally, one of three brothers to come from Virginia to Kentucky. The Nunnally family is of English and French ancestry. The three Nunnally brothers all remained in Kentucky, and all of their descendants are found here. Dudley Nunnally by his first wife had a son, James Dudley Nunnally, who served with a Kentucky regiment in the Federal army during the Civil war, afterward removed to Fayette County and worked at the trade with his father, but finally went away and was never heard from again. Dudley Nunnally lived for a few years near Dore-rail, and in the fall of 1860 moved to the farm on Georgetown Pike north of Lexington. He established his shop and continued it until his death in 1883, at the age of seventy-two. His plows won honors in all the field trials and public exhibitions, and he was never able to produce them rapidly enough to supply the demand. Though his son served in the Federal army he had been a slave holder and southern sympathizer. He was an active member of the Cane Run Baptist Church. Jureta Hudson was the second wife of Dudley Nunnally, and she was also a native of Pulaski County. She was seventeen when she married, her husband being thirty-five. He survived her ten years, and she died at the age of forty-one. They became the parents of six children: Barthenia, of Lexington, is the widow of James P. Haynes, son of Thomas Haynes, and they formerly lived on Georgetown Pike; Dudley, who was a Baptist minister and a mechanic, lived at Lexington, where he died at the age of sixty-two; Martha, a resident of Rock Castle, Kentucky, widow of Robert Mattingly, a miller at Stanford, Kentucky; Spencer C. is the fourth in age; Elizabeth Watson during her married life lived in Pennsylvania and died there; Mary, a resident of Stroud, Oklahoma, is the wife of William Spurr, son of Dr. B. R. Spurr.

Spencer C. Nunnally has lived at the place at Greendale since he was three years of age, was reared and educated here and learned his trade under his father. Thus for over sixty consecutive years the exceptional mechanical skill of himself and father have been given to the service of this one community.

Mr. Nunnally began breeding Kentucky jacks about thirty years ago, and has produced some of the finest animals of that class, many of them being purchased by eager buyers from Missouri. With his sons he has been associated in the thoroughbred Duroc hog industry for fifteen years, and out of this enterprise of S. C. Nunnally & Sons arises the title of the farm Durodale. Their hogs have been exhibited with honors at many fairs, and they have sold their breeding stock in many states.

Mr. Nunnally is a democrat in politics and a member of the First Baptist Church of Lexington. At the age of twenty-eight he married Anna Wright, daughter of John Wright, then living at Sandersville, now deceased. He was a successful carpenter and contractor and later lived on a farm. Mrs. Nunnally was twenty-three at the time of her marriage. Charles, the oldest, is an employee of the Elevated Railways Company at Chicago. Spencer Craig is a blacksmith and partner of his father. Herbert L. is the other member of the firm of Nunnally & Sons.

RONALD C. OLDHAM, a Richmond lawyer, at the age of thirty has achieved a more than state-wide reputation in his profession and in politics, and has a great and loyal following of admirers who regard him as one of the most promising men in the public affairs of Kentucky.

Mr. Oldham was born at Richmond in Madison County, October 25, 1890. This is one of the oldest families of Madison County. Oldham is a Scotch-Irish name, and the first Americans of that lineage established a home in Virginia in Colonial times. The great-grandfather of the Richmond lawyer was Hezekiah Oldham, a native of Virginia, who came to Madison County in middle years and settled on a farm. He was a man of the greatest vitality and vigor. At the age of ninety-six, while helping haul logs, a log rolled off the wagon, striking and killing him. His son, C. K. Oldham, was born in Madison County in 1836, served as a colonel in the army of General Morgan, was for two terms sheriff of the county, conducted farming operations on a large scale, and was one of the leading democrats of his day. He died at Richmond in 1906. His wife was Susan Duncan, who was born near Richmond in 1837 and is now living at Mount Sterling.

W. D. Oldham, father of Ronald C., was born in Madison County in 1860, and has lived in Richmond since his marriage. His name is widely and favorably known over Southeastern Kentucky as a drygoods merchant. He owns a business block on Main Street opposite the Court House, and it is the home of his store. He owns much other real estate in the city.

He is a democrat, a member of the First Christian Church, and Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. W. D. Oldham married Mary Ferrell, who was born in Madison County in 1869. The Ferrells were an old English family, were pioneers in Missouri, and from there came to Kentucky. Mary Ferrell is a great-niece of former Governor Eagle of Missouri. Ronald C. Oldham, who was born at Richmond October 25, 1890, was the first of four children. His only sister, Lucile, died in infancy. His brother Harold is a partner with his father in business at Richmond. Abner F. lives at home.

Ronald C. Oldham attended the public schools of Richmond, graduated from the Eastern Kentucky State Normal School in 1911, began the study of law under D. M. Chenault and James B. McCreary, two of the most eminent members of the Richmond bar, and also attended the law department of the State University at Lexington. He was admitted to the bar in 1914 and has since been busy with a general civil and criminal practice at Richmond, and for some time also maintained offices at Winchester. Mr. Oldham was a member of the Kentucky Tuberculosis Commission from 1916 to 1919. From 1915 to 1919, four years, he was democratic state election commissioner for the state, being the youngest man ever appointed to fill this office, and when he resigned had the longest record of continuous service. He served as a colonel on the staff of Governor A. O. Stanley, and was appointed by that Governor to represent the state as special attorney working on escheat suits against corporations.

In 1919 Mr. Oldham was candidate for the democratic nomination for lieutenant governor. Of more than two hundred thousand votes cast in the primaries he was defeated by the margin of 1900. His great strength lay in the cities, and he carried every city of more than ten thousand population. Mr. Oldham was the first political campaigner in Kentucky to advocate in public speeches the eight hour day for the laboring man.

He is a member of the First Christian Church of Richmond, of Daugherty Lodge No. 95, F. and A. M., at Carlisle, Nicholas Chapter No. 41, R. A. M., at Carlisle; Carlisle Commandery No. 17, K. T., Winchester Lodge No. 596, B. P. O. E., is a member of the Kentucky State Bar Association, the Cuvier Press Club of Cincinnati and the Pendennis Club of Louisville.

During the World war he registered for the draft, waiving all exemptions, but was not called to active duty. With law office in Clark County, much of his activity was given to that county, serving as a member of the County Draft Board and practically neglected his profession altogether to work as a speaker and committeeman in behalf of the various drives. Mr. Oldham has his law offices in the Oldham Building, opposite the Court House. He was chairman of the Roosevelt Memorial Fund Committee for Clark County.

In 1911, in Grant County, he married Miss Adela Collins, daughter of E. T. and Mary (Hudson) Collins. Her father, who has been a flour miller at Crittenden in Grant County for the past thirty years, is a relative of the author of Collins History of Kentucky. Mrs. Oldham is a great-granddaughter of former Governor Durbin of Indiana. Mrs. Oldham is a graduate of Georgetown College of Kentucky. She and Mr. Oldham have three children: William Edward, born December 31, 1913; Richard Collins, born February 12, 1919; and Marion Durbin, born March 8, 1920.

BENJAMIN F. ROBINSON, M. D. After graduating in medicine Doctor Robinson was in the government service in the Philippines about four years, and since then has been established with a growing recognition as an exceedingly skillful surgeon at Berea, Kentucky.

Mr. Robinson represents an old Kentucky family and was born in Clay County September 21, 1881. His paternal ancestors came out of England and settled in North Carolina in Colonial days. His great-grandfather was a native of North Carolina, and was the first of the name to locate in Clay County, Kentucky, where he spent his life as a farmer. The grandfather, James Robinson, lived all his life in Clay County and likewise followed agricultural pursuits. He married Martha Benge, and their home after marriage was at the Village of Benge, named for her people. She was likewise a resident and native of Clay County.

Ben Robinson, father of Doctor Robinson, has lived all his life in Clay County, where he was born in 1848, and for many years directed his energies to the management of a large farm. He is now retired. He was one of the youthful soldiers of the Union army during the Civil war, being in service during the last two years and participating in the great campaign of Sherman through Georgia. He is a democrat in politics and a very ardent member of the Baptist Church. Ben Robinson married Susan Hensley, who was born in Clay County in 1848. They are the parents of a large family of children, namely: Lizzie, who became the wife of E. W. Collins, a stone mason, and both died at Berea; J. B., a farmer at Sidell, Illinois; Nancy who died in Clay County at the age of thirty, wife of A. C. Hudson, a farmer in Canada; John, a farmer at Bond, Kentucky; Thena, wife of Gardner Baker, a farmer in Clay County; Alford, a Clay County farmer on Laurel Creek; William M., likewise identified with farming in the Laurel Creek community; Benjamin F.; Martha, who died at the age of fifteen; M. M. Robinson, a physician and surgeon at Enid, Oklahoma; Daisy, wife of Frank Hornsby, a farmer, merchant and flour miller at Laurel Creek; and Charles, who died at the age of seven years.

Benjamin F. Robinson was born in Clay County, Kentucky September 21, 1881, grew up on his father's farm, attended the rural schools, and had two years in Berea College. From there he entered the regular army in 1901, and for three years was on duty in the Philippine Islands. He left the service in 1904 to study medicine, and returned to the United States and entered the University of Louisville, graduating with the degree of M. D., June 30, 1909. Soon after graduating he sought an opportunity to go to the Orient again, and from 1910 to 1914 was a surgeon in the Philippine Insular Government, leaving the service with the rank of first lieutenant. After this varied and useful experience that has presented him with a wide knowledge of the world, Doctor Robinson returned to Berea and from a general practice his work is coming more and more to be limited to general surgery. He has availed himself of the opportunities of clinics and hospital observation every year, and has attended the clinics of the famous Mayo Brothers at Rochester, Minnesota, and also the Chicago Polyclinic. He owns and has his offices in the Hospital Building on Chestnut Street and is president of the Robinson Hospital Corporation. He is a member of the County, State and American Medical Associations, and during the World war took the examination and was waiting his commission in the Medical Corps when the armistice was signed. He did his share of civilian duties, especially in committee work for the Red Cross.

Doctor Robinson is a democrat, a member of the Baptist Church, and is affiliated with Berea Lodge No. 617 F. and A. M., Berea Chapter No. 151, R. A. M., Richmond Commandery No. 19, K. T., and Oleika Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Lexington.

In 1912, at Berea, he married Miss Martha Click, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dan Click, now deceased. Her father was a farmer in Jackson County, Kentucky. Mrs. Robinson is a graduate registered nurse from the Silver Cross Hospital at Joliet, Illinois. The two children of Doctor and Mrs. Robinson are: Anna C., born October 17, 1914; and Bill, born March 17, 1917.

LE VANT DODGE. A distinguished and greatly beloved educator in Eastern Kentucky, Professor Emeritus of Berea College, Le Vant Dodge joined actively in the great work done by that institution nearly half a century ago. He has been a leader in politics and public affairs in Eastern Kentucky as well, and is one of the most prominent members of the Grand Army of the Republic in Kentucky.

Le Vant Dodge was born in Trumbull Township, Ashtabula County, Ohio, May 9, 1838, and represents the sturdy and scholarly New England stock that settled the Ohio Western Reserve. His father, Daniel Dodge, was born in the township of Ward, now Auburn, Worcester County, Massachusetts, September 8, 1787, and lived there for a number of years after his marriage. He owned and operated a water power saw mill and conducted a farm as well. From there he moved to Stafford Township, Genesee County, New York, where he owned a saw mill and grist mill, and in the spring of 1837 moved on further west to Trumbull Township, Ashtabula County, Ohio. Here he continued his former business as a saw and grist miller and conducted a farm. He was a whig in early life, became a free soiler in 1848, and was one of the original republicans at the beginning of the party. For the last few years of his life he voted as a prohibitionist. He was honored with several local offices in Massachusetts, and in Ohio was a justice of the peace for several years. He was a loyal Baptist, and after reaching the age of seventy walked ten miles to attend service and for many years held the post of deacon. He was liberal, tolerant, a great and kindly man, admired and influential for his utmost probity of character. Daniel Dodge married Meleson Hayward, who was born at Granville, New York, June 25, 1797, and died in Trumbull Township of Ashtabula County in 1869. Of their children the oldest was Lucinda Jane, who was born in Worcester County, Massachusetts, and died at Harpersfield, Ashtabula County, at the age of twenty-nine, wife of Daniel Woolsey Kelsey, a farmer, who spent his last years in California. Asahel Hayward, the second child, was also born in Worcester County, spent his active life as a farmer in Ashtabula County, Ohio, and died there at the age of seventy-five. Mary Elizabeth, who was born in Stafford Township, Genesee County, New York, died in Trumbull Township, Ashtabula County, at the age of thirty-seven, wife of Horatio Gates Rich, a farmer and later a merchant of Ashtabula County, where he died. Daniel Prescott, the fourth child, was born in Genesee County, New York, was a farmer in Trumbull Township of Ashtabula County, and died at the age of twenty-three, while visiting in the City of Ashtabula.

Le Vant Dodge, fifth and youngest of the family, grew up on his father's farm, attended the country schools of Trumbull Township and also attended the famous institution of learning in the Western Reserve, Grand River Institute at Austinburg. At the age of nineteen he began teaching in rural schools, and he also taught in select schools. In 1864 he enlisted in the One Hundred and Seventy-seventh Ohio Infantry, and during the last year of the war was in many skirmishes in Tennessee, took part in the battle of Town Creek, North Carolina, in the capture of Fort Anderson, North Carolina, and served throughout the Wilmington campaign in that state. He was mustered out in July, 1865, and then returned home and resumed farming and teaching until 1867, when he entered Hillsdale College at Hillsdale, Michigan. He remained a student there until his graduation with the A. B. degree in 1872, and each year in every study, except one, for a single term he had the highest scholarship marks in his class. Later Hillsdale conferred upon him the well merited degrees of Master of Arts and LL. D.

Following his college career he was elected in 1872 and served one year as superintendent of public schools at Wooster, Ohio, for one year was principal of the Geneva Normal School at Geneva, and then, in 1874, began his long and honorable association with Berea College as acting professor of Latin and mathematics. Doctor Dodge at different times has filled several chairs and has taught the advanced courses in Greek, political science and other subjects, and practically gave the best years of his life to the institution. He has been retired from the regular duties of teaching since 1906, and is now styled Professor Emeritus of Greek and Political Science. He still attends chapel and gives occasional lectures in the college.

Doctor Dodge is a staunch republican. In 1891 he was candidate for state superintendent of public instruction, and had a very gratifying vote on the party ticket. He was also candidate for the State Senate to represent the district comprising Madison, Estill, Powell and Lee counties, and was defeated by only four hundred votes. Doctor Dodge was chairman of the Town Board of Berea four times. For thirty-five years he officiated as clerk of the Union Church of Berea. He is a member of the Ohio Valley Historical Association, is a member of the Delta Tau Delta college fraternity, was a Good Templar in early life, and is past commander of Captain James West Post No. 171, G. A. R., at Berea. He first became associated with the Grand Army in the Conant-Brainerd Post in Ashtabula County, Ohio. Doctor Dodge is the only Kentucky resident who has served as department commander two terms, being elected in 1907 and again in 1908. In 1915 he was elected junior vice commander in chief of the United States, the third highest honor in the order. He has not missed attending a National Encampment for the past seventeen years, and by virtue of his former office as department commander is a life member of the Conventions. He usually served as a member of the committee on resolutions. He was presented by his department as candidate for the office of commander in chief, and was assured of considerable support, but withdrew his name before election. He and Bishop Samuel Fallows of Chicago were appointed by the Commander in Chief to carry the greeting of the National G. A. R. to the National Convention of the Woman's Relief Corps. As an old soldier Doctor Dodge was deeply interested in the success of all patriotic drives during the World war.

His home is at 44 Jackson Street in Berea. June 15, 1862, in Cherry Valley Township of Ashtabula County, he married Miss Lucinda Maude Green, daughter of Elymas Martin and Belinda (Morse) Green, both of whom died and were buried in Ashtabula County. Mrs. Dodge died at Berea September 25, 1895. The only son of Doctor Dodge is Ernest Green Dodge, who was born July 29, 1870. He received his A. B. degree from Berea College, his Master of Arts degree from the University of Chicago, formerly taught in Berea College and also in a college at Urbana, Ohio, and in the Manual Training High School in New York City. For several years he lived at his country home at Ruby in Ulster County, New York, and in 1918 became an employe of the Treasury Department at Washington, where he has his home.

At Harvey, Illinois, September 9, 1896, Doctor Dodge married Miss Mary Helen Lamson. She was born in Lee County, Wisconsin, graduated in 1887 from Berea College, and for three years taught in the graded schools at Owensboro, Kentucky, and for six years in the Todd Seminary at Woodstock, Illinois.

JOHN L. GAY for a number of years has been one of the influential citizens of the noted college town of Berea in Madison County. In early life he was a teacher, acquired part of his education in Berea College, but for the past fifteen years has been prominent as a banker and as one of the progressive men in all matters affecting the welfare of his community.

Mr. Gay was born in Jackson County, Kentucky,

September 22, 1865. His grandfather, John Gay, was a native of Garrard County, Kentucky, and spent most of his active life as a merchant in Garrard and Madison counties. Late in years, when he retired from business, he moved to Illinois, where he died. His wife was a Miss Horton. B. F. Gay, father of the Berea banker, was born in Garrard County in 1843, but spent his boyhood chiefly in Madison County, five miles east of Berea. He was married in Jackson County, and was a farmer and merchant at Clover Bottom in that county until 1880, when he moved to Berea, and only three years ago retired, after playing an effective part as a merchant there. He is a republican, active in the Christian Church and a member of the Masonic fraternity. B. F. Gay married Minerva Davis, who was born in Jackson County in 1840 and died at Berea in 1885. John L. Gay is the oldest in a family of eleven children including: Alice, wife of George Settle, a restaurant proprietor at Berea; Anna is the wife of David Williams, a farmer at Wallaceon, Madison County; Lou is the wife of M. A. Moody, a farmer living at Berea; Ida married S. R. Baker, a Berea dentist; Myrtle is the wife of H. C. Sharp, a farmer in Scott County; Frank is a resident of California; Mary Etta lives at San Antonio, Texas, wife of J. L. Bowler, a traveling salesman; Lettie is the wife of Sam Cawood, a dentist practicing at Winchester; and Pearl, the youngest, is the wife of Stanley Kitchen, a painter and decorator at Winchester.

John L. Gay has spent the greater part of his life in Madison County. He attended the rural schools, completed his junior year in Berea College, and for two years attended the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio. He acquired his higher education largely through intervals in his teaching career. Beginning at the age of seventeen, he taught two years in the rural schools of Madison County, three years in Rockcastle County, and after completing his course at Lebanon, Ohio, in 1891, he was elected in 1892 principal of the city schools of Berea. He taught there one year and then retired from school work and for fourteen years was connected with one of the mercantile establishments at Berea.

In 1906, with the late S. E. Welch, Mr. Gay organized the Berea National Bank. This is a bank of exceptional resources and one of the important financial institutions in Madison County. It has capital of twenty-five thousand dollars, surplus and profits of fifty thousand dollars and deposits averaging five hundred thousand dollars. John W. Welch is president, J. J. Brannaman is vice president, and the cashier is Mr. Gay.

Besides his modern home on Chestnut Street Mr. Gay owns two business buildings on the same thoroughfare and also a dwelling. For years his name and influence have been associated with every public movement undertaken at Berea. For two years he was city clerk, four years justice of the peace and eight years police judge, and in November, 1909, was elected mayor and in January, 1910, began a service as the chief executive of the municipality which has continued uninterrupted now for twelve years. He was re-elected in 1913 and again in 1917. Mr. Gay is a member of the Prudential Committee of Berea College, a committee exercising a general oversight in the financial affairs of the college.

He is a Presbyterian, but is an active member and trustee of the Union Church at Berea. He is a past master of Berea Lodge No. 617, F. and A. M., and a past high priest of Berea Chapter No. 151, R. A. M., having held that office several terms. During the war and since he has been treasurer of the local Red Cross, and was ever ready with time, means and influence to further the cause of the Government at every drive.

In 1910, at Berea, he married Miss Nora Burdette, daughter of Josiah and Mary (Harrison) Burdette, now deceased. Her father was a Berea building contractor. Mrs. Gay is a woman of college education and ideals, attended Berea College, and completed her education in Oberlin College in Ohio. They have three daughters, Dorothy, born in September, 1911, and twins, Mary and Minerva, born in January, 1913.

Rev. H. B. SCHULTE has since September, 1916, been pastor of St. Mark's Catholic Church at Richmond. A little over a year after he took charge of the parish St. Mark's celebrated the Golden Jubilee of the period beginning with the construction of the first church. At infrequent and irregular occasions missionary priests had attended the meager Catholic population at Richmond prior to 1817. These services became more regular, doubtless marking an increase in population and zeal, during the fifties. Priests usually came to Richmond driving over the country from such points as Lexington and Mount Sterling. Prominent among the pioneer Catholics of Richmond were L. O. Schmidt, Patrick Laughlin and David Powers and their families. In 1860 some of the local citizens purchased a lot preparatory to the construction of a church. The Civil war came on and the project had to be abandoned temporarily. The lot was sold and in 1865 property on West Main Street was acquired, including the site of the present St. Mark's. Rev. Father Wille, then attending Richmond as a missionary, began the construction of the first frame church in 1866, and it was dedicated by Bishop Carroll in 1867 and placed under the patronage of St. Mark. It was still a mission under several successive priests, Father Callahan being the first resident pastor in the late '70s. The Catholic population remaining almost stationary, a later priest, Father Healy, moved to Winchester in 1892, and after that for several years Richmond was again a mission. In 1906 Rev. Joseph Merschmann became resident pastor, and at that time Bishop Maes acquired property on North Second Street as a home for mountain missionaries and to serve as a parochial rectory. The first of these missionaries were Rev. William T. Punch and Rev. T. D. Cooney. Father Punch succeeded Father Merschmann as pastor in 1907, and at the same time became head of the mountain missions. The old church building, recently remodeled, was destroyed by fire in 1906 and the present handsome stone edifice was begun in 1908 and dedicated by Bishop Maes on December 13, 1908. Father Punch was succeeded in 1909 by Father Cooney and he in 1910 by Rev. John F. O'Dwyer, during whose pastorate the rectory was built in 1911, adjoining the church. He remained as pastor until January, 1913, being succeeded by Father Yahner, and successive priests have been: Rev. George O'Bryan, from November, 1913, to July, 1915; Rev. William B. Curry, July 1915, to September, 1916; Rev. H. B. Schulte, the present incumbent.

Father Schulte was born at Covington, Kentucky, July 26, 1886. His grandfather, Bernard Schulte, was born in Germany and early came to America and for many years had his business interests in Cincinnati. He died at Covington in 1861. His wife was Adelaide Kasson, who was born in 1818 and died at Covington in 1904. CAPT. WILLIAM HERNDON practiced law half a century before he retired with the numerous honors and achievements of his profession. He is former commonwealth attorney of the Eighth Judicial District. He was a Union soldier in the Civil war until disabled at the battle of Stone River, and for a number of years following the war was in the internal revenue service. Altogether his life has been a varied one, and he has discharged his duties with a courage and fidelity that make him one of the most widely known men in Eastern Kentucky.

Captain Herndon, whose home for many years has been at Lancaster, was born at Irvine in Estill County, Kentucky, January 10, 1843. The Herndons came from Scotland to Virginia in Colonial times. His grandfather, William Herndon, was born in Charlotte County, Virginia, in 1772, and moved over the mountains and established a home at Winchester, Kentucky, in 1800. He acquired a large amount of land, developing a plantation worked by slave labor, and died at Winchester in 1850. His wife was Catherine Wynn, who was born at Winchester in 1782, representing one of the first families of Clark County. She died at Winchester in 1850.

Elijah Herndon, father of Captain Herndon, was born at Winchester in 1814, and in 1840 moved to Irvine in Estill County. He was a farmer and merchant, held the office of Sheriff of Estill County six years, and in 1853 moved to Millers Creek in that county, where he owned and operated a saw and grist mill, conducted a store and also built boats to transport the products of the local iron plant down the river. In 1862 he was elected clerk of the Estill Circuit Court, and in that year returned to Irvine and filled that office six years. In 1869 he removed from Kentucky to Jackson County, Kansas, and the last ten years of his life were devoted to farming. He died in 1879. He was a republican in politics from the formation of the party.

The wife of Elijah Herndon was Ann P. Crosthwait, who was born at Cynthia in 1815 and died in Western Missouri in 1892. Her father, Perry Crosthwait, was a native of Kentucky and died at Cynthiana when his daughter Ann was a child. The mother of Ann Crosthwait and, therefore, the grandmother of Captain Herndon belonged to the distinguished Madison family of old Virginia. Her name was Fannie Madison. She was born in Kentucky and died at Cynthiana. Her father, John Madison, was for a number of years in the employ of the state government of Kentucky. John Madison was a son of Capt. Rowland Madison, who served as an officer in the Revolutionary army. A brother of Captain Rowland was James Madison, the first Episcopal Bishop in America, who served as president of William and Mary College in Virginia. Still another brother was Gen. Thomas Madison, who married Josiana Henry, a sister of Patrick Henry. Captain Rowland Madison was a first cousin of President James Madison. This Madison family of old Virginia was descended from Isaac Madison, who came from England to the Virginia Colony in 1609.

Capt. William Herndon was second in a family of six children. The oldest, Fannie C., died in Platte County, Missouri, in 1893, wife of James Benton, who was a farmer and later a druggist and died at Irvine, Kentucky. John M. Herndon is a retired farmer in Platte County, Missouri. James S. is a manufacturer in West Virginia. Henry Clay, who died at Lexington in 1911, was in the United States revenue service. Bettie S., the youngest, became the wife of S. M. Peacock, jeweler, and both died in Tennessee.

Capt. William Herndon was reared in Estill County, attended rural schools there and also a select school at Irvine. On September 21, 1861, at the age of eighteen, he enlisted in the Eighth Kentucky Infantry in the Union Army, and for a year and a half did some strenuous campaigning in Kentucky and Tennessee. He was in the battles of Dobbins Ferry and Rural Hill, was with Buell's army pursuing Bragg over Kentucky in 1862, and participated in the closing phases of the battle of Perryville in that year. On January 2, 1863, the second day of the great battle of Stone River and during Breckinridge's famous charge, Captain Herndon was wounded and permanently disabled for further field service.

After recovering from his wounds he entered the United States revenue service January 1, 1865, as assistant assessor of the Eighth Collection District of Kentucky, with headquarters at Irvine. He held that post of duty thirteen years, until January 1, 1878. In the meantime he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1868, and practiced in connection with his official duties, having his home at Irvine until 1874, when he removed to Lancaster as a deputy collector of internal revenue. Captain Herndon earned a high reputation as a lawyer, and it was only in 1919 that he formally retired from the work of his profession.

He was commonwealth attorney of the Eighth Judicial District from 1886 to 1892. The district comprised the Boyle, Casey, Garrard, Lincoln, Pulaski, Rockcastle, Russell and Wayne counties. He was a republican, a member of the Presbyterian Church, served two terms as master of Lancaster Lodge No. 104, F. and A. M., and is a member of Lancaster Chapter No. 56, R. A. M.

Captain Herndon's home is Kengarlan Hotel in Lancaster. He married in that city July 3, 1873, Miss Helen Kinnaird, daughter of William H. and Patsy (McKee) Kinnaird. Her father was the distinguished Lancaster banker, who died while president of the National Bank of Lancaster, which he had served as cashier and president for half a century. Mrs. Herndon passed away July 3, 1898, on the twenty-fifth anniversary of their marriage. She was the mother of five children; Horace K., the oldest, is a traveling representative for Hirsch Brothers of Louisville, and lives at Greensboro, North Carolina. William Leslie, the second, has for several years been connected with the Goodyear Rubber Company of Akron, but is now temporarily filling a place in one of the state offices at Frankfort. Ben D. Herndon is a member of the Crescent Lumber Company, coal and lumber merchants at Danville. Lewis, the fourth son, is purchaser of cutlery for the Belknap Hardware Company of Louisville. The youngest of the family, Miss Annie C., is bookkeeper for a large importing company, with home at Washington, D. C.

ANDREW B. ANDERSON was one of the industrious citizens who formed the foundation of Kentucky's prosperity as an agricultural commonwealth. He was a man of retiring disposition, never sought to become a figure in public affairs, and his life represented a complete devotion to farm and home. He lived for many years in Fayette County, on the homestead three miles north of Lexington, on the Georgetown Pike, where his two surviving daughters, Mattie and Mary Anderson, now reside and continue the management of the farm.

Andrew B. Anderson was born in Green County, Kentucky, in January, 1830. His father, William Garland Anderson, was a native of Caroline County, Virginia, and several of his brothers achieved prominence in the professions. One, Benjamin, was a successful physician in Virginia. Robert was a minister who did his work in Virginia. Henry T. also became a minister, serving the Christian Church both in Virginia and Kentucky, and was pastor of the church at Washington City at the time of his death. Still another brother was a leader in educational affairs, and had the distinction of establishing the first school for the deaf and dumb in Kentucky at Hopkinsville. William G. Anderson came to Kentucky at an early day and settled in that part of Green that subsequently became Taylor County, and lived there until his death December 9, 1849, at the age of fifty-one. He was a liberal supporter of the Baptist Church. William Garland Anderson married Mildred Barbee, daughter of General Barbee, a Revolutionary soldier. The children of William G. Anderson and wife were: John B., who represented Taylor County in the State Legislature, was a farmer in that county and subsequently moved to Mississippi, where he died, leaving no descendants; Andrew B., the second in age; William G., who also farmed in Kentucky and went to Mississippi, where he and his brother were planters and where some of his descendants live today; Elizabeth became the wife of Benjamin Thornberry, of New Haven, Nelson County, and some of their descendants survive; Martha died in Green County without descendants, having been three times married, her husbands being Doctor Roszell, Peter Anderson and Richard Cowherd.

Andrew B. Anderson took up the vocation of farming on reaching his majority, and lived on farms in several portions of Kentucky, finally moving to the place north of Lexington in Fayette County. There he carried on the diversified work of general farming and dairying. The homestead farm contains thirty-two acres, but he also owned other land nearby. He continued active in his work until his death at the age of seventy-six, on March 28, 1906.

At Harrodsburg he married Amelia Alexander, who was one year older than her husband and who died April 20, 1907, at the age of seventy-eight. Their two daughters are Mary and Mattie, who have lived on the farm north of Lexington since early womanhood. Mattie Anderson was educated in Daughters College at Harrodsburg, was a teacher for a short time, and before her father's death became familiar with the management of the farm and has continued its work with excellent results. The Misses Anderson live in a comfortable home, the house having been erected by Henry Wright. Both are members of the Emanuel Baptist Church.

Langan, was born in County Cork, Ireland, in 1842, grew up there an Irish farmer and shortly after his marriage came to the United States in 1861. He soon demonstrated the quality of his Americanism by enlisting in the Union army, and was in service the last two years of the war. Thereafter for thirty-five consecutive years he was in the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company's service, beginning as a fireman, in 1890 was promoted to locomotive engineer, and during twenty-five years was known as one of the steadiest and most reliable men piloting an engine on the system. When he left railroading in 1915 Mr. Langan came to Irvine and built the electric light plant with his own capital. In 1917 he sold a half interest to Floyd Roger, and they now own and operate it jointly. The electric light plant is at the corner of Grand Avenue and Railroad Street and supplies current for lighting the towns of Irvine and Ravenna and power for operating the waterworks of the two cities. The partners own the office building on Broadway.

Mr. Langan during his residence in Corbin was honored with election as the first mayor of that town, and for ten years was a member of the city council. He is a democrat, a member of the Catholic Church and is affiliated with Richmond Lodge No. 581, B. P. O. E. WALLER GLENMORE COMBS, M. D. A physician and surgeon at Kirksville, Doctor Combs is a representative of the distinguished Combs family of Kentucky. His father was an honored physician in Clark County for many years, and the son also practiced medicine there, but for the past ten years has had a busy role as a physician and earnest minded citizen of Kirksville, though for practically a year he was absent on duty with the army medical corps.

The grandfather of Doctor Combs was Glenmore Combs, who was born in Rockcastle County, Kentucky, in 1815, and became a pioneer blacksmith at Schoolsville in Clark County, where he lived until his death in 1890. Glenmore Combs, Jr., was born in Clark County in 1851, was reared and married there, graduated in medicine from the Louisville Medical College in 1875, and for nearly forty years practiced his profession in Clark County. It is said that he had as large a practice as any member of his profession in that county. After 1903 he lived at Winchester, where he died in 1913. He was a democrat, very active in the Christian Church, a Knight Templar Mason, and Masonry was one of the strongest interests of his life. He was also an Odd Fellow. Glenmore Combs married Fannie Reid, still living in Winchester. She was born in Montgomery County, Kentucky, in 1858. Her children were four in number: Belle, wife of T. S. Scott, a real estate man at Winchester; Florence, wife of Henry Taylor Ecton, a farmer living at Winchester; Waller Glenmore; and Ethel, wife of John Bayless, who is in the real estate business at Winchester.

Waller Glenmore Combs was born at Schoolsville in Clark County, April 16, 1883. He grew up in the home of a country physician, attended rural schools, and on June 2, 1902, graduated A. B. from the Kentucky Wesleyan College at Winchester. On May 1, 1906, he received his M. D. degree from the University of Louisville, and while there was a member of the Pi Mu college fraternity. Doctor Combs practiced medicine at Winchester from 1906 until the winter of 1912, when he removed to Kirksville in Madison County, and is the leading representative of the medical profession there. He is a member of the County, State and American Medical associations.

On June 26, 1918, he was commissioned a first lieutenant in the medical corps and was called to active duty July 9, being sent to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, for ten days, and was then transferred to the Yale Laboratory School at New Haven, Connecticut. After three months he was assigned to special duty in combating the influenza epidemic at Camp Dix, New Jersey. He was there nineteen days and was then returned to the Yale Laboratory School. For one month he was stationed at Camp Crane, Allentown, Pennsylvania, and then sent to General Hospital No. 10 at Parker Hill, Boston, Massachusetts. Doctor Combs received his honorable discharge June 19, 1919, and at once returned home to his practice at Kirksville. He is a democrat, a member of the Christian Church, and is affiliated with Winchester Lodge No. 20, F. and A. M.

JAMES W. CHRISTIAN, who died October 22, 1896, at the old Christian homestead two miles east of Lexington on the Liberty Turnpike, was a lifelong resident of Fayette County and exemplified a character that merits particular reference in this publication; but moreover was an honored representative of a pioneer family in Kentucky and of an illustrious lineage in old Virginia. Many persons of the name in Virginia and elsewhere throughout the United States have become prominent in military and political history. Family tradition, confirmed by historical evidence, as brought to light in recent years traces the origin of the family to the English family of the same name in the Isle of Man, where the name was originally spelled M'Christen, and where for centuries members of the family have been the Deemsters, or Chief Justices, of that island. An English publication entitled "English Surnames, their Source and Significance" by Charles Wareing Bardsley, M. D., avers that the name Christian is a Patronymic one, meaning inherited from ancestors, and is found in the Domesday Book and had its origin in Denmark, where, as is well known, it is the name borne by the rulers of that country. The first ancestor of the family on record was William M'Christen, a member of the House of Keys in the Isle of Man at the Tyndwall Court held in that island in 1422. The first who settled at Ewanrigg, Isle of Man, was Ewan Christian Esq. of Milntown, barrister at law, eldest son of Edward Christian Esq. of Milntown, Deemster of the Isle of Man, and grandson of John Christian Esq. of Milntown, living in 1643, who was a son of Ewan Christian Esq. of Milntown, made Deemster of the Isle of Man in 1605, and grandson of William M'Christen of Milntown, the seventh in lineal descent from William M'Christen, the member, referred to above, of the House of Keys in 1422.

The founder of the family in America was Mr. Thomas Christian who immigrated to this country from the Isle of Man and located in Charles City County, Virginia. That he was a man of social distinction is evidenced by the fact that "Mr." was prefixed to his name. He was the progenitor of the families of New Kent, Charles City, and James City counties in Virginia. A grant of more than a thousand acres of land was patented to him in 1687 and some of it still remains in the Christian family in Charles City County, Virginia. One land patent to him was made as early as 1657. He was credited in an old chronicle with having owned all the land on both sides of the Chickahominy River from Windsor Shades to Squirrel Park.

One of the descendants of Thomas Christian, the Virginia ancestor was likewise named Thomas, became a pioneer in what is now Fayette County, Kentucky, where he acquired a tract of land of twelve hundred acres extending from the present Winchester Pike to the Todds Road, a distance of four miles, and several pieces of property in the City of Lexington. Between these two roads there are now two old homesteads on the Liberty Turnpike, this being the first free turnpike constructed in Fayette County and probably the first in the entire state, the right-of-way for this pike being given by the owners of the land through which the pike runs. One of the venerable houses on these two farms was the home of Thomas Christian prior to 1841, and that farm is now owned by William Jacob, having been sold to him by the heirs of Mr. Christian's daughter, Sarah Ann to whom he gave that farm. The other house is still retained in the possession of the Christian family and was the home of Thomas Christian at the time of his death. This Thomas Christian, Kentucky pioneer, father of James William Christian, the subject of this sketch, was the son of William Christian who emigrated from Virginia in 1782 or 1783, while Kentucky was still a wilderness, and was fifth in lineal descent from the Thomas Christian who came to this country from the Isle of Man. This William Christian married Anna, sister of Patrick Henry. Another Virginia Christian, became the wife of President John Tyler and one of a later generation married the daughter of Gen. "Stonewall" Jackson. Thomas Christian, who was born at Cross Plains (the name of which was changed by Act of Legislature in 1825 to Athens) in Fayette County, January 10, 1791, when twenty-one years of age, enlisted in Capt. Archibald Morrison's Company, Colonel Dudley's regiment under General Harrison, Commander of the Army of the Northwest. In the archives of the Western Reserve Historical Society a report written by Thomas Christian of the defeat of Colonel Dudley at Fort Meigs, relates the horrible experiences of the remnant of Kentuckians left after the battle. They were tomahawked right and left and he was be-spattered by blood and brains of a companion. Showing resentment at being searched by an Indian boy about sixteen, two painted warriors raised their tomahawks and would have buried them in his brains had their attention not been arrested at the moment by the few silver dollars he had left, and a brass inkstand that the young Indian had taken from him. The Kentuckians were taken down the Maumee River to an old deserted fort, where they were promised and foolishly expected, protection, by the British general, Proctor, if they succeeded in reaching the interior of the fort through the Indian gauntlet. Many were tomahawked in this way, but Thomas Christian reached the interior of the fort with only his warm jeans roundabout torn from his back, the brass buttons flying in all directions. The massacre by the Indians was carried into the fort and all would have undoubtedly been slain, but for the timely arrival of Tecumseh. When this old chieftain stepped into the fort, the yelling of the Indians ceased like a lightning flash and their clubs and tomahawks fell to their sides.

The few left were taken in open boats down the Maumee to the mouth of the Huron River on Lake Erie. Three days and nights they were exposed to intense cold with nothing to eat but one mess of horse flesh. At the mouth of the Huron they were turned loose with insufficient clothing and nothing to eat save one mess furnished by General Harrison who would have done more had it been possible. Separating into small groups, they promised to assist each other when possible. In the group with Thomas Christian were Robert Simpson, Daniel Carter, George Sherwin and Joseph Franklin. Many were sick including Mr. Christian, this making their progress more slow than otherwise, through a friendless country infested with Indians. Thomas Christian was often too weak to rise but could walk for several hours after being assisted to his feet. After much suffering the Ohio River was reached, and they were put across to the Kentucky side. Here a strange coincidence occurred. When Thomas Christian stepped ashore he saw his father on the river bank looking intently up the river at a boat descending. He had just arrived and something persuaded him that his son might be in one of the boats, but so intent was his gaze on the boat descending that he did not see his son who had stepped from another boat until he spoke to him.

In 1825, Thomas Christian was appointed by the State Legislature to serve as one of the first five trustees of the town of Athens which was incorporated that year and continued in this capacity for several years. There stands on Boonesborough Street, in Athens at the present time a two-story brick residence built by Thomas Christian over a hundred years ago. This trusteeship was the only public office he held, his time being given afterwards to dealing extensively in real estate and to large farming operations. He was the owner of many slaves and the humanitarian treatment accorded them was manifest in their affection for him and his family long after they had been freed. His account books, bearing dates from 1877 to 1874, substantial, hand-made, leather-back books, are indicative of the careful, methodical, business man that he was, considering farming as a business as it truly is and in his case, was highly organized.

As a historical fact it may be well to mention here, since many persons are of the opinion that an income tax was unknown in this country before the passage of the recent law providing for that kind of tax, that among Mr. Christian's papers are several income tax receipts, the earliest bearing the date, October 6, 1864. These are from the Federal Government.

On October 31, 1820, Thomas Christian married Harriet Washington Berryman who was born in Virginia, March 4, 1799, and died in Lexington, Kentucky, at the home of her son, James W. Christian, December 12, 1882, at the age of eighty-three years. She was a daughter of Gilson and Ann (Washington) Berryman and had kinship with George Washington, family tradition being to the effect that Ann Washington was the grand niece of George Washington. Gilson Berryman was born in Virginia, June 24, 1773, and died at his home near Pine Grove, in Fayette County, Kentucky, August 17, 1836. His wife, Ann Washington, was born in Virginia, May 2, 1769, and died October 18, 1856, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Thomas Christian, the home which is now occupied by the Christian family on the Liberty Turnpike. At the time of his death, January 10, 1876, Thomas Christian was residing on this farm which he bequeathed to his son, James William. It was in the house on the farm, now owned by Mr. Jacob that his son, James William, was born. The latter was five years of age when the family moved to the present Christian home, a spacious and splendidly built brick residence, with woodwork throughout of black walnut, painted white in accordance with the fashion of colonial days.

Of the eight children of Thomas and Harriet W. Christian, six attained to years of maturity. Henrietta, the eldest daughter, became the wife of Dr. John Warnock of Lexington and died April 11, 1853, while still a young woman, and of her two children, only Aristus Newton reached mature years. Alethea Christian became the wife of John P. Ballard of Richmond, Madison County, Kentucky, and died November 5, 1858, leaving no children, her only child, a daughter, having died in infancy. The youngest daughter, Sarah Ann, became the wife of John Gess, a wealthy and prominent farmer of Fayette County, and was a resident of Lexington at the time of her death in November, 1896. The eldest of the children, Doddridge Gilson, was for many years a resident of California, being one of the 49ers and later locating there and achieving success and influence in business and civic affairs in San Diego and his son, Harfield Timberlake, also became one of the prominent citizens of San Diego, where he was a leading business man and also a leader in political affairs and widely known as a man of unswerving integrity and nobility of character. He held many positions of honor, including that of United States Marshal of his judicial district, and at the time of his death in November, 1914, he was a commissioner of the San Diego Exposition held in connection with the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco. He left a wife and one daughter, Anna Brockenbrough Christian, residents of San Diego. The youngest son of Thomas and Harriet W. Christian was William Henry Harrison Christian who died at Lexington in June, 1896, and the surviving members of his family, his wife, a son and daughter, now reside at Detroit, Michigan. His son, Thomas, is connected with the Ford Automobile Company and the daughter, Lillie, is the wife of J. J. Willyard, who is a wholesale lumber dealer. Two children of Thomas and Harriet W. Christian, Newton Berryman and Thomas Milton, died in infancy.

The late James William Christian, fourth among the children, was born June 10, 1836, in the house on the farm referred to above, now owned by Mr. Jacob, three miles east of Lexington on the Liberty Turnpike. He was educated in private schools and at Transylvania University at Lexington and was graduated in law from Transylvania with the class of 1871. He was admitted to the bar in Lexington, but never engaged in the regular practice of his profession, as about that time the condition of his father's health and his advanced age made it imperative for him to assume the supervision of his father's farming interests, and though he did not use his legal knowledge professionally, he found it of very great value in the management of his father's and of his own personal affairs.

We must now go back a few years as Mr. Christian's law course was pursued after the war and after his marriage. He enlisted in the Confederate Army and served under the famous General John H. Morgan. He was imprisoned in Louisville for a time and while being taken by steamboat to a northern prison, he and Capt. Albright made their escape. After being transferred from the Ohio River boat to the Mississippi steamer, they thought their condition pretty hopeless and decided to take a chance at making their escape. A friendly rain that ran noisily from a gutter on the boat prevented the guards from hearing the splash of the water as they plunged into the river at a landing of the boat; and though having to wade waist-deep in the river and walk all night in the rain with not a star to guide their course, they were fortunate in finding themselves at daybreak before a farmhouse occupied by warm-hearted Southern sympathizers who took them in and made them comfortable. When refreshed and dry and rested, they left their benefactors and separated to meet only once again about thirty years later. Mr. Christian made his way into Marshall County where he had some property and where he could be safe from molestation until he could get back to his company. It was not safe for him to go to his home in Fayette County because at that time it was overrun with Northern Soldiers. He was never able to again join his company, and during his enforced residence in Marshall County, taught school, a position he obtained through the kindness of Col. Alfred Johnston.

On October 6, 1864, he married Miss Harriet Adaline Johnston, daughter of Col. Alfred and Jerdenia (Howard) Johnston of Marshall County, Kentucky. Mrs. Christian, who still occupies the old homestead east of Lexington was born in Marshall County December 18, 1847, and is one of the venerable and loved gentlewomen of her native state. She became the mother of seven children: Matie Lena, the eldest, is the wife of William Robert Brown, wealthy and prominent wholesale grocery merchant of Lexington; their two daughters are Eva Marguerite and Edith Hazel, both graduates of the University of Kentucky. Miss Marguerite Brown pursued graduate work at Columbia University after graduating from the University of Kentucky, and is now teaching Psychology in the University of Denver, Colorado; Miss Hazel is teaching general science in a junior high school in Denver. Harriet Jerdenia and Mary Katherine are the two daughters who with a brother, Todd, share the beauties and comforts of the old homestead with their mother. Caroline Marguerite who died in 1902 at the age of thirty-one was the wife of John Finley Elsey, brother of Charles William Elsey, well known Baptist minister.

of the state, and now president of Williamsburg College. Mr. Elsey had died in 1898, fourteen months after the birth of their only son, Edward Everett Elsey. After the death of his parents, Everett Elsey was reared in the home of his maternal grandmother under the direct management of his aunt, Miss Harriet J. Christian, and to this labor of love she gave a devotion and singleness of purpose rarely equaled even by a mother. This son is a graduate of the University of Kentucky in mechanical and electrical engineering, is a member of the Alpha Tau Omega Fraternity and the honorary fraternity Tau Beta Pi; of the American Association of Mechanical Engineers; American Institute of Electrical Engineers; and the Meriman Engineering Society. He was treasurer of his class when a senior at the University, member of the editorial staff of the "Kentuckian," the paper issued by the students, and captain in the military school of the university. Early in the World War, during his sophomore year at the University, he entered the Reserve Officers Training Corps at Fort Sheridan, Illinois, was commissioned second lieutenant and stationed at the Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Auburn, Alabama, as instructor in military tactics. He continued in the service in this capacity until after the armistice—he then returned to the university and completed his collegiate course. His brilliant record as a student began with his first year in the elementary school—suffice it to say, however, further in this connection that in his senior year in the Morton High School, Lexington, that he was president of his class, business manager of the school paper, manager of the track team, had the leading rôle in the senior play, was interlocutor of the high school minstrels; was chosen by his teacher of English to deliver President Wilson's Thanksgiving proclamation at the exercises in chapel at that time, November, 1915, was chosen by his teacher of history to preside at the Washington's birthday celebration, which he opened with an address, and was graduated in June, 1916, with the highest grades in a class of sixty. On June 14, 1921, he married Miss Anna Jean Smith, daughter of Dr. Orrin Leroy and Caroline (Spellman) Smith of Lexington and is at this writing, January, 1922, connected with the Dow Manufacturing Company at Louisville, as draftsman.

The fifth and youngest daughter of James W. and Harriet A. Christian, Ula Berryman, was graduated from Hamilton College, Lexington, and married Frank Hyman Brown, a wholesale grocery merchant of Lexington and brother and business partner of William Robert Brown, referred to above, both natives of North Carolina, near Hamilton and of a prominent family, sons of Hezekiah and Susan Ann Elizabeth (Hooker) Brown. Mrs. Frank Brown died May 5, 1917, at her home on Ashland Avenue, Lexington, leaving two children, Harriet Elizabeth and Carolyn Christian; two children died in infancy. The elder of the two sons of J. W. and H. A. Christian is Thomas Alfred, successfully identified with agricultural activities in Fayette County. He married Edna Rogers Bush, daughter of the late Alexander and Martha (Bryant) Bush and they have two children, Johnston Bush and Martha Naomi. The youngest of the family is Todd Christian who remains with his mother and two sisters at the old home on the Liberty Road. Though frail from infancy, his sweet spirit and willingness to serve wherever he could lend a hand have made him the most popular member of the household.

Miss Mary Katherine Christian is a Kentucky woman whose talents have earned her opportunities for broad usefulness and service both in and out of her home state. She is a graduate of Hamilton College at Lexington, pursued a course in home economics and was graduated from Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York, and holds the degree Bachelor of Science from Columbia University, New York. She was for a number of years a teacher of home economics, including seven years in the public schools of New York City, four years of that time being head of the Department of Home Economics in the Summer School of the New York University; and supervisor of the home economics work in the public schools of Lexington, Kentucky for five years. She held several positions in hospitals, including the Johns Hopkins and the New York Hospital, as teacher of dietetics to the nurses in training. In 1918 she returned from New York to join her mother at the old homestead and has since that time been assisting with the direction of the farm operations, applying in this way knowledge acquired in a course in agriculture at Cornell University. She has been active in the work of various organizations, including the Woman's Club of Central Kentucky, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Kentucky Educational Association and the National Home Economics Association. She was organizer and chairman of the Home Economics Department of the Woman's Club of Central Kentucky; organizer and chairman of a similar department of the Kentucky Educational Association and vice president of that association at one time; she was secretary-treasurer of the Home Economics Association of Greater New York while residing in that city. She is a member of the Fayette Community Council, affiliated with the Civic League of Lexington, and with the Fayette County League of Women Voters. She is active in the political life of her state, and was a delegate to the first State Democratic Convention held after the enfranchisement of women. Though in sympathy with the principles of the democratic party, let it be said here that she does not hesitate to "scratch" the ticket when men of incompetence are offered for office. In the recent campaign to solicit funds for the Woodrow Wilson foundation, she served as chairman of the committee in her voting precinct in this plan to perpetuate the name of this great and beloved leader.

For a time after his marriage, James W. Christian lived in Marshall County, and then for several years in the City of Paducah where he was engaged, in partnership with Colonel Johnston, in the mercantile business. About 1868 he returned to Fayette County and resumed his residence on the ancestral estate, at the invitation of his father and mother who were then advanced in years and wished to be relieved of the care of the place. During the first year after his return to Fayette County, he taught in the little Warfield School on the Winchester Pike being the first teacher in that building, the use of which as a school building has long been discontinued. He remained here until March, 1877, and his father having died the year previous, he moved to Lexington where his children could have better educational facilities than in the country. His mother accompanied him to Lexington and made her home in his family until her death. The family resided in Lexington for nineteen years but returned to the old homestead in March, 1896, and Mr. Christian's death occurred there the 22nd of the following October. For many years Mr. Christian successfully engaged in buying and selling real estate and became a substantial capitalist on his own account in addition to that which he had inherited from his father. Though in impaired health for a number of years, he maintained personal supervision of his property interests, including valuable real estate in the western part of the State. Mr. Christian was a man of noble character, of distinctive intellectual and business ability and in all the relations of life he so ordered his course as to merit the unqualified esteem of his fellow men. His political allegiance was given to the democratic party.

The father of Mrs. James W. Christian, Col. Alfred Johnston, was born in Caldwell County, Kentucky, January 22, 1813, and died at his home in Paducah, Kentucky, September 9, 1873. In 1836, in Marshall County, he married Miss Jerdenia Howard, a daughter of Stephen and Mary (Moffett) Howard. She was born in Butler County, Kentucky, September 6, 1812, and died in Marshall County, August 9, 1896. Colonel Johnston served with distinction as an officer of the Third Kentucky Regiment as lieutenant-colonel in the Confederate Army and was wounded in the battle of Shiloh, a son, William Henry Johnston, who was serving in Colonel Johnston's regiment was also wounded very severely and died in an army hospital a few days later. Colonel Johnston was a very public spirited man, active in commercial affairs and in politics. The first public office he held was that of justice of the peace; he was then made assessor of taxes and then county judge. He represented his district in the Lower House of the Legislature in 1845, 1846 and 1847, and in the State Senate in 1850. It is a fact worthy of note that Colonel Johnston was never defeated in any race he ever made before the people. He was an honored and influential citizen of Paducah at the time of his death which occurred eight years after the close of the war.

A description of the coat of arms of the Isle of Man Christians and used by their descendents in this country with the family motto follows:

Arms: Azure field, a chevron humettée between three covered cups, gold. Crest: A unicorn's head, erased, silver; collared and armed, gold. Motto: Salus per Christum—salvation through Christ. The bearings and crest are symbolic of virtue, strength and courage.

JOSEPH GIDEON BOSLEY, M. D. One of the most prominent members of the medical fraternity in Madison County is Dr. Joseph Gideon Bosley, a physician and surgeon at Richmond, who has been in the routine of his professional work for thirty years. Doctor Bosley represents a Kentucky family that came here in pioneer times, and is a member of the sixth consecutive generation to bear the name of Gideon.

Walter Gideon Bosley came from England and settled in Maryland in 1660. Doctor Bosley had a Revolutionary ancestor, James Gideon Bosley, who was a soldier in the Continental forces during the war for independence. His great-grandfather, Gideon Bosley, was born at Baltimore, Maryland, and married there Eliza Cole. They settled in Washington County, Kentucky, as pioneers, and lived and died there. The grandfather of Dr. Bosley was Gideon Bosley, who was born in Washington County in 1780, a date that establishes the very early settlement of the family there. He lived out his life in that county as a planter and slave holder and died in 1830. His wife was Elizabeth Fleece, who died in 1860, and was likewise a resident of Washington County all her life. The father of Doctor Bosley was Gideon Josephus Bosley, who was born in Washington County in 1829, was reared and married there, and gave his life to merchandising. In 1872 he moved to Lebanon, and was a merchant in that city until his death in 1912. He served as sheriff of Washington County four years, was a democrat, very strict in his allegiance to the Presbyterian Church and served his church as an elder for sixty-one years and for sixty years was a member of the Masonic fraternity. He married Mary Jane Gartin, daughter of Uriah Gartin and Eliza Speed Peyton, on January 27, 1853. She was born in Marion County in 1828, and died at Lebanon in 1913, sixty years after her marriage. She was the mother of seven children: Fannie Ellen, who died at Lebanon at the age of thirty; Hallie Elizabeth, wife of Lurian B. Hurt, a farmer at Columbia, Kentucky; Miss Sallie Eliza, of Lebanon, Mattie Barbour, of Lebanon, widow of Ben Spaulding McElroy, a farmer who died in April, 1920; Charles Uriah, an undertaker at Lebanon; Joseph Gideon; and John Logan, a laundryman at Lebanon.

Joseph Gideon Bosley was born at Springfield in Washington County, May 20, 1869. He acquired his early education in the Loventhall Academy at Lebanon, and for four years, 1889-92, was a student in the medical department of the University of Louisville. He graduated M. D. in March, 1892. Doctor Bosley did post-graduate work in 1897 in the New York Polyclinic, and in 1920 attended the Post-Graduate School of New York. In later years much of his practice has been specialized in Urology. He practiced from 1892 to 1896 at Lebanon, and then at Union City in Madison County from 1903 to 1906. He moved to Muskogee, Indian Territory, where he lived until 1909, since which year his home and practice have been at Richmond. His office is in the D. M. Bright Building at 212 West Main Street, which he now owns. Doctor Bosley is a member of the Madison County, Kentucky State and American Medical associations, and during the war was medical examiner for the Madison County Draft Board, and performed the duty of examining 3,800 recruits.

He is a democrat, a deacon in the Presbyterian Church, has twice served as master and for the past five years has been secretary of Richmond Lodge No. 25, F. and A. M., past high priest and for three years secretary of Richmond Chapter No. 16, R. A. M., and is past commander of Richmond Commandery No. 19, K. T. He has been health officer of Madison County, Kentucky, twelve years, and is head of Unit of War Risk Insurance, Public Health Service.

Doctor Bosley, who has a modern home on Summit Avenue in Richmond, married in that city, April 24, 1906, Miss Florrie Bright, daughter of David Mortimer and Laura (Field) Bright. Mrs. Bosley is a graduate of South Carolina College for women, Columbia, South Carolina. They have had two children. Laura Field, was born in Muskogee March 25, 1907, which was then in Indian Territory and now in the State of Oklahoma. She died May 22, 1908, and was buried in Richmond, Kentucky. Joseph Gideon was born in Muskogee, Oklahoma, January 25, 1909.

RICHARD ALEXANDER is a Kentucky lawyer whose name and abilities are known far beyond the limits of his home county of McLean. He has practiced law at Calhoun for the past twenty years, and is regarded as one of the most brilliant men in his profession in that section of the state.

The Alexanders are of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and they came to Kentucky from Virginia. James Alexander, grandfather of the Calhoun lawyer, was a native of that state and in early life settled in Oldham County, Kentucky, but during the '60s moved to McLean County, where he started life as a farmer. His son, Benjamin F. Alexander, was born in Oldham County in 1855, grew up from early boyhood in McLean County and was about twenty years of age when he married Ann Mary Hodgkin. She was born in Daviess County, Kentucky. Her father, James Hodgkin, was a Union soldier and died in Georgia while in the service. Her mother, Jane (Vance) Hodgkin, was reared in McLean County. Mrs. Benjamin Alexander is still living, at the age of sixty-four. Benjamin Alexander after his marriage lived in Daviess County on a farm until about 1900, then moved to Marshall County, and died there in 1908. He and his wife had ten children, all of whom grew up on the farm.

Richard Alexander was born on a farm in Delaware, Daviess County, January 12, 1877, and his mind and character were molded in a rural environment. He attended country schools, during 1898 was a student in the Western State Normal at Bowling Green, and during 1899-1900 was in the State University at Lexington. Four years of his early life were spent as a teacher. In the meantime he began the study of law at Calhoun, was admitted to practice in April, 1901, and from that date to the present has carried some of the heavier responsibilities of professional life. In 1903 he was appointed master commissioner of the McLean County Circuit Court, and held that office until 1910. In that year he was elected county attorney, and served eight years, a part of the period of the World war. Since retiring from office he has given his entire time and energy to his extensive general practice.

Mr. Alexander is a democrat, a member of the Christian Church and a Royal Arch Mason. In June, 1914, he married Mrs. Edna (Ingram) Greenup, a native of McLean County and daughter of George and Lillie Ingram. Mr. and Mrs. Alexander have two children, Walter W. and Richard, Jr.

WOODSON WASHINGTON SPICER, M. D. Upon completing his course in medicine Doctor Spicer returned to his native locality in McLean County and for twelve years has carried the burdens of a large professional practice at Calhoun and in the country vicinity.

Doctor Spicer was born on a farm in McLean County, March 8, 1880, a son of George W. and Mary Angeline (Moore) Spicer, the former a native of Owen County and the latter of McLean County. Doctor Spicer spent his early life on his father's farm, attending in the meantime the country schools. He was a student in the Sacramento Normal in his native county, also in the Western Kentucky Normal School, spent four years in Transylvania University at Lexington, and from there entered the Hospital College of Medicine at Louisville, where he was graduated July 30, 1908. Since then he has given his uninterrupted time and energies to his medical practice, his able talents have been ripened by experience, and he stands in the front rank of McLean County's medical profession.

Doctor Spicer has some interests in the farming community of his native county. He is a Master Mason, a member of the Christian Church, a democrat, and is affiliated with the McLean County, State and American Medical associations. In 1911 he married Miss Madeline Sebald, of Calhoun, and they have one daughter, Alice Loraine.

JOE HAYNES MILLER. During the past three decades perhaps no citizen of McLean County has found his time and abilities harnessed to more responsibilities of public and professional affairs than Joe Haynes Miller, who has successively been a teacher, school superintendent, lawyer, public official and banker.

Mr. Miller was born in Ohio County, Kentucky, April 12, 1860, son of James C. and Frances Y. (Haynes) Miller, the former a native of Daviess County and the latter of Ohio County. James C. Miller spent his active life on a farm in Daviess County, and was the father of five children.

Joe Haynes Miller grew up in a rural district, and had the duties of a farm household as a familiar part of his early environment and training. He attended common schools, the West Kentucky College at South Carrollton, and was in the schoolroom as a teacher for five years. He studied law under Judge William B. Noe at Calhoun, and was admitted to the bar in January, 1887.
